from the holy sufferings of His people, when they bear pain with patience, when they praise His name on their beds, and adore Him in the fires, and when coming to die, they bear themselves calmly in the last dread article, behaving themselves as men who know no fear. When they walk through the very jaws of death, fearing no evil, simply confiding in the eternal Christ, then is Jesus glad to see how well they have learned the lesson which He taught them. When they come up on the other side of Jordan, like sheep from the washing; when they appear before His throne, "without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing;" when the shining ones draw near before Him, and cast their crowns at His dear feet; when they lift their united hallelujahs unto Him that loved them, and washed them from their sins in His precious blood—then is the King exceeding glad.

All this is my preface at this time, and I need not apologize for the length of it, since its theme might fitly have been that of the whole discourse. The sermon shall be somewhat short, and I trust it will be sweet. This is the subject of it: I desire that the Lord's people may enter into this joy of Christ, and that, as each one of them is made a king, the text may be fulfilled in each one of them. I have not described to you the gladness of our Lord as it ought to be described, but I can do no better. If you will endeavor to share in it, you will make up for my deficiencies. May the Holy Spirit aid you!

I. First, I would remark, that gladness is

THE PRIVILEGE OF SAINTS.

"Happy art thou, O Israel!" "Rejoice in the Lord, ye righteous." Why should we not be glad? It is all right between us and God. If, having rebelled against Him, we had never repented, and had never been reconciled, we ought to be miserable. He that is out of order with God may well be out of order with himself. But we have been brought nigh; we have been adopted into the family of God; we have obtained reconciliation through the precious blood, and have enjoyed the forgiveness of sins according to the riches of His grace; ought we not to be glad? Dear heart, there is no quarrel between thee and God; peace has been made through Jesus Christ; the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, doth keep thy heart and mind through Christ Jesus. If thou hast not a right to be happy, who has?

In addition to the fact that they are right with God, believers have their

in many ways. Grace endows them with immediate joys. I like that part of our song which we sang just now:

"The hill of Zion yields

A thousand sacred sweets,

Before we reach the heavenly fields,

Or walk the golden streets."

If I were to try and tell all the things that make Christians glad, even here below, I should have to make an endless catalogue. Where should I begin? Once beginning, where should I leave off? You can count your sorrows, dear brother, I dare say. You are quite au fait at adding them all up; but I would have you to recapitulate your joys with equal readiness. O my brothers, God has done so much for us that we are glad! He has surprised us with the greatness of His goodness! If I had been sure, thirty-five years ago, that I should have possessed, in the covenant of grace, such a portion as I have at this hour, I think I should have leaped out of my body for joy. When I was under a sense of sin, if I had been assured that I should yet be forgiven, I do not know that I could have contained myself for delight. When I was lying under the chastening hand of God, on account of my transgressions, if I had known that He would turn His face upon me, and smile upon me, and make me His child, and put me into the ministry, and permit me the great privilege of telling out the wonders of His grace, I verily believe that it would have been too great a weight of joy; it would have crushed me with too much delight.

Come, do not rob your God of His praises. Defraud not your King of His revenue of glory. Do not get fretting and stewing about nothing at all; but rejoice in the Lord always, and then again rejoice. This is an appointed feast; let us keep it. "The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad." I heard a brother in a prayer-meeting say, "The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we desire to be glad;" and I wanted to jump down that man's throat, and pull that passage back again, and put it into its natural shape. What business had the brother to mend the Bible, and talk such wretched stuff? "Whereof we desire to be glad"! Why, if the Lord has done great things for us, we are glad, we cannot help it, and blessed be His name we do not wish to do so!

In addition to that, we have

before us. We are the heirs of great expectations. The children of God not only possess present mercies, like the leaves and flowers of summer, but things which God hath prepared for them that love Him, laid by in store, like the fruits of autumn. At this present moment there is a place in heaven for me that nobody can ever fill but my own self; and Jesus has gone before, not only to prepare it, but to prepare it for me. There is a crown that no head but mine can ever wear, and a song that no tongue but mine can ever sing; and I shall soon cast my crown at Jesu's feet, and chant before Him my hallelujahs. That is true of every believer here. Therefore, be glad; yea, rejoice before the Lord with all your might.

The children of God have further cause to be glad, because they have to them, so that they shall never lose them. That which their God has promised them shall never be alienated from them. They are in a position of indisputable security, for they are hidden in the wounds of Christ, as in the clefts of the Rock of Ages. They shall never die, for they are members of His body who is immortal. They are in that hand from which none can ever snatch them. "I give unto my sheep eternal life, and they shall never perish; neither shall any pluck them out of my hand." Wherefore let us begin to be merry, as it is said in the parable of the prodigal son. "They began to be merry." I have read that parable ever so many times, and I have looked to see whether it is written that they ever left off being merry, and I cannot find that they did.

II. Secondly, let me remark that the saints' gladness is

OF A PECULIAR SORT.

The gladness which is peculiar to the children of God is a gladness that God has wrought in them. "Thou hast made him exceeding glad." Oh, yes, I heard him! He seemed very glad, but when he began to explain to me his gladness, I could tell by his hiccough where he got it; he owed it to the deadly cup. Shame on him! Oh, yes, he was exceeding glad; but when I saw his merriment, I could tell that it was his youth and his good health that gave him his gladness! These will soon vanish away.

But the child of God owes his gladness to a deeper source; God has made him glad. He that can touch the secret springs of the heart, apart from circumstances or conditions, has often made a man glad when he has been racked with pain, or when he has been in the depths of poverty, or when he has been suffering at the demoniacal hands of inquisitors.

I know that worldlings imagine that we Christians are a miserable crew, and I fear that too often we turn when we are with them. I am told that many shop-keepers are so poor that they put the most of their goods in the shop-window; but this is a method which few Christians follow; for the opposite is the fact, their window is badly set out, and yet they have a costly stock upon their shelves. The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light, in this as well as other things. I would recommend such believers to dress their window a little, and show some of their better things. Put your ashes into the back yard, but pour out the oil of joy in the parlor. Let people see that, after all, there are great advantages in belonging to the Lord's household. But whether we seem to be happy or not, I can speak as one who has not been without abundant affliction and trial, we who believe in Jesus are a happy people, an enviable people.

But, according to the text, this joy comes to us in one way. "Thou hast made him exceeding glad with thy countenance." Have you not sometimes been made very glad with the look of a friend's face? Certain friends of ours carry with them countenances which are always a half-day's holiday to me whenever I look on them. I do not say that this is true of all of you, for I know some

KNIGHTS OF THE RUEFUL COUNTENANCE, whose faces are long and dismal; and I would urge these to look into the face of Jesus till His brightness illuminates them. There are those among us who are so brimming over with sacred joy that a glance at their faces refreshes our hearts. Now, catch my thought—What must the countenance of God be? The countenance of a friend to a friend, of a bridegroom to his bride, of a wife to her husband, of a father to his child; each of these spreads gladness; but what is the countenance of God to His elect? It is a countenance that seems to say, "I am reconciled; your sin is put away." Oh, the gladness of seeing that face! It is a face that seems to say, "I am watching you; I am caring for you; I am smiling upon you." Is not this a gladdening look? Lord, thou hast made me glad with thy countenance.

Again, when you come before God in prayer, and you are pleading with Him, and your faith discerns that glorious face—your heart cries, "I am accepted; God is hearing my prayer. I may ask what I will, and that shall be done unto me. I am not praying like a stranger; I am pleading like a child. I have my Father's ear and heart, and His countenance is toward me." Oh, then it is a glad time with you! You are being heard, and answered, and your heart beats to music.

I have not time, you see, to open up this grand subject fully, but such is the joy of God's people. It comes from a clear sense of the divine approbation.

WE MUST WALK WITH GOD, and be heartily agreed with Him, or we shall not possess this felicity. Whenever the child of God feels, "I was wrong; God is grieved with me;" then he goes slinking off to bed like a child that cannot have a good-night kiss; and there is no gladness for him. But when, on the contrary, the Lord turns to him in love and mercy, and says, "I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions, and, as a cloud, thy sins; return unto me; for I have redeemed thee;" and when he smiles upon us in Christ Jesus, then we can say with the Psalmist, "Thou hast made me exceeding glad with thy countenance."

This is my last word to you—be glad in the Lord. I do not ask you to simulate happiness—to pretend to be glad when you are not; I do not ask you to sing when your heart feels that it must sigh; but I do ask you to be glad when there is reason so to be. Be true and real in all your expressions; but let that truth and that expression spring from an educated soul that has been in the school of Christ, and has learned what the facts of the case really are. Let your feelings be according to truth, and your condition of heart according to the eternal settlements of immutable love. What are

THE FACTS OF THE CASE?

Here they are—O Lord, I will praise thee; though thou wast angry with me, thine anger is turned away, and thou comfortedst me." If I do not praise thee, the timber out of the wall must cry out against me. If I do not rejoice in thee, I shall be a traitor to my own consciousness, and false to my own convictions, for thou hast brought my soul up out of the horrible pit, and out of the miry clay, and thou hast set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings; and I must have a new song in my mouth, even praise forever more. I would, if I could, stir you all up to a burst of holy joy, a blaze of sacred gladness.

Put on your silver sandals, and your bridal ornaments. Take off your weeds, and gird yourselves in white raiment. Do off the sackcloth and ashes, and put on your beautiful array. Cast aside your chains; leave them for those to wear who love them; and walk at large, in liberty, bedecked with the jewels of infinite grace, and crowned with the diadem of loving-kindness. Sing unto the Lord a new song; and end it not till you get to heaven, and then it will never end. "I will sing unto the Lord as long as I live. I will sing praises unto my God while I have any being."

"Blessed be the God and Father of our Saviour Jesus Christ,
Who hath blessed us with such blessings, all uncounted and unpriced!
Let our high and holy calling, and our strong salvation be,
Theme of never-ending praises, God of sovereign grace, to Thee!"
Hallelujah! Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

THE CHRISTIAN SANCTIFIED BY THE LORD'S PRAYER.

PÈRE GROU, the author of this little work, which is translated from the French, seeks to impress his readers with the beauty and power of Christ's model prayer. Taking each petition singly, he shows how wide a field it covers and how far-reaching is its import. The lesson needs teaching, for the prayer familiar to us from infancy, offered morning and evening in every Christian home and in our churches every Sunday, is often spoken without a thought of its true meaning. Père Grou would have us make it a power in daily life, rightly believing that a life which is the perfect and habitual practice of the Lord's prayer is a sanctified life. The perusal of his little book may be the means of opening many eyes to the significance of the incomparable prayer and an encouragement to many Christians to strive more earnestly for the attainment of the blessings for which they have often prayed. His closing words are in themselves a sermon: "You will certainly be heard if you desire to be." Pp. 118. Price, 50 cents. Published Mr. Thomas Whittaker, New York.

JOHN KNOX.

By William M. Taylor, D. D., LL.D. We heartily welcome this biography of the great Scottish hero. The lessons which the life of Knox is fitted to teach need to be very thoroughly learned in our day. A wide tolerance for all forms of religious belief is the demand made on all hands now, and it is made with so much emphasis that a man like Knox is apt to be regarded as a narrow-minded bigot. Even religious teachers have been heard to deplore the ferocity of his intolerance, while the world can never forgive the austere priest who sternly rebuked his beautiful and charming queen, and was not moved to compassion even by her tears. Three centuries have passed away since Knox was laid in the tomb, and even now a vindication of him is not unnecessary. Men do not now understand why Knox waged so stern a fight against the Queen. The fact is, that with him religion was something more than an opinion. He saw that Mary was scheming to sell her realm to the devil, and he, for one, dare not stand by quietly and witness the transaction. Politeness to a high-born lady by all means; but it is no time for honeyed words when the high-born lady is about to commit a crime which will engulf a whole nation. Knox did his duty manfully, and he saved Puritanism in Scotland, to become a power in England and to live anew in America. The whole world is indebted to Knox, and the least we can do is to revere, his memory and hold him up as an example for the rising generation. Dr. Taylor's book, which is a graphic delineation of the great Scottish hero, ought to be widely read; its influence will be altogether beneficial. Pp. 217. Price, $1.25. Published by Messrs. A. C. Armstrong & Son, New York.

HOW TO BUILD, FURNISH, AND DECORATE

is the title of a work which forms part of a series which we described in a former number of this journal. This book is the largest and most complete of the series. It is divided into four departments: (1) Building Plans; (2) Furniture and Decoration; (3) Barns and Outhouses; (4) Law, Legal Forms, Specifications, etc. The editor of this useful series, Mr. R. W. Shoppell, has spared no pains to render his book a thoroughly practical and efficient guide to the citizen intending to build his own house. He does not write for architects or builders, but for the unprofessional man who, he supposes, has no knowledge of technical terms, and needs to have every detail fully explained. An important feature, too, is that the financial aspect of the undertaking is not overlooked. Plans and specifications are given for mansions to cost $50,000; but it is to the smaller houses, costing from $500 to $5,000, that the main attention is paid. That is wise, as the fortunate citizen who is prepared to spend $50,000 on his house is able to employ an architect, and will not need a book of this character. There are in all about six hundred and seventy illustrations in the book, rendering the verbal description clear to the eye. It comprises two hundred and twenty-six large quarto pages. Price $5. Published by the Co-operative Building Plan Association, 24 Beekman Street, New York. (See advertisement on last page.)

A Talk with a Blind Cobbler.

Timorous.

PERSONAL TRAITS OF BRITISH AUTHORS.

The group of distinguished writers which Mr. Mason selects as the subject of his third volume of this series consists of six Scotchmen and one Englishman. They are Scott, Hogg, Campbell, Chalmers, Wilson, Jeffrey, and De Quincey. The close friendship existing between Wilson and De Quincey suggested to Mr. Mason the propriety of including De Quincey with the group of Scotchmen rather than with his own countrymen.

Naturally the chief place in the group is given to Sir Walter Scott. It is a most lovable picture of him that his contemporaries have left on record. It would have been better for the posthumous fame of some men of genius had their personal acquaintances been less plentifully endowed with the power of writing caustic delineations of character, but of Scott his friends have nothing to say but good. Hogg writes of him: "He was the only one I ever knew whom no man, either poor or rich, held at ill will." His strong, resolute bearing under adversity, his steady industry, his cheerful demeanor in sickness and misery, his liberal charities and his ready helpfulness are mentioned by one after another and illustrated by incidents.

Dr. Chalmers is of the other authors described the most important. His personal appearance is minutely depicted by several of his friends. It seems to have impressed every one who saw him, owing to its being so different from the conception his fame had suggested. His low stature and his somewhat coarse features were in striking contrast to his gigantic intellectual power. "Na, na," said a policeman on one occasion, when he arrested the great preacher as a suspicious character, on finding him on his way to a midnight boat; "Na, na; you're no Dr. Chalmers; he's no such a man as you," and the man took the doctor to the police station, where he had to prove his identity before he was released.

Of Wilson, better known as Christopher North, of Hogg, the Ettrick shepherd, of Campbell, Lord Jeffrey, and De Quincey the opiumeater, many interesting memories are recorded. It is a strange group, its members differing widely from each other in mind, character, and life, yet each endowed with genius of a rare order. A new light dawns upon their writings as we read these sketches of personal character and learn what manner of men they were. Pp. 345. Price, $1.50. Published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

THE BLIND COBBLER.

AN English country vicar relates the following: "On one occasion, when taking my evening's stroll, I noticed a man leaving his house, situated in a country road. Knowing that he was, totally blind, I felt curious to see how he would find his way without stick or dog, and was anxious to watch him cross safely over two bridges we were approaching.

"Speaking in a kind tone, I observed to him, 'What, out for a walk, old friend?' "'No,' he replied, 'I am taking to the mill some boots I have been mending.'

"Brought up to the trade?' I inquired. "'No,' he answered: 'I was blind when a lad, and was sent to Liverpool, and they taught me at the Blind School to weave, and then to mend shoes, and, if I had been there of late years, I should have been taught to read. But God has been very kind to me,' he said: 'for after leaving Liverpool I married, and now I have children that can read to me; and my memory is so good that I can repeat many long passages from Milton's 'Paradise Lost.' I am very fond of poetry, especially Cowper. I can recollect the words,' he continued, 'after hearing them once or twice, pretty well. It's very nice to have something to think about when I am alone."

"I asked him if he could tell the time of day. 'Oh, yes,' he said; 'I rise very regular, but I open my watch and feel the hands; and the birds tell me when the sun rises, and I know by other sounds how the day goes on; and the atmosphere tells me how the weather is—I can feel the sunshine. Although I cannot see, I like to hear talk of the fields being full of flowers, and how beautiful the trees are in bloom. I can smell the sweet flowers.'

"He spoke so contentedly; and as I left him I felt constrained to ask myself the question, Have I made good use of those talents wherein eyesight alone has made me this man's superior?"

TIMOROUS.

AMONG the characters who figure in John Bunyan's matchless allegory is Timorous, whom, in the appropriate company of Mistrust, Christian met at the top of the hill Difficulty. "Now when he was got up to the top of the hill there came two men running again—the name of the one was Timorous and of the other Mistrust—to whom Christian said, 'Sirs, what's the matter? You run the wrong way.' Timorous answered that they were going to the city of Zion, and had got up that difficult place; but, said he, 'the farther we go the more danger we meet with; wherefore we turned and are going back again.'

"Yes," said Mistrust, 'for just before us lie a couple of lions in the way, whether sleeping or waking we know not; and we could not think, if we came within reach, but they would presently pull us in pieces.'

"Then," said Christian, 'you make me afraid; but whither shall I fly to be safe? If I go back to my own country, that is prepared for fire and brimstone, and I shall certainly perish there; if I can get to the Celestial City I am sure to be in safety there. I must venture. To go back is nothing but death; to go forward is fear of death and life everlasting beyond it. I will yet go forward.' So Mistrust and Timorous ran down the hill, and Christian went on his way."

Christian, as we know, saw the lions; they were really there, as Mistrust had said; but they were chained, and Christian passed them unharmed. Perhaps Timorous would have done so too if he had not had Mistrust for a companion. But then he might not have been timorous at all. The man who is tormented by mistrust in the spiritual life is very apt to be scared by the lions which the trusting man passes safely.

Mr. F. Barnard, the artist whose pencil drew the picture of Timorous published on page 204, has succeeded with marvellous skill in depicting the face Bunyan would conceive. The shrinking attitude, the hand clutching the cloak while the other hand clings for support to a blank wall, and the nervous, frightened gaze cast around him, all make up an idea of the man exactly in keeping with his character. This is one of the smaller of the pictures contained in the beautiful edition of the "Pilgrim's Progress"

MISSIONARIES ATTACKED BY DYAKS.

A TOUCHING record is found among the early missionary records of Borneo. It is stated that seven Rhinish missionaries settled on the island, built themselves huts, and labored among the inhabitants, who are a strange mixture of Malays, Chinese, Javanese and Europeans. The aboriginal inhabitants are called Dyaks, and it was principally to these that the efforts of the missionaries were directed. Little success attended their early labors; the climate was trying, and there was some talk of the mission being abandoned. But fully a million and a half of people were on the island, and the missionaries were reluctant to give up their work. The devoted servants of Christ toiled on, though their constitutions were being undermined in a land lying immediately under the equator, and where a large portion of the ground is a pestilential swamp.

At length mutterings of a coming storm reached their ears. The Dyaks were pure heathens, but they were largely under the influence of the Mohammedan settlers, whose hatred of the missionaries was as fierce as that manifested by the followers of the Prophet in other countries. Eventually the Dyaks were incited to violence, and one of the missionaries was surrounded in his hut and slaughtered. In another hut lived a missionary who had with him his wife and child, a little girl of some seven years of age. He, with a third missionary, realized that the time was come for them to obey the Lord's command, "When they persecute you in one city, flee ye unto another" (Matt. 10:23), and they held a parley with the savages. It was agreed that the missionaries should depart unmolested in an open boat, providing they left behind them every article of property they possessed.

No time was to be lost, and the two men, with the lady and little girl, hurried forthwith into the boat, the savages standing watching them with angry looks. "Mamma," said the little girl, to whom this sudden voyage was inexplicable, "where are we going?" Then, observing the unwonted gravity which sat on every brow, she said, "Are we going to Jesus altogether?" She spoke more truly than she knew. The missionaries' strong arms pulled the boat quickly out into the stream, but they were not a hundred yards from the bank when a flight of arrows fell around them. The mother drew her child closer to her bosom, while the missionaries pulled for dear life. They would probably have escaped the treacherous attack of the Dyaks in the water, but in a moment a native boat shot out in pursuit and two well-aimed arrows struck home. Both the missionaries were hit by the poison-tipped missiles and the fatal work was done. Happily the mother and child were rescued and were cared for by a European resident until they could be sent home; but both the missionaries died, killed, like their Master, by those whom they went to save.

THE JEW'S WARD.

A SERIAL STORY.

New Friends,

EARLY in the afternoon of Carola's second day in Hazelmout, Mrs. Arnold went down to the schoolhouse. The school itself was a large and lofty room, built with thick stone walls, with a window of stained glass in the high-pitched gable; but the old-fashioned cottage beside it was half of timber, with a thatched roof overrun with ivy. The door was open, and as Mrs. Arnold walked slowly up the narrow garden path she could see Carola sitting in the pleasant kitchen, so lost in the reading of a book that she had time to notice the new schoolmistress well before she was seen herself. It was a sweet young face, she thought—a pretty face—prettier than any she knew for miles round, as her husband had said. There was a subtle feeling of discomfort and dissatisfaction in her mind. Mrs. Stewart had engaged this Miss Fielding at a distance, and sent her down to Hazelmout, without asking her opinion.

But there was not much time for these reflections, for at the first sound her footsteps made as she approached the open door, Carola lifted up her head and hastened to meet her, with a warm flush and a smile of welcome on her face. She clasped Mrs. Arnold's outstretched hand in both of her own, and gave her a half-shy kiss, then drew back a little and looked into her face with tears sparkling in her eyes.

"Oh, I know who you are!" she cried; "you are Mrs. Arnold, and everybody says how good you are; and if you had not come to see me soon, I should have come to you. You were kind to me before you knew me, for it was you who made this place so beautiful for me. Almost all the pretty things in my new house came from you. And oh! how beautiful it is here, wherever I go. I have never had a home before. If there is ever anything I can do for you, how glad I shall be!"

Carola spoke rapidly and eagerly, though in a low and half timid voice, and she looked entreatingly into Mrs. Arnold's face, as if anxious to win her favor. Mrs. Arnold was almost ashamed that she could not give the impulsive girl a warmer welcome; but the secret dissatisfaction she felt made her manner colder than was usual.

"You can teach the children well," she said, in her quietest tones; "that will repay me."

"But that, of course, I shall do for my Lord's sake," answered Carola, "because that is what He has sent me here to do. If He had asked me what I would choose, and if I had considered it for years, I could not have thought of any place more beautiful than this, or any work better than teaching little children. It is so good of Him to send me here!"

There was no doubting the sincerity and simplicity of the fervent voice and earnest face; and Mrs. Arnold felt that the young schoolmistress was saying exactly what she thought.

"I can talk to you about our Lord Jesus Christ," she went on, "for everybody says how good you are, and how it is you who teach them about God. I shall do all I can to work for my Lord; but some day there may be something I can do for you, and then I shall feel as if I belonged to you. I have no friend in the world belonging to me; and I want to find a home and friends here. Will you not care for me, and love me a little—by and by, perhaps?"

"My dear child," answered Mrs. Arnold, "of course I will care for you."

"Then I shall be perfectly happy," said Carola. "And ever since I knew about Jesus Christ I have not had a day's trouble—not one day's real trouble. That is three years ago. And now He has sent me to this place, where there seems to be no hard trouble for anybody. Life is very easy here, and very pleasant. You all know one another like brothers and sisters; and nobody is hungry, or ragged, or drunken, or miserable."

For in Carola's memory there was a black background, toward which she seldom gave a glance, but which was there nevertheless, and gave all the more glow and light to this new life of hers. Like the dark and heavy background of some old picture, which serves only to throw into relief the loveliness of some face looking out of the dingy canvas at us; if the face was gone, who would throw away a glance at the obscure painting? Carola sighed softly as she spoke of being drunken and miserable.

"But we all have our crosses and our trials," said Mrs. Arnold.

"Oh, these are nothing!" cried Carola; "they can be nothing to people who know about Jesus Christ. It is people who don't know that have hard troubles—too hard to bear. There is nobody to make us afraid here; there is nothing to make us forget God. It is almost like the Garden of Eden when the Lord God walked in it in the cool of the day."

"Yes; and the tempter was there," said Mrs. Arnold, gravely, "and the man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of the Lord. It is the same thing here. You will soon find the tempter at work, and man trying to hide himself from God. We all do at times, my dear."

"Are you sure I shall do it some time?" asked Carola. "I don't know much yet, and I've only known about Jesus Christ for three years; but I've never wished that He could not see me. Oh, I could not bear to think that!"

"You know very little of real life," answered Mrs. Arnold; "you are young, and you fancy these feelings will last forever, but they will die away in time. Your mind will get full of other things."

She was about to say that when Carola married her household cares would engross most of her time and thoughts; but she checked herself; she would put no notions about love and marriage into the girl's head.

"Oh, I cannot bear to think it!" she exclaimed; "it would be like losing everything again. It would be worse than not knowing it to forget it. To think that my Lord should have lived in this world, and died on Calvary; and me to forget it! No, no; that is impossible! I wish sometimes He would set me something hard to do; something painful; something like the crown of thorns and the cross. If I could do anything painful to myself it would make me more like Him."

"The time will come," said Mrs. Arnold.

There was a faint stirring of trouble in Mrs. Arnold's heart as she went homeward. Carola was altogether so unlike the other schoolmistresses who had been before her that she could not dismiss the thought of her. There was a charm about her fresh young enthusiasm and her vividness of speech which she could not resist. The girl did not speak of her Lord as of one who had died long ago and gone back to the heaven from whence He came, but as of one whom she knew personally, and whose footsteps she was really following. And she took it for granted that she as a Christian felt the same. There had been something very spirit-stirring in her eager tone and words; and Mrs. Arnold's heart warmed toward her at the recollection of them.

But if there was a charm for her in the girl's pretty face and sweet voice and fresh enthusiasm, what might there not be for Philip? He was her only child, and the deepest desire of her heart was to see him well and happily married. No girl came into the circle of their acquaintance without being closely observed; and there was scarcely any end to the qualifications necessary in Philip's wife. It was simply impossible that he should marry a village schoolmistress.

The secluded little village, usually jealous and curious enough of any stranger, accepted Carola without a question. She had been chosen by Mrs. Stewart to be the schoolmistress, and that was sufficient guarantee of her suitability. But before long it came out that she possessed a fortune of her own, and her claim upon their respect was doubled. They had never had a governess before with an independent income; and no better proof was needed that this girl, who had no home or friends, came of a good parentage. Mr. Arnold, who as agent had many chances of investing money profitably, proposed to her to put out the money at a higher interest.

"But I don't want more money," she said, simply; "I have more than I can spend now. There is nobody poor here, for they have all enough to eat and to wear. I could not spend it if I had it."

"You may want more money by and by," said Philip Arnold, with a light on his face as he looked at her. "Couldn't you spend more upon yourself? Are there no trinkets or fine clothes, such as girls like, that you could spend money on?"

"I don't think I could," she answered, smilingly. "How should I look with fine clothes on in my schoolroom or my kitchen? Besides, I don't care to be higher in the world than Mary was, my Lord's mother. She was poor, you know, but not very poor. I think she might have lived in a house like mine, and I should choose to live as she lived as near as an English woman can. And there were Mary and Martha, who prepared the supper for our Lord, and served Him at the table; and Peter's wife's mother, who ministered to Him herself. I think I must be more like them than if I were richer; and I'm glad to have it so."

"Then you have no ambition," said Philip; "you don't want to rise in the world?"

"How could I?" she asked. "Didn't our Lord say, 'Whosoever of you will be chiefest shall be servant of all?' Oh, you don't know; I am more than content to be as I am!"

For a moment a shade passed over Carola's face. She felt they did not understand her, though they regarded her with such friendly eyes. To care little for money, to have no wish to rise in the world; that was a childish view to take of the Christian religion. It was all very well for this young girl, who knew nothing of real life, and fancied she could live as the birds live, secure in the care of that God by whom the sparrows were not forgotten; but such a view of religion was impracticable for men of business, whose forefathers had been thrifty farmers, and had left them money, which must be made into more money. They were doing it honorably, and no man could reproach them with doing a shabby thing; not even the small meannesses that many other Christian men of business permitted themselves.

The time passed by very happily for Carola. When the harvest was over the nutting and the blackberrying began; and she wandered along the lanes that were filled with autumn scents, treading on a carpet of moist brown leaves, while the band of merry children, delighted to have their new schoolmistress as a companion, dragged down the bramble-bushes, and the tall hazel shoots, and brought to her feet the finest of the fruit. When the winter came she would often make her way across the fresh furrows where the corn was newly sown, to visit the boys who were scaring away the hunger-stricken birds, lest they should feel lonely at their work from dawn to dusk, short as the days were growing.

So busy she kept herself that there was not an idle moment in her day. Before long her pleasant kitchen became the favorite resort of the villagers; a common meeting-place such as they had not had before. For there was no liquor saloon in the hamlet, and the "master's" large kitchen at the Grange was something of an audience-chamber. But in Carola's cottage there was always a cheerful fire burning, and there was a warm welcome to whomsoever knocked at her door. She was glad to see them, and they felt it. Sometimes there was singing, if those who came could sing, and sometimes she had a book to read in her clear, natural voice which all could understand. She could cut out clothing and turn old things into new; and if one could find her alone, how full of sympathy she was when all their thoughts and troubles were falteringly told! The schoolmistress's house became a rival of the farm-house, and Mrs. Arnold, when she drew aside the thick curtains of her sitting-room window, could see the lattice casement all alight, and knew that some of the people, who in former days brought their troubles to her, had carried them to their new friend.

"It is pretty to hear her talk o' Jesus Christ," said one of the old women to her; "she do talk of Him as if she'd known Him. It's like hearin' o' somebody that lives close by. And everything make her think of Him, the hens scratchin' on the ground, and the flowers in the gardens, and the great white clouds, ay, and the sparrows fightin' under the eaves. I niver thought as He'd lived just like us."

"Yes, she's full of fancies," said Mrs. Arnold, ungraciously.

For it was a hard thing to see those who had once looked up to herself for spiritual guidance and consolation flocking around this young girl, and repeating her words one to the other as if there was some special sacredness in them. There was a change in the village. It had not been an ideal village in former times, though no great crime or vice was likely to happen in it. There had always been village squabbles and jealousies; the men had got drunk occasionally, though it was more than a mile to the nearest liquor store; and the women had been idle and thriftless, spending their time in unfriendly gossiping.

Mrs. Arnold had seldom been asked to teach any but the sick and dying, for religion had seemed a thing fit chiefly for those who were about to quit this familiar life—a thing good for the other world, of no use in this. But now it was becoming the subject of every-day talk, and the wonderful life of Christ was being thought about and pondered over in quite a new manner. The old family Bibles, which had lain dusty and unopened on the shelves or the window-sill in the cottages, were being read, sometimes by the children who went to school, but quite as often by their parents. They were beginning to realize that the Lord had been a working man as poor as themselves, and that the Testament was a book for working people. A new and keen interest was awakened in them.

It was a new thing that would not last very long, thought Mrs. Arnold. Was it a comfort to her to think so? She did not dare to ask herself the question. But it was a comfort to find Miss Fielding so busy and so absorbed in her work as to be unable to give any special attention to her son Philip. There was not a trace in her manner of seeking admiration; she was as simple and frank in her tone to him as she was to John Windbank, the wagoner. But though Philip spoke of her as indifferently as he had been used to speak of the school-mistresses, he spent an hour or two, now and then, in her cottage of an evening when there was some singing going on. Even Mr. Arnold would turn in, and linger there, finding it a pleasant change from the monotony of his own fireside.

"What is it you see in that girl?" she asked one evening, when her husband came in with a bright look of pleasure on his face, after leaving her alone till supper time was come.

"Well, she's pretty and kindly," he answered, "and full of life. It's pleasant to see a young creature as full of life and energy as that. She's a little hasty in her temper, but then she's quick to be sorry for it. She keeps them all alive in her kitchen, I can tell you. Ah! Mary, my dear, if we'd only had a girl of our own like her!"

"I think all men are foolish," she replied, sharply. She had been about to say fools, but checked herself, for that was too harsh and petulant. "I suppose," she added, in a lower tone, "you would not like Philip to make her your daughter?"

"No, no; that would never do," he answered, "oh, that would never do! She's a good girl, and pretty, but she's not Philip's equal. Philip must look higher than that, very much higher. If I saw anything of that sort going on I should put a stop to it."

A PERILOUS VOYAGE.

S. S. Lesson for April 5, Acts 27: 1-25. Golden Text, Ps. 56: 3. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

God's Use of the Roman Officials—An Entrance for the Gospel in Rome—Character of the Centurions—A Tedious Voyage—Its Uses—Instruments in Preparation—Paul's Admonition—His Message Disregarded—The Storm—Paul Encouraging Assurance—God's Way of Dealing with the Erring.

NEITHER the Jews of Jerusalem, nor Felix, Festus, nor Agrippa had it their own way with regard to Paul. God made use of them all to work out His own purposes, and to make an entrance in Rome, the most powerful city of the then known world, for the blessed Gospel of Christ. "Luke, the beloved physician" (Col. 4: 14), who gives such glorious accounts of the Lord's healing in the Acts of the Apostles, writes: "And when it was determined that we should sail into Italy, they delivered Paul and certain other prisoners unto one named Julius, a centurion of Augustus' band." God gave Paul favor in the eyes of this man Julius, who "courteously entreated Paul, and gave him liberty to go unto his friends to refresh himself."

There was a great deal of solid honesty and uprightness among the centurions of the Roman army, as we can see from the centurion (Matt. 8: 8, 9; Luke 7: 4, 5), from Cornelius (Acts 10: 1), from Sergius Paulus at Jerusalem, and from this man Julius. They could not deal with an uncondemned prisoner as they would with one whose undoubted crimes made him "worthy of death or of bonds." Thus Paul was always

AN HONORED PRISONER.

There is no doubt that God had blessed messages for the brethren of Sidon through His servant Paul, and they were as much, or more refreshed than he. Luke and Aristarchus took passage in the same ship with Paul, probably at their own expense; and Julius seems in no way to have objected to their accompanying him. The ship in which they sailed belonged to Adramyttium, which had probably brought a cargo from that port, situated on the shores of Asia Minor, to the south of Troas and Assos. This was hired for service of the government, and so became, for the time, a convict ship for the convey of prisoners to Rome.

The intended course of the vessel was close to the coasts of Asia. To sail close to shore was the ordinary navigation of those days, in which striking out to sea was generally thought too dangerous. But contrary winds, permitted by God, caused them instead to sail under Cyprus, from whence they sailed to Myra, on the south coast of Asia Minor, where they changed ships because the centurion found there a ship of Alexandria sailing into Italy. This served his purpose better, and thus prisoners, passengers, and cargo were transferred into it. But sailing in those days was no easy task—the compass was unknown. It was only by the stars at night, when it was clear, that the captain of a vessel could ascertain the direction which the ship was taking. In cloudy nights or fogs, and during the day when the sun was hidden, he had no guide.

They sailed slowly many days, the wind against them, and then at last sailed under Crete, over against Salomene, and later on to a place called the Fair Havens, near whereunto was the city of Lasea. How long this part of the voyage took we know not. The tour of the world is made now in about the time that it took Paul to get from Casarea to Rome. Were all his journeys thus tedious? Far from it. But now God had a purpose of mercy to those who sailed with Paul, and also to some needy ones whom he would meet with on his journey. God does not waste time, but His measure of time is other than ours. We think how much work we can accomplish in such a length of time, we being the economists of time and strength. The Lord, with whom a thousand years is as one day, and one day as a thousand years (II Pet. 3: 8), and who in His breath of eternity is the Strength of His people, thinks far otherwise. God's resources are inexhaustible. With Him that days and weeks shall slip by and no manifest work be done in the salvation of souls is no hindrance while He is occupied in just as in the forty years of Moses' sojourn in the desert, or the ten days' waiting of the hundred and twenty disciples before the outpouring of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost. That forty years of Moses' acquaintance with God was necessary to the deliverance from Egypt, and doubtless all the apparent loss of time in the life of Paul was necessary for the accomplishment of God's purposes in his future life and in his writings. "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work."

"And when much time was spent, and the voyage was now dangerous, because the fast" (Day of Atonement, late in the autumn) "was now past, Paul admonished them." In those infant days of navigation it was madness to set sail just at the time of year when much wind and storm might be expected. Such it was at this time, "and Paul said unto them, Sirs, I perceive that this voyage will be with hurt and much damage, not only of the lading and ship, but also of our lives." How did Paul perceive this? His experience as a traveller might count for something; but this was not the great thing. Paul, as a man filled with the Spirit, saw things in the light of God. "Nevertheless the centurion believed the master and owner of the ship, more than those things which were spoken by Paul. And because the haven was not commodious to winter in, the more part advised to depart thence also, if by any means they might attain unto Phenice, and there to winter."

This is just like man, following human reason rather than giving heed to a message from God. Men are satisfied to do the best for themselves, relying on their own judgment, which is so short-sighted, rather than on the judgment of God, who knows all things. The centurion would argue: "Of course the master and owner of the vessel will run no dangerous risks with the property in which his capital is sunk! And, after all, this Paul may have an interested motive in wanting to remain in this commodious haven." How few men really believe in God's overruling of weather, of seasons, of any of the natural laws which He has constituted, and which are kept in force by Him! So many think, act, speak, and write as though natural law was instead of being, as His creation, subject to Him.

A soft south wind encouraged the sailors to think that they had obtained their purpose, so they set sail close by the coast, when "there arose against it a tempestuous wind, called Euroclydon." Paul's prediction began to be accomplished. The sailors lost all power over the ship. With great difficulty they let down the boat and undergirded the ship, fearing doubtless that she would go to pieces. Notwithstanding this precaution, they dared carry no sail, and thus were driven at the mercy of the wind. To better matters, part of the cargo was cast into the sea, and finally also the tackling of the ship. Still, all looked very dark; the tempest continued to rage day and night, and the heavy clouds never broke so as to allow of sun or stars being seen, so that the course of the vessel was utterly unknown, and at last "all hope that we should be saved was then taken away." All hope in man, all hope in navigation, all hope in master and owner of the ship gone! What was Paul doing in this time of trial? He had been asking of God a great thing, the lives—probably the souls and bodies—of all who were in the ship.

AND GOD HAD ANSWERED HIM.

For his own safety Paul had no fear; he knew God's purposes regarding him, but he knew it was no accident which had shut him up in the ship with his fellow-passengers in this time of trial. So Paul dealt with God about it, them. "After long abstinence" [Rev. Ver.], "When they had been long without food," Paul stood forth in the midst of them, and said, "Sirs, ye should have hearkened unto me, and not have loosed from Crete, and to have gained this harm and loss. And now I exhort you to be of good cheer; for there shall be no loss of any man's life among you, but of the ship."

The ship's crew had already evidence enough that Paul was no dreamer, no fanatic; that which he had prophesied was come to pass, as the rocking and tossing of the dismantled ship was evidence, and thus they were more inclined to give weight to his message. Oh, how acceptable must have been his words of encouragement, "Be of good cheer," you have made a mistake, but there is hope! This is with the erring. Paul gave freely the grounds for what he said. "For there stood by me this night the angel of God, whose I am, and whom I serve, saying, Fear not, Paul; thou must be brought before Caesar; and lo, God hath given thee all them that sail with thee. Wherefore, sirs, be of good cheer; for I believe God, that it shall be even as it was told me." What a revelation it must have been to these men of the world that God was real, and that intercourse with Him was a reality! What a revelation of Christ in His people, that Paul, only a prisoner, as it seemed to them, should have cared so much for mere strangers as to seek and to obtain their safety from Him! How about those who sail with us? those who live in our houses, who work for us, etc.? Have we asked and obtained them from the Lord, so that He emboldens us to know assuredly that not one of them shall be lost? Whatever we ask in faith we have. It is most certainly His will that we should believe, not for ourselves only, but for our "house" also (Acts 16: 31), and claim salvation for each single member.

The Late MAJOR-GENERAL EARLE, Killed in the Soudan—The Wells at Gakdul.

THE LATE MAJOR-GENERAL EARLE.

Few wars of late years have been so remarkable as that in the Soudan for the large proportion of distinguished officers who have fallen in battle as compared with the rank and file. It has been a costly war for England. Some of the officers she has lost were men of whose skill and courage Englishmen have long been proud. They were men of high birth and considerable wealth, with experience gained in India and the Crimea, and with valor tested in many a hard-fought field. The Arabs appear to have singled them out for their attacks, doubtless noting the medals and orders they wore, with a sure instinct that to kill them would injure their foe far more than to kill a dozen of the less distinguished soldiers. Among the greatest of those who have thus fallen was General Earle, whose portrait is on the first page of this journal.

General Earle at the commencement of the operations in the Soudan was in command of the British forces at Alexandria. It was expected that he would have led the expedition for the relief of General Gordon; but as the difficulties of the enterprise became fully recognized by the government, the need of the most distinguished general in the British Army appeared imperative. Lord Wolsley was therefore sent out and placed in supreme command; but his most important subordinate and his second in command was General Earle.

The particular service in which General Earle met his death was an attempt to reach Berber, avenging on his way the cowardly murder of Colonel Stewart, who was decoyed into a hut and foully assassinated, not in fair fight, but by treachery, while on his way from Khartoum, where he had been General Gordon's companion, to the British headquarters. General Earle's force followed the Nile valley until they arrived at Berti, where they found the enemy occupying a strong position at the summit of a razor-backed ridge.

The British force consisted of the Black Watch and South Stafford regiments, two famous regiments, noted for their steadiness and courage. With them were a squadron of Hussars, two guns of Egyptian artillery, the Egyptian camel corps, and a section of the field hospital corps. The troops at once set to work to form a zereba. In the mean time the enemy fired several shots from the high hills. The British pickets advanced and drove back the Arabs, who had descended the hills to make an attack. Night ensued, and guards were posted.

Everything passed quietly during the night. On Tuesday morning, February 10th, the troops formed and advanced to the enemy's position, marching in two parallel columns. This was the first time in the campaign that the British took the offensive. Previously they had been the force attacked. Two companies of the South Stafford Regiment and two guns occupied the ground directly in front of the enemy to attract their attention. At eight o'clock the guns opened the attack, and for some time a desultory fire was maintained. In the mean time the main body of the British troops was advancing steadily over almost impracticable ground, pushing the enemy before them, and seizing each successive ridge by a short, determined rush. The forward movement was continued until the advanced troops reached the right rear of the enemy, which rested on the river. This completed the movement whereby the Mahdi's forces were surrounded. All that there remained to be captured was the little fort on the river bank. As the British column advanced, it was met by a steady and well-directed fire from behind sand and watlings which composed the Arab fort, and many men of the attacking party were killed. General Earle again ordered his men to charge, and put himself at the head of the column. He was killed during this charge by a bullet fired by a sharpshooter concealed in a hut. The fort was ultimately captured, but at a terrible cost. In addition to General Earle two colonels and nine men were killed and thirty-five men were wounded.

It is evident that this encounter was one of the fiercest in the campaign. That the general commanding the force and two colonels should be killed in an encounter wherein the total death-roll on the British side was but twelve, speaks much for the personal bravery of the officers, and indicates also the difficult character of the fight; for General Earle would assuredly not have exposed himself, as he must have done, had not the fighting been somewhat critical, and the necessity for his presence in the front urgent. The precision with which the general was shot, added to several incidents of the same kind that have occurred in the campaign, suggests that there are among the Mahdi's forces some crack shots, who pick off the officers as their particular and special prey. General Earle's strategy appears, however, to have been thoroughly well designed and successfully executed, the Arab camp being so surrounded that escape was impossible except by the desperate resort of swimming across the river; and Lord Wolsley's report says of the result: "Our success is complete. We have captured ten standards, and the whole of the position is in our hands." He adds to his despatch a few sorrowful words, showing how deeply he was touched by the death of General Earle.

The deceased officer was fifty-two years old, having been born May 18th, 1833. He was the third son of Sir Hardman Earle, Bart., of Allerton Tower, near Liverpool. He was educated at Harrow, and entered the army in 1851.

His first services were in the Crimea, at the battles of Alma and Inkerman, and the siege of Sebastopol, including the sortie of October 26th, and the assault on the Redan on June 18th, for which he obtained the medal with three clasps and the Order of Medjidieh. Exchanging into the Grenadier Guards, he acted as instructor of musketry and adjutant until 1863, when he became lieutenant-colonel.

He married, July 1st, 1864, Mary, second daughter of General Sir William J. Codrington, G.C.B., at one time commander-in-chief of the British forces in the Crimea. He leaves two daughters, Rachel and Grace. In 1870 he obtained his colonelcy, and was promoted major-general in 1880.

After filling military appointments at Gibraltar, in Canada, and in India, he was made, in 1882, brigadier-general to the expeditionary force sent to Egypt, and commanded the base and lines of communication. He was mentioned in despatches published in the Gazette of October 6th and November 2d of that year, and had the rare honor of being thanked by both Houses of Parliament.

THE GAKDUL WELLS.

In a former article we explained the importance of the wells in the desert to the British expedition in the Soudan. The picture on the first page gives an idea of the scene when the thirsty soldiers, wearied by their long journey over arid sands and under a broiling sun, reach the rocky basin in which are the Gakdul Wells. They are reached only by a circuitous path winding in and out of the rocks from below. They are on the road from Korti to Shendi, nearly midway between these two places, and in a desert almost entirely devoid of other water. For this reason possession of them was of the first necessity, in a strategical point of view, to Lord Wolsley's expedition, as without them it would be impossible to march a force across nearly two hundred miles of desert. The first step, therefore, after arriving at Korti was to secure the wells. General Sir Herbert Stewart was intrusted with this duty. He marched two thousand camels the one hundred miles from Korti to Gakdul at the rate of a little over thirty miles a day. Lord Wolsley's instructions to him were to leave four hundred of his men at Gakdul, where they were at once to entrench themselves; then to return with the remaining seven hundred to Korti, from whence, some days afterward, they advanced again, re-entranced, to Gakdul, and from that proceeded toward the Nile at Shendi. It should be added that these two thousand camels marched, with their riders, in five days, the whole of the two hundred miles, there and back, with a daily allowance of only two pints of water per man.

The mountains in which the wells are situated are absolutely destitute of vegetation. Dr. H. M. Field thus describes which he saw in his journey three years ago: "There is not one long chain, like the Pyrenees or the Apennines, of a general average height and form, but innumerable peaks, sharp and pointed, as if piercing the sky, while other summits are broad and dome-like, as if the very heavens might rest on the support of such 'everlasting hills.' And these mountains are unlike those of other countries in being more barren and desolate. I have seen mountains in all parts of the world, and have found in almost every case that they had some feature of beauty mingled with their ruggedness, which took away somewhat of their desolate character. However lofty their elevation, their lower sides were clothed with vegetation, which relieved their sterner aspect and softened their rugged grandeur. Not so here. They rise up abruptly from the plain, and as their substance is the hardest granite, which affords little support to vegetation, they have an aspect of savage desolation which I do not remember to have seen in the Alps or the Himalayas.

"Between these awful mountains, and winding round among them in countless turnings, are the Wadys. In studying the geography of the desert, the first lesson to be learned is to know what is meant by a Wady. Destitute as are these vast plains of water, yet at times they are swept by storms which furrow deep channels in the sand. The dry beds which they leave behind are Wadys. Several of these we crossed in which the half-dried mud showed that there had been recent rains."

It is appropriate in this place to quote the opinion of the distinguished traveller on

of this terrible campaign in the Soudan. A mistaken view has been industriously promulgated by ignorant newspaper writers in America, who, desiring to propitiate the Irish citizens, lose no opportunity of assailing England, whether she is right or wrong. Dr. Field, who has travelled over the whole of that region, and knows well the condition of the people there, thus writes of the work England is trying to do:

"As an American, I am not likely to be swayed from a sense of justice by the haughty English pride. What I say is the result of a good deal of reflection, aided by my own personal observations. The first question which an American who undertakes to offer an apology or defence for is sure to have thrown in his face, is 'What business have the English in the Soudan or in Egypt?' I answer: Suppose they have not any special rights, have they not the common rights of strangers in a foreign country, to go about their business or their pleasure, and to have the protection of the laws? But there was a time, and that not very long since—indeed, only a few weeks after I left Egypt—when I could not have gone about in safety; when quiet travellers like myself were killed in the streets of Alexandria by a mob—an outrage for which the government of Arabi Pasha made no reparation whatever, but showed, on the contrary, that it was in full sympathy with the murderers. Is it so very strange that, after waiting a whole month for some atonement for that fearful massacre, the English fleet should let the Arabs hear the roar of their guns?

"Beside this, it is a matter of vital necessity in that England should keep her hand on the Suez Canal, that great highway between the seas. This necessity abundantly justified England in landing an army, overthrowing Arabi, and occupying Cairo. But here, in my humble opinion, she made a fatal mistake—not in what she did, but that she did not do more; that in the stern necessity of the case she did not take Egypt absolutely, and make it at once and forever a part of the British Empire."

Dr. Field then shows that Egypt must be held and governed in peace with the Soudan hostile, and that the conquest of the Soudan was therefore a necessity. He thus concludes his argument: "The war, as it now stands, is a war between barbarism and civilization. Let England retreat now, and the Mahdi be uncontrolled and unchecked master of the Soudan, and Africa will be plunged into deeper darkness than before. The slave trade, which Livingstone called will be set running afresh, and the wail of the captive, the sighing of the bondman, will rise up again from all along the waters of the Upper Nile. This I cannot believe to be. With my religious faith, I cannot but feel that all this complication of affairs has been permitted by the Great Ruler of the world for some good to Africa; that in some way it will be a means of driving an entering wedge into the Dark Continent. Lord Salisbury says sneeringly in the House of Lords, that when England leaves the Soudan he hopes she will leave behind her some traces of her occupation besides the bones of her soldiers bleaching on the desert! The best way to leave a fit memorial of her presence, is not to give up the Soudan, but to hold it with a mighty hand; to take Khartoum, and keep the English flag flying over it; to build railroads across the desert, and put steamers on the Blue and the White Nile; and thus she may create a civilized State in the heart of Africa."

A DRUNKARD'S RESCUE.

The following typical case of the rescue of "a hopeless" inebriate may encourage Christian workers to persevere even after hope has been abandoned by the victim and the world.

George Manners was a drunkard at twenty-one. Of a nervous, susceptible, excitable temperament, not bodily strong, full of the enjoyment of pleasures such as ensnare dozens of young, ardent natures; fond of social pleasures; clever, witty, he was much sought after by those who, while delighting in his company, thought but little of the valuable life they were blighting.

George was the youngest son of a certain cricket-ball maker in Kent, England, and followed his father's trade when he followed any trade at all. More often than not, however he was away drinking, idling his time, breaking the heart of his stepmother, who loved him like a son, tormenting his friends with anxiety, torturing a favorite sister almost to distraction. At last his health failed. He was prostrated in delirium tremens, and his life almost despaired of. All grieved over the fate of one so young, so sadly straying; even those most harsh in their judgment sorrowed that a bright young spirit should be quenched so early, and many prayers ascended for his recovery. They were heard. George rallied, appeared among his old associates like the ghost of his former self, went back to his work, and again fell under the influence of his old enemy.

It seemed that nothing could save him. The prayers of a goodly father, who some time before had entered into his rest, the patience and pleading of his mother and sisters, the love of one who had consented to share his sorrows and joys with him by and by, all seemed of no avail. He was killing himself by drink. He knew it. His friends knew it. But who could save him? The prayers which constantly found an entrance into the ear and heart of a sympathizing God appeared at that time to be utterly disregarded. Matters grew worse and worse. At last the village was startled by tidings that in a wretched state of madness George Manners had left his home, scarcely clothed sufficiently to protect his weak, trembling body from the cold, and had gone none knew whither.

The weary search for him which followed interested all who knew him. Some days passed. At length came a letter. He had enlisted in his insanity, had now come to himself, and piteously begged to be set free. His friends had no means; if they had had they would all have been gone ere this; his prodigality would have wasted them. But in her situation as lady's-maid one who loved him heard of his distress, and, woman-like, gave all her little store to release him, and then gave herself to be the magnet which she hoped would draw him home and keep him there. Poor thing! in a year from that time she stood waiting at the door of a liquor saloon, a fortnight-old baby in her arms, waiting to lead her husband home. Such a home, too! What that little fair, frail creature endured it would be heartrending to describe. Not that George was brutal, he never would be that; but he was simply starving her and ruining his soul, and that nearly broke her heart.

All who knew George said his case was beyond hope, unless he gave up the drink, and that seemed to be the thing farthest from his mind, until God Himself in mercy interfered.

Mr. T., a well-known and much-loved speaker, was preaching in George's native village, and for some reason George went to hear him. While there his wretched and critical state came so forcibly to his mind that he was in an agony. His wife, too, seated by his side, seemed to partake of his anxiety of soul, and both bowed together, seeking the Lord who "receiveth sinners."

Of course serious questions arose in many minds as to whether George would "stand," but he leaned with all his falling strength tremblingly but trustingly on the Lord Himself, and comfort and peace and happiness floweth in, changing a dwelling to a home.

THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

By the Right Rev. Bishop Fallows, of the Reformed Episcopal Church.

A LECTURE DELIVERED IN ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, CHICAGO, MARCH 15TH, 1885.

"CAN ye not discern the signs of the times?" was the question," said Dr. Fallows, "Christ addressed to the Pharisees, who were wise in foretelling the weather by the signs in the sky, and their voluntary ignorance in not being able to discern the coming of the Messiah and the establishment of Christ's kingdom upon the earth. They were blind to the teachings which were so unique and sublime, and His miracles, so numerous and mighty, had not for them the meaning which they conveyed to the observant mind. They did not discern in the events about them that first predicted coming. So the best commentators in applying this passage to the affairs of to-day think that men who are wise on the plane of business and politics and literature and the history of nations do not discern the manifest signs of the equally-predicted second coming of Christ.

"The leading minds of the church are by no means agreed as to what that second coming and the end of the world signify. The notion that this end of the world means the literal destruction of the world is now pretty much abandoned. It is in general held to mean the end of the present economy. At its close the Lord Jesus Christ is to come again in His glorified personality and accomplish all the magnificent prophecies declared by Him regarding His relations to His friends and to His foes.

"Without following any school of religious thought to the extreme of its position, we may hold, and must hold, fast to the

in His divine majesty of the once crucified but now glorified and forever incarnate Son of God. We must, as firm believers in the inspired Scriptures, hold the idea that the divine providence is continually carrying forward the plans and purposes of God; that all history is the prophetic fulfilment of the prophetic utterances of the sages and seers and writers of the Old and New Testaments. The events of to-day are as full of meaning as the events of eighteen hundred or three thousand years ago. Men who are not fanatics, but thoughtful and learned and conservative as any leaders of opinion the church can claim, read in the signs about us the speedy coming of the catastrophe of this present dispensation and the comparatively immediate coming again, in a personal form, of the Saviour and ruler of mankind.

HISTORY IS LUMINOUS

with its hints and presagings. Its lines are convergent to one grand, predestined end. The divine hand is seen shifting the marvellous panorama of the ages at the time and in the manner laid down in His revealed truth. One sign is the possession of Egypt by England. The prophecy, which must be fulfilled, gives the sway over that land and the country beyond it to the power which represents, as no other can, the sceptre of the house of Israel.

"Another sign is

before the cross. A spasmodic effort, like the one which has been made by the false prophet, will not delay, but rather accelerate, the utter downfall of the Mohammedan power. The great Euphrates of this system shall rapidly dry up, while the river of God, which is full of water fed from eternal springs, shall roll in its ever-deepening and ever-widening currents, and make everything live wherever it cometh.

"Another sign is earthquakes and pestilences and famine. These, it is true, have taken place in all periods, but that does not rob them of their significance when they are taken in connection with other manifestations. Rarely have such earthquakes visited the world as have been recently felt in Italy. The pestilence that walketh in darkness has been scourging the cities of the remote east and of the continent, and now, like a tiger in its lair, is waiting to prey upon us. Famine, a very few years ago, almost depopulated the remaining portion of that great empire of Persia, which was once almost mistress of the world. "Another sign is that and the love of many shall wax cold. That iniquity does abound is too apparent to be long dwelt upon. The outcry against it is continually heard. The love of money and the love of pleasure divide the empire of the hearts of millions of our fellow-men. The few are amassing fortunes never dreamed of in the days of old. Private citizens are piling up wealth which monarchs of vast provinces never were able to gather together. Moneyed corporations have been bidding defiance to common law, statute law, and the laws of political economy. This wealth of private persons has been acquired in many cases by unjust methods. The toiling masses have been compelled by the imperfect adjustment of affairs to assist in building up these colossal fortunes of the favored few.

INCREASED CHRISTIAN EFFORT.

"And yet another sign, seemingly the opposite of all these, is that the Gospel is being preached or proclaimed as never before in the history of the Christian Church. More money is given for missionary work, more missionaries are supported in the various foreign fields, than at any other period. More benevolent and philanthropic movements connected with the spread of the Gospel have been begun in our day than in any other century. The whole world is now being opened to the hearing of the Gospel. It would seem as though in the last decade the last stronghold of heathenism had been taken. The heart of Africa, that mysterious land, for all the ages past the terra incognita of the civilized world, has been opened up to Christianity, commerce, and civilization by the noble band of explorers, among whom Livingstone and Stanley stand at the head. For the first time has the Gospel the opportunity to penetrate into the midst of that heathen darkness. The lecturer did not wonder that reverent and thoughtful students of the divine word had dwelt upon these facts as signs of the second coming of the Son of Man."

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached last Sunday, March 29, 1885.

"But when the children of Israel cried unto the Lord, the Lord raised them up a deliverer, Ehud the son of Gera, a Benjamite, a man left-handed: and by him the children of Israel sent a present unto Eglon the king of Moab."—JUDGES 3:15.

EHUD was a ruler in Israel. He was left-handed, and, what was peculiar about the tribe of Benjamin, to which he belonged, there were in it seven hundred left-handed men; and yet so dexterous had they all become in the use of the left hand, that the Bible says they could sling stones at a hair's-breadth, and not miss.

Well, there was a king by the name of Eglon, who was an oppressor of Israel. He imposed upon them a most outrageous tax. Ehud, the man of whom I first spoke, had a divine commission to destroy that oppressor. He came, pretending that he was going to pay the tax, and asked to see King Eglon. He was told he was in the summer-house, the place to which the king retired when it was too hot to sit in the palace. This summer-house was a place surrounded by flowers, and trees, and springing fountains, and warbling birds. Ehud entered the summer-house, and said to King Eglon that he had a secret errand with him. Immediately all the attendants were waved out of the royal presence. King Eglon rises up to receive the messenger. Ehud, the left-handed man, puts his left hand to his right side, pulls out a dagger, and thrusts Eglon through until the haft went in after the blade. Eglon falls. Ehud comes forth to blow a trumpet of recruit amid the mountains of Ephraim; and a great host is marshalled, and proud Moab submits to the conqueror, and Israel is free. So, O Lord, let all thine enemies perish! So, O Lord, let all thy friends triumph!

THEIR POWER.

I. I learn, first, from this subject, the power of left-handed men. There are some men who, by physical organization, have as much strength in their left hand as in their right hand; but there is something in the writing of this text which implies that Ehud had some defect in his right hand, which compelled him to use the left. Oh, the power of left-handed men! Genius is often self-observant, careful of itself, not given to much toil, burning incense to its own aggrandizement; while many a man, with no natural endowments, actually defective in physical and mental organization, has an earnestness for the right, a patient industry, an all-consuming perseverance, which achieve marvels for the kingdom of Christ. Though left-handed as Ehud, they can strike down a sin as great and imperial as Eglon.

I have seen men of wealth gathering about them all their treasures, snuffing at the cause of a world lying in wickedness, roughly ordering Lazarus off their door-step, sending their dogs, not to lick his sores, but to hound him off their premises; catching all the pure rain of God's blessing into the stagnant, rosy, frog-inhabited pool of their own selfishness—right-handed men worse than useless—while many a man, with large heart and little pulse, has, out of his limited means, made poverty leap for joy, and started an influence that overspans the grave, and will swing round and round the throne of God, world without end. Amen.

THEIR ACHIEVEMENTS.

Ah me, it is high time that you left-handed men, who have been longing for this gift, and that eloquence, and the other man's wealth, should take your left hand out of your pockets. Who made all these railroads? Who set up all these cities? Who started all these churches, and schools, and asylums? Who has done the tugging, and running, and pulling? Men of no wonderful endowments, thousands of them acknowledging themselves to be left-handed, and yet they were earnest, and yet they were determined, and yet they were triumphant.

THEIR PERSEVERANCE.

But I do not suppose that Ehud, the first time he took a sling in his left hand, could throw a stone a hair's-breadth, and not miss. I suppose it was practice that gave him the wonderful dexterity. Go forth to your spheres of duty, and be not discouraged if, in your first attempts, you miss the mark. Ehud missed it. Take another stone, put it carefully into the sling, swing it around your head, take better aim, and the next time you will strike the centre.

The first time a mason rings his trowel upon the brick, he does not expect to put up a perfect wall. The first time a carpenter sends the plane over a board, or drives a bit through a beam, he does not expect to make perfect execution. The first time a boy attempts a rhyme, he does not expect to chime a "Lalla Rookh" or a "Lady of the Lake." Do not be surprised if, in your first efforts at doing good, you are not very largely successful. Understand that usefulness is an art, a science, a trade.

There was

performing a very difficult operation on the human eye. A young doctor stood by and said, "How easily you do that; it don't seem to cause you any trouble at all." "Ah," said the old oculist, "it is very easy now, but I spoiled a hatful of eyes to learn that." Be not surprised if it takes some practice before we can help men to moral eyesight, and bring them to a vision of the cross. Left-handed men, to the work! Take the Gospel for a sling, and faith and repentance for the smooth stone from the brook; take sure aim, God direct the weapon, and great Goliaths will tumble before you.

When Garibaldi was going out to battle, he told his troops what he wanted them to do, and after he had described what he wanted them to do, they said, "Well, general, what are you going to give us for all this?" "Well," he replied, "I don't know what else you will get, but you will get hunger, and cold, and wounds, and death. How do you like it?" His men stood before him for a little while in silence, and then they threw up their hands and cried, we are the men!" The Lord Jesus Christ calls you to His service. I do not promise you an easy time in this world. You may have persecutions, and trials, and misrepresentations; but afterward there comes an eternal weight of glory, and you can bear the wounds, and the bruises, and the misrepresentations, if you can have the reward afterward. Have you not enough enthusiasm to cry out, "We are the men! We are the men!"

WE ARE THE MEN!

II. I learn also from this subject the danger of WORLDLY ELEVATION.

This Eglon was what the world called a great man. There were hundreds of people who would have considered it the greatest honor of their life just to have him speak to them; yet although he is so high up in worldly position, he is not beyond the reach of Ehud's dagger. I see a great many people trying to climb up in social position, having an idea that there is a safe place somewhere far above, not knowing that the mountain of fame has a top like Mont Blanc, covered with perpetual snow.

We laugh at the children of Shinar for trying to build a tower that could reach to the heavens; but I think, if our eye-sight were only good enough, we could see a Babel in many a doorway. Oh,

THE STRUGGLE IS FIERCE!

It is store against store, house against house, street against street, nation against nation. The goal for which men are running is chairs, and chandeliers, and mirrors, and houses, and lands, and presidential equipments. If they get what they anticipate, what have they got? Men are not safe from calamity while they live, and, worse than that, they are not safe after they are dead; for I have seen swine root up grave-yards.

One day a man goes up into publicity, and the world does him honor, and people climb up into sycamore-trees to watch him as he passes, and, as he goes along on the shoulders of the people, there is a waving of hats and a wild huzza. To-morrow the same man is caught between the jaws of the printing-press and mangled and bruised, and the very same persons who applauded him before cry, "Down with the traitor! down with him!"

Belshazzar sits at the feast, the mighty men of Babylon sitting all around him. Wit sparkles like the wine, and the wine like the wit. Music rolls up among the chandeliers; the chandeliers flash down on the decanters. The breath of hanging gardens floats in on the night air; the voice of revelry floats out. Amid wreaths, and tapestry, and folded banners a finger writes. The march of a host is heard on the stairs. Laughter catches in the throat. A thousand hearts stop beating. The blow is struck. The blood on the floor is richer-hued than the wine on the table. The kingdom has departed.

Belshazzar was no worse, perhaps, than hundreds of people in Babylon, but his position slew him. Oh, be content with just such a position as God has placed you in! It may not be said of us, "He was a great general," or "He was an honored chieftain," or "He was mighty in worldly attainments," but this thing may be said of you and of me, "He was a good citizen, a faithful Christian, a friend of Jesus." And that in the last day will be the highest of all eulogiums.

III. I learn further from this subject that

DEATH COMES TO THE SUMMER-HOUSE.

Eglon did not expect to die in that fine place. Amidst all the flower-leaves that drifted like summer snow into the window; in the tinkle and dash of the fountains; in the sound of a thousand leaves fluting on one tree-branch; in the cool breeze that came up to shake feverish trouble out of the king's locks—there was nothing that spake of death, but there he died! In the winter, when the snow is a shroud, and when the wind is a dirge, it is easy to think of our mortality; but when the weather is pleasant, and all our surroundings are agreeable, how difficult it is for us to appreciate the truth that we are mortal! And yet my text teaches that death does sometimes come to the summer-house.

and cannot see the leaves. He is deaf, and cannot hear the fountains. Oh, if death would ask us for victims, we could point him to hundreds of people who would rejoice to have him come. Push back the door of that hovel. Look at that little child—cold, and sick, and hungry. It has never heard the name of God but in blasphemy. Parents intoxicated, staggering around its straw bed. Oh, Death, there is a mark for thee! Up with it into the light! Before those little feet stumble on life's pathway, give them rest.

Here is an aged man. He has done his work. He has done it gloriously. The companions of his youth all gone, his children dead, he longs to be at rest, and wearily the days and the nights pass. He says, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." Oh, Death, there is a mark for thee! Take from him the staff, and give him the sceptre! Up with him into the light, where eyes never grow dim, and the hair whitens not through the long years of eternity. Ah! Death will not do that. Death turns back from the straw bed, and from the aged man ready for the skies, and comes to the summer-house.

What doest thou here, thou bony, ghastly monster, amidst this waving grass, and under this sunlight sifting through the tree-branches? Children are at play. How quickly their feet go, and their locks toss in the wind. Father and mother stand at the side of the room looking on, enjoying their glee. It does not seem possible that the wolf should ever break into that fold and carry off a lamb. Meanwhile an old archer stands looking through the thicket. He points his arrow at

THE BRIGHTEST OF THE GROUP

—he is a sure marksman—the bow bends, the arrow speeds! Hush now. The quick feet have stopped, and the locks toss no more in the wind. Laughter has gone out of the hall. Death in the summer-house!

Here is a father in mid-life; his coming home at night is the signal for mirth. The children rush to the door, and there are books on the evening stand, and the hours pass away on glad feet. There is nothing wanting in that home. Religion is there, and sacrifices on the altar morning and night. You look in that household, and say, "I cannot think of anything happier. I do not really believe the world is so sad a place as some people describe it to be." The scene changes. Father is sick. The doors must be kept shut. The death-watch chirps dolefully on the hearth. The children whisper, and walk softly where once they romped. Passing the house late at night, you see the quick glancing of lights from room to room. It is all over! Death in the summer-house!

AN AGED MOTHER

—aged, but not infirm. You think you will have the joy of caring for her wants a good while yet. As she goes from house to house, to children and grandchildren, her coming is a dropping of sunlight in the dwelling. Your children see her coming through the lane, and they cry, "Grandmother's come!" Care for you has marked up her face with many a deep wrinkle, and her back stoops with carrying your burdens. Some day she is very quiet. She says she is not sick, but something tells you you will not much longer have a mother. She will sit with you no more at the table, nor at the hearth. Her soul goes out so gently, you do not exactly know the moment of its going. Fold the hands that have done so many kindnesses for you right over the heart that has beat with love toward you since before you were born. Let the pilgrim rest. She is weary. Death in the summer-house!

Gather about us what we will of comfort and luxury, when comes he does not stop to look at the architecture of the house before he comes in; nor, entering, does he wait to examine the pictures we have gathered on the wall; or, bending over your pillow, he does not stop to see whether there is color in the cheek, or gentleness in the eye, or intelligence in the brow. But what of that? Must we stand forever mourning among the graves of our dead? No! No! The people in Bengal bring cages of birds to the graves of their dead, and then they open the cages, and the birds go singing heavenward. So I would bring to the graves of your dead to-night all bright thoughts and congratulations, and bid them sing of victory and redemption. I stamp on the bottom of the grave, and it breaks through into the light and the glory of heaven.

The ancients used to think that the straits entering the Red Sea were very dangerous places, and they supposed that every ship that went through those straits would be destroyed, and they were in the habit of putting on weeds of mourning for those who had gone on that voyage, as though they were actually dead. Do you know what they called those straits? They called them

THE "GATE OF TEARS."

Oh, I stand to-night at the gate of tears through which many of your loved ones have gone, and I want to tell you that all are not shipwrecked that have gone through those straits into the great ocean stretching out beyond. The sound that comes from that other shore on still nights when we are wrapped in prayer makes me think that the departed are not dead.

WE ARE THE DEAD—

we who toll; we who weep; we who sin—we are the dead. How my heart aches for human sorrow! this sound of breaking hearts that I hear all about me! this last look of faces that never will brighten again! this last kiss of lips that never will speak again! this widowhood and orphanage! oh, when will the day of sorrow be gone!

After the sharpest winter, the spring dismounts from the shoulder of a southern gale and puts its warm hand upon the earth, and in its palm there comes the grass, and there come the flowers, and God reads over the poetry of bird, and brook, and bloom, and pronounces it very good. What, my friends, if every winter had not its spring, and every night its day, and every gloom its glow, and every bitter now its sweet hereafter! If you have been on the sea, you know, as the ship passes in the night, there is left behind it; and as the waters roll up, they toss with unimaginable splendor. Well, across this great ocean of human trouble Jesus walks. Oh, that in the phosphorescent track of His feet we might all follow and be illumined!

There was a gentleman in a rail-car who saw in that same car of very different circumstances. The first was a maniac. He was carefully guarded by his attendants; his mind, like a ship dismasted, was beating against a dark, desolate coast, from which no help could come. The train stopped, and the man was taken out into the asylum, to waste away, perhaps, through years of gloom. The second passenger was a culprit. The outraged law had seized on him. As the cars jolted, the chains rattled. On his face were crime, depravity, and despair. The train halted, and he was taken out to the penitentiary, to which he had been condemned. There was the third passenger, under far different circumstances. She was a bride. Every hour was gay as a marriage bell. Life glittered and beckoned. Her companion was taking her to his father's house. The train halted. The old man was there to welcome her to her new home, and his white locks snowed down upon her as he sealed his word with a father's kiss.

Quickly we fly toward eternity. We will soon be there. Some leave this life condemned culprits. They refused a pardon, they carry their chains. Oh, may it be with us, that, leaving this fleeting life for the next, we may find our Father ready to greet us to our new home with Him forever. That will be a marriage banquet! Father's welcome! Father's bosom! Father's kiss! Heaven! Heaven!

Dr. Talmage, Referring to the President's nominations at his weekly talk on Friday evening last, said: "The President is actually embarrassed by the richness of the material he has to draw from. During the last week men who have never been thought of before have been selected to fill important offices, and both parties clap their hands and cry 'well done.' Never before was there so much good breeding, so much knowledge, so much sobriety at our nation's Capitol as there is now. Our politics are growing purer, our civilization is growing higher because of the elevating character of the literature of the present day. And it is only a fitting recognition of what our literary men have done that the President should have appointed one of them as Minister to Turkey. There, in his palace on the banks of the Bosphorus," said the speaker, in conclusion, "Mr. S. S. Cox will continue his literary work and make the world happier by the products of his brain. Because of a picturesque description of a sunset in France which he once wrote he has been called 'Sunset' Cox. But now, in view of the new life opened out before him by President Cleveland's wisdom, I rechristen him. His name shall no longer be Sunset, but it shall be Sunrise Cox."

The Prohibitionists of Kansas are Preparing to enforce the stringent law passed by the Legislature last session for the better observance of the amendment to the Constitution. The law went into effect on March 14th. Dispatches from various points indicate that the saloon men are divided as to what stand they will take. Some are defiant but others have gone out of business. In Atchison the county-attorney gave notice that all saloons or wholesalers of liquor doing business on and after Monday, March 23d, would be prosecuted under the law. It is believed that this action will settle the saloon business, so far as the city is concerned. The managers of the different railroad and transportation companies have issued circular letters calling the attention of their agents to that section of the new law which provides that any officer, agent, or employé of any railroad, express company, or common carrier who knowingly delivers any intoxicating liquor to any person in the State shall be fined from $100 to $500 and imprisoned from thirty to sixty days. This has resulted in the stoppage of liquor shipments. The city of Topeka boasts that it has not a single open saloon, that seventeen liquor dealers are in prison for violating the law, and that $12,500 has been paid into the county school fund from fines collected from saloon-keepers.

A Bride is the Latest Victim of Monte Carlo gambling. The Paris correspondent of the London Times writes: "The death of another victim of Monte Carlo has to be recorded. A clerk in a large counting-house in Germany was spending his honeymoon in Italy, and received a sum worth $8000 in payment of a bill due to his employers. On his way back he stopped at Monte Carlo, and, fearing its temptations, entrusted the money to his wife's custody. He was called away for a time, and found, on his return, that his wife was missing. He made inquiries to no purpose. At last he learned that a young woman, after losing a large sum at the gaming tables, had thrown herself into the sea. The bride, it appeared, had entered the Casino from curiosity, had staked some small sums, and then, egged on by women believed to have been stationed there for the purpose, had lost everything. The Casino authorities had ordered the affair to be kept secret, and, but for one of the officials being touched by the husband's anguish, the young man might never have known what had become of his wife. As it is, the interested advocates of Monte Carlo will probably deny the whole story."

Last Struggle of Mohammedanism.—Referring to affairs in the Sudan, and the reported advance of the Mahdi with forty thousand men, the London Rock remarks: "The end of the Mohammedan rebellion is not likely to come just yet. If the records of prophetic announcements are to be taken into consideration, it would seem that this movement is the last expiring effort of the followers of the false prophet who has for centuries exercised such sway over the Eastern population. If prophecy be interpreted according to the views of Bishop Newton and men of his school, it would appear that Popery and Mohammedanism are to lose their temporal power before the time of the end. This revolution looks very like the final break-up of Mohammedan power. Our rulers had evidently a very insufficient knowledge of the programme of the future in Egypt, judging from the rash promises as to the almost immediate withdrawal of our troops from that country after the battle of Tel-el-Kebir. There seems every probability that England is destined to play a very conspicuous part in this African campaign. It is very doubtful if she will ever leave Egypt without the occupation of our troops. In fact, England will probably be compelled to establish a protectorate over that country."

THE YOUNG LIONS IN PROPHECY.

In the course of an address recently delivered in London the Rev. Henry E. Brooke referred to the critical condition of English foreign affairs. He called attention to the unexpected offers made to the British Government by India, Australia, Canada, and other English colonies of military assistance in the event of war with Russia and the existing war in the Soudan. He dwelt on the spontaneous character of those offers as an evidence of identity of feeling and a remarkable fulfilment of prophecy. In the course of his address he said:

"I have been very much struck by the critical CHARACTER OF THE TIMES in which we live, and their evident connection with God's purposes. Who would have supposed that England—I believe I may say very much against her will—would have been involved in a war of this sort in Africa, and in this particular part of Africa? It seems to me that we are engaged in this war against our own will and against the will of our rulers. We have been obliged to go to war, to make war on this great power; a great power, which is a religious power, not a political power; and a religious power which has great influence in India, and which may be used, we know not how extensively, in bringing about God's purposes with regard to the Jews.

"At this critical time one cannot help seeing how Russia is involved, and from Ezek. 38 we find that Russia has largely to do with the events of the future. You are aware that the word rendered 'chief' is Rosh, or in modern language Russia, while Meshech and Tubal seem to be identified with Muscovy and Tobolsk, and that the power thus indicated is to come up against Israel. Now I had my attention called yesterday to

A CURIOUS ILLUSTRATION which has just appeared, with no prophetic allusion, of a statement in the chapter. We read, in verse 13, that when the Prince or Rosh comes up to take a spoil, 'Sheba, and Dedan, and the merchants of Tarshish, with all the young lions thereof, shall say unto him, Art thou come to take a spoil?' I think all interpreters are agreed that Tarshish means England, and that 'the merchant' is an allusion to the commercial character of our country; but what about 'the young lions thereof'? It has been timidly suggested it might mean our colonies; but there was this difficulty, nobody would have supposed our colonies would have mixed themselves up with our wars. What, however, have we seen? The colonies throwing in their lot with England in the war in the Soudan.

"And now for the unexpected illustration. In Punch's cartoon for this week, prepared, we may feel sure, without any thought of prophecy, England is represented as a lion, looking on at a number of young lions being drilled as soldiers. The lion is our national symbol, and here we have in the natural language of symbol the very truth expressed in Ezek. 38: 13—England, 'the merchants of Tarshish,' and her colonies 'the young lions thereof.'

THE QUESTION, that addressed by England to Russia. Lord Granville's first inquiry was as to the meaning of the Russian advance into Afghanistan. He demanded to be informed what was the design of the movement, and whether it indicated an intention on the part of Russia to annex the country.—'Art thou come to take a spoil?' I only mention this as a by-way illustration of how prophetic events are being fulfilled in these days.

Meanwhile these events seem to say to us, it becometh us to be upon the watch-tower. While, therefore, we have specially in view at such a time the critical condition of things, the critical state of our soldiers and sailors in the East, and while we are praying for them, do not let us forget to pray that the people of God may be stirred up to use the opportunity afforded them of being to the nation around as a river that maketh glad the desert places of the earth, so that we may make glad in every sense of the word. We pray there may be a blessed result from such a state of things, while we also pray our rulers may be guided aright, and that the present unbelieving age may be taught to know there is a God who ruleth in the earth, even while they are so ready to reject Him.

"And in the midst of all let us hear the words, 'Be still and know that I am God: I will be exalted among the heathen, I will be exalted in the earth. The Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge.'

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

How Luther Taught his Children.—The Rev. Mr. Stewart said at a recent meeting: "Luther used to teach his children to read the Bible in the following way: First, to read through one book carefully, then to study chapter by chapter, and then verse by verse, and lastly word by word, for, he said, 'It is like a person shaking a fruit tree. First shaking the tree and gathering up the fruit which falls to the ground, and then shaking each branch and afterward each twig of the branch, and last of all looking carefully under each leaf to see that no fruit remains. In this way, and in no other, shall we also find the hidden treasures that are in the Bible.'

Pawning a New Testament.—The Rev. Mr. Gault said: "I know of a Jew who keeps a pawnbroker's shop. One day a woman in straitened circumstances came in with a beautifully bound New Testament, for which, in return, he gave her money, and told her that she could redeem it at any time she wished. The Jew, for some reason or other, began to read the New Testament, and probably he had never seen one before, and as he read he became intensely interested. He read it again and again, and was convinced of its truth. In this wonderful way God blessed it to the Jew's conversion. He accepted Jesus of Nazareth as the promised Messiah and his own personal Saviour, and realized peace."

An Invalid's Marked Bible.—A Minister of the Gospel related: "I lately heard of a woman who was ill, and when her minister went to see her he lifted her Bible to read a portion of the Scripture, and when he opened it he noticed several verses through the Bible with a T and a P placed before them. He inquired of her the meaning of this, and she answered him thus: 'Whenever I am in trouble or distress I open my Bible, and look for one of God's promises suitable for the occasion, and take it to Him, and tell Him that I believe it because He has said it, and T. P. means tried and proved.' Dear friends, when we ask anything of the Lord, let us see that it is in accordance with the conditions on which He has promised to answer our prayers, and if we prove that it is so, be sure that the Lord will answer it. "Ye have not because ye ask not, or because ye ask amiss." "Whatsoever ye ask the Father in my name, I will do it."

Stealing Eggs for Mother.—The Rev. Mr. Ross said: "I knew a woman who, in temporal things, was in poor and very needy circumstances, and oftentimes had to go without food. Her eldest son, who loved his mother dearly, was walking through a field when he came upon a number of eggs in a corn stack. 'Ah, he thought, 'mother is ill just now, and she is not having enough of food; I am sure she would like these,' and, so thinking, he spread his handkerchief on the ground and lifted the eggs carefully into it. With a swift and light step he turned homeward, and did not stop until he had crossed the threshold of his humble home, and joyfully spread out the contents of his handkerchief before his mother. She quietly looked him straight in the face, and not a single word did she utter; but that look plainly said, 'Charlie, did you steal them?' That look was enough; he needed no more. With flushed face and tears starting into his eyes, Charlie tied them up again and hurriedly returned to the field, and replaced them in the cornstack from which he had taken them. Charlie says he would never forget the look which his mother gave him; it did him more good than any angry words could have done."

A Man with a Rope Round his Neck.—An earnest evangelist said: "I knew a young man who was much given to indulgence in strong drink. I have lifted him again and again out of the street helplessly intoxicated. He sank so low at last that his nearest friends refused to have anything to do with him. About two years ago he was found with a rope round his neck, intending to put an end to his life, and would undoubtedly have done so had it not been for a friend providentially coming upon him, and hindering the sinful act. So thankful was he afterward for being thus detained from becoming his own murderer that he gave himself body and soul to the Lord and His work, and through his heaven-blessed instrumentality, many to this day are flocking into the kingdom of the Saviour."

A Band of Foolhardy Skaters.—A Minister said: "In Philadelphia, United States, about three years ago, during a keen frost, hundreds of young men were on a skating pond. A hole was made in the ice so as to warn them of danger when it should come. The ice began to crack round the hole, but the excited skaters did not seem to be aware of their danger, until some one with authority stepped on to the ice, telling them to leave the pond at once, because in a few minutes the ice would give way beneath them. 'Just another round before we leave it,' shouted a merry voice. Hundreds took warning and left the pond, but many followed their leader for 'just another round.' It was only another round, but a round too many; all who stayed on the pond fell through and perished. There are some people who think they will take just another round of the pleasures of the world; but, friends, it may be a round too many, and you may be lost. 'To-day if you will hear His voice, harden not your hearts.'"

Climbing out of a Deep Pit.—Mr. Jack said: "A man was very anxious about his soul. Night and day he continued crying, 'Who shall deliver me? Who is able to deliver?' What is not made plain in the visions of day, God sometimes makes plain in the visions of night. This man dreamed one night that he was in a deep pit, and tried to climb up the slippery walls. At length, after many vain attempts, he caught sight of a bright star in the sky. Fixing his eyes on the star, he again tried to climb the slippery sides; but now he kept his eyes fixed on the star, and not on the darkness around him. He was but a very short distance from the top, when he took his eyes from the star for one moment, and looked down to see how far he had ascended, and at once he fell to the bottom of the pit. He now saw it was by taking his eyes from that bright star that he had fallen; and again going up, resolving to keep his eyes on the star, he safely reached the top. He awoke, and knew now what was the reason of his not obtaining deliverance. It was by not keeping his eyes on the great Light of the world, and very soon he found peace and pardon by looking simply with the eye of faith to Jesus."

A Mother and her Runaway Son.—A Well-known worker in Christ's vineyard said: "One night I went down to the railway station and got into a carriage. I sat down beside a woman who was bitterly weeping. Her son, a young man, was standing at the carriage window, bidding his mother good-by. On our journey I learned part of that woman's history. She belonged to Ireland, and had come to the metropolis to see her son. She told me that one day in the old country her son told her that he was going out to make some purchases, but he never returned, and she knew nothing of where he had gone. Some time afterward she heard through a friend where he was, and obtaining his address, she had written to him several times, but received no reply. The poor mother's heart yearned after her son, and she made up her mind to leave her home and seek for him.

erself. When her brother heard of it he said, 'I will go instead of you.' 'Go instead of me!' he rejoined. 'No; I will go and seek for my own boy myself, until I find him.' And she sought for him until she did find him. I said to her, 'And will he not come home with you?' No, she said, 'He will not return with me, and again the tears began to flow. That just illustrates what Jesus has done for you. At first he Lord sent message after message to His rebellious children, but they paid no attention until Jesus said, 'I will go myself and seek the lost.' And He came, and suffered and died that we might live, and yet many, like the young man, will not go with Him.'

THE OBSERVANCE OF LENT.

By Rev. George D. Hultz.

PART OF A SERMON DELIVERED IN THE SOUTH BUSHWICK REFORMED CHURCH, BROOKLYN, MARCH 15TH, 1885.

Increased Observance in America—The Early Churches—Origin of the Fast—Its Theoretical Design—Its Spiritual Influence—The Average not Raised—Reduced by Excesses before and after the Reformation—Spiritual—More Outward Observance Worthless—A Lenten Life—How Christ Fasted—Better Things.

RELIGIOUS observances in the matter of church days and fasts have in this country in the main gone in two lines. On the one side they have been altogether neglected, and on the other side have been strictly observed. On the side of those who observe are especially the Roman Catholics, the Greek Church, Lutherans, and Episcopalians; and on the other side are the main portion of the great Protestant bodies—the Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Baptists, Methodists, and Reformed churches.

The first strong religious force in our country was the Puritan element. They were people who not only had convictions, but they were aggressive in their faith, and they made New England their own, religiously speaking, and have never ceased to exert an influence in the line of their beliefs over the whole North. Then came the Presbyterian element, as positive in their convictions and no less aggressive than the Puritans. They spread themselves more or less over the whole country, South as well as North, and carried on and to a great extent nationalized the non-observance of holy feasts and fasts.

THE MODERN ATTITUDE.

But a great change has been taking place. The Roman Catholics, in a few years, by immigration (not by conversion) have become a mighty multitude, and they have their churches, and follow their customs in every city and hamlet the country over. The Episcopalians have, for various reasons easy to see, become the church of social standing, as Congregationalists and Presbyterians have been and are yet the churches of the intellect, and the Methodists the churches of the emotions. The Episcopalians have had a vast deal in the last few years to do with church social observances, and so Christmas has been observed, and is largely, not religiously but socially, the country over; and so it has come that Lent has in one way an almost universal observance; by the prelatical churches in a religious way, by the rest of the world as a matter of social requirement. Even infidels think twice before they will appoint any great social event during the season of Lent, for two questions inevitably came up: first, What will society say? and second, Can we, in view of how people are governed by social tyranny—can we make it pay at this time? At any rate, not by its religious character, but its social observance, the season of Lent has been thrust upon the attention of those who do not observe it.

The season of Lent was observed very early in the history of the Church—certainly as early as the third century. No authority states that it went back to the times of the apostles. Intended in its early history as a preparation for Easter, which has always been held as the great holy day of the Church of God, it at first consisted of but one, two, three, or four days. Then lengthened in the eighth century, it was finally changed from thirty-six days to its present length. There is no basis whatever that the forty days are observed in memory of the forty days' fast of our Saviour in the wilderness.

THE THEORETICAL DESIGN.

It is twofold: first, a preparation for Easter, that the follower of Christ could go to the celebration of that day feeling that his sins were forgiven, his soul through communion purified, and able on that greatest of all days to the Christian—able to come to the Supper of the Lord and partake of the Holy Communion; and second, the design of Lent is to give to the Christian a special season of religious experience, when he should separate from the world, meditate upon his sins, fight against his evil tendencies, cleanse himself from the contamination the world has brought, and prepare himself specially against its influences in future. The Lenten season is in theory identical with the Week of Prayer now observed by many of the Protestant churches. Lent differs from that only in its greater solemnity, its carnal restrictions, and its greater length. With the Roman Catholic Church authoritatively, and others rather optionally, it is a time of fasting. And this method of observance serves to hold more or less perforce before the mind the religious character of the days of the season.

There is no doubt, in the view of all this, that theoretically the season of Lent ought to be productive of spiritual good. But as we are to concern ourselves with what is, as a result, not what ought to be, about facts rather than theories, let us look to see what.

is upon those who have observed it. I think we can say, comparing the great churches who observe Lent with the great churches who do not—the Episcopalians, Lutheran, Roman Catholic, and Greek churches with the Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist, Congregationalist and Reformed churches—comparing these, I think we will not be accused of prejudice if we say the churches observing are on the average in spirituality not only not equals of those not observing, but are, in truth, far behind them; and we will find, as a matter of fact without exception, just as these churches who do observe put stress on the observing of the season, they are spiritually dead.

As the observing of the season goes, in the first place, it seems, in fact, that Lent really is, in the main, no restriction on the average of the life. For as it is observed, the one who observes considers that both before and after he has some extra right to indulgence; and where Lent is very strictly observed there comes the license of carnival time, which the forty days of comparative abstinence can hardly atone for. However foolish the argument be, so people in fact argue by their action: I am going to be very good for seven weeks, so I will indulge myself a little; and they often thus do deeds and go to an extent of dissipation that they would not be guilty of were it not for what they know is before them.

In the second place, the abstinence of Lent is inevitably looked upon as

A SORT OF PENANCE.

People are only human, and it is human to take a pride in ourselves and in what we do. It is pretty difficult for a man not to think he has a little better chance of heaven if he give a large sum of money to the Lord, and so it is difficult for a person to give up fleshly indulgences for a while without thinking that somehow he thereby has a hold on God, and by the merit of his actions is to get heaven as his right. As a matter of fact, this is largely the result of Lenten observance.

Now, I am of course aware that mere abstinence from the full swing of fleshly pursuits is something of worth in character; but I feel confident that it is almost worthless when the abstinence is only abstinence outwardly. I doubt whether a person is advanced at all spiritually who, while outwardly holding himself in check, grieves over the necessity, and in imagination gloats in the doing of that which in body he does not allow himself to do, and after to an extent, at least, both before and after the restraint, feels himself entitled to a certain liberty to more freely indulge in view of the abstinence, as the drinker who agrees to give up his liquor for forty days goes on a great spree before, gloats over drinking during the time, and has considerable of a spree afterward. And so, however beautiful the season may be in theory, the observance of holy days and the Lenten season, as such, has not tended to the increase of spirituality and piety. It seems to me as observances increase beyond a certain limit, there is an increase of trust in the observance as a means of salvation, and consequently the form becomes the summary of religion. The observance is sure to be taken as an atonement for excesses indulged in, in view of the observance as well as for the sins of the rest of the life.

A LENTEN LIFE.

What, then, in view of all this, would I say and advise with regard to Lent? Well, I say nothing against its observance, but rather the contrary, if only it be observed on the basis of its theory. But the one who has the spirit to rightly observe forty days must have in him the spirit which will make his life a true Lenten season. In the true sense of the season every true Christian's life should be a Lenten observance—a drawing near to the Master, in communion with Him and meditation upon His life and love, and a crucifying of the flesh with its carnal desires; and if Lent be looked upon only as a special season of religious contemplation for the Christian, then, too, it may become a means of blessing; but the end must be nearness to Christ.

One thing, however, let me say in regard to all fasting. Under Christ it is not abstinence from eating that constitutes a service to God. In Christ is liberty, and service must be of the heart. The penance and fasting of the monk, though continued for many years, in themselves bring him no nearer to Christ. The essence of religion is the spirit which goes out toward God in worship and the desire of self-conquest. True fasting is not to abstain from eat and eat bitter herbs, but to abstain from carnality, to conquer and hold down the fleshly tendencies which war against the divine. The outer form may serve as a type, may serve to hold the spirit in view, but in itself it is nothing.

THE SAVIOUR'S FAST.

Another thing: apart from the forty days' fast of our Saviour, we have no record that He fasted, and the fast of forty days was at most an incidental matter—not as a means to an end, but a result in view of the glory which He realized as called of God to do His atoning work. The true following of Jesus ought to be a state of spiritual ecstasy which might lead us to forget to eat or be indifferent to eating; not a stopping of eating in the hope it would lead to spiritual ecstasy. Apart, I say, from the one fasting, which has no significance save as it gave the devil a good chance to tempt and lead astray, Christ never fasted, and we can hardly think He attached much, if any importance to it. To be sure, He said, after the Bridegroom was taken the children of the Bridechamber would fast; but, blessed be His name, we who love realize the fulfilment of His promise—"Lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the world." To be sure, He told His disciples how they should do when they fasted, but those were instructions for them as Jews, and at any rate demanded the careful hiding of the fact that they were fasting.

So, in summary, we fail to see the necessity of Lenten observance in fact, or the good result in fact, and we hold before you the better things: Seek to develop yourselves in the likeness of Christ, in having in you the spirit of worship, of prayer, and of true fasting, that not on Sundays alone, nor in Lent, but always, you may be fully His.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Important Diplomatic Changes were Made last week by the President. On Monday he sent to the Senate the nominations of the following ministers plenipotentiary and envoys extraordinary of the United States: Edward J. Phelps, of Vermont, to Great Britain; George M. Pendleton, of Ohio, to Germany; Robert M. McLane, of Maryland, to France; Henry R. Jackson, of Georgia, to Mexico. On Wednesday Congressman S. S. Cox was nominated minister to Turkey. The nominations caused much surprise. The English mission being regarded as one of the most coveted prizes in the gift of a new administration, it was expected that it would fall to the lot of some prominent Democrat for whom room could not be found in the Cabinet. Mr. Phelps is a comparatively unknown man, but those who do know him speak highly of his qualifications for the position. Senator Edmunds, with whom he is personally acquainted, said he regarded him as "the foremost lawyer at the North," and Secretary Bayard is reported to have declared him a fitter man than himself for his own post as head of the Department of State. Mr. Phelps is sixty-one years of age. He is Kent Professor of Law in Yale College, and in 1881 he was elected President of the American Bar Association. It is generally admitted that in nominating Mr. Phelps the President has been guided by considerations of fitness, as Mr. Phelps has never been in a position to render partisan service to a Democratic candidate. The Irish are dissatisfied with the selection, but as those who desired a quarrel with England supported Mr. Blaine, they had no reason to expect that Mr. Cleveland would consider their wishes in this appointment. Ex-Senator Pendleton is the most conspicuous Civil Service Reformer in the Democratic party. In nominating him for the Berlin mission the President has administered a delicate reproof to his own party in Ohio, who deprived Mr. Pendleton of his seat in the Senate as a punishment for his zeal in the cause of reform. The Ohio Germans are much pleased with the appointment. Governor McLane has already served as Minister. In 1853 President Pierce gave him the Chinese mission, and in 1859, on the nomination of President Buchanan, he represented his country in Mexico. He was elected in 1884 Governor of Maryland for four years. He is seventy years of age. Mr. Jackson has also had some experience in diplomacy. He was five years minister resident in Austria, from 1853 to 1858. He served in the war as brigadier-general of the Confederacy. The nomination of Mr. Samuel S. Cox was well received, the Democrats being agreed that the Congressman was fully equipped for a diplomatic position, and especially for the mission to Turkey, in which country he had travelled, and about whose people he had written in his entertaining way. It is understood that Mr. Cox, who has not been in good health for some time, has been anxious to represent the government abroad, and that his choice was to go as Minister to Turkey.

An Important Decision in the Polygamy cases was rendered by the United States Supreme Court on March 23d. Five test suits were submitted, with the object of deciding the constitutionality of the Edmunds act of 1882. By that act a board was created to supervise elections in the Territory, and this board prescribed as a condition of the registration of voters a discriminating test oath. Under the operation of this act, persons who would not swear that they were not bigamists or polygamists were not permitted to register. It was urged on the part of the voters rejected, that it abridged the rights of electors in the Territory under previous laws. But the Supreme Court decides that the United States has sovereign power over the Territories and their inhabitants; that it rests with Congress to say whether any of the people resident in the Territory shall participate in elections or in making laws; "and it may therefore take from them any right of suffrage it may previously have conferred, or at any time modify or abridge it, as it may deem expedient." The decision gives increased power to the President, and if he should find it insufficient, will justify him in asking Congress for laws still more stringent.

General Grant Testified in the Trial of James D. Fish, of the Marine Bank, on March 26th. The general declared that he was entirely ignorant of anything wrong in the business of the firm of Grant & Ward. He had no knowledge of the peculiar transactions of Fish and Ward in the Marine Bank. On the other hand, Mr. Fish, who was an original partner in the firm, had the knowledge of its business, the possession of which, General Grant testifies, would at once have made him distrustful. He supposed he was a special partner in the firm of Grant & Ward until the failure of the firm. He paid in $50,000 about the time he became a partner, November 1st, 1880, and $50,000 a short time later. On the 1st of May, 1884, he supposed himself worth nearly a million dollars. He felt no distrust or uneasiness up to the very day of the failure. The physicians attending General Grant state that his want of sleep is caused only in part by his disease; the chief reason for it is mental distress occasioned by the consciousness that people have lost large sums of money through confidence in his integrity.

A Rebellion of Half-Breeds was Reported from Ottawa on March 24th. It is headed by Louis Riel, who led the Red River outbreak in 1870. The insurgents are at Prince Albert in North-west Territory. Sir John Macdonald informed the Dominion Parliament that the insurgents had cut the wires and stopped communications between Quappelle and the crossing of the south branch of the Saskatchewan. Several of the operators had been taken prisoners. The immediate cause of the trouble was not known. It is stated that at Prince Albert most of the settlers are Scotch, and they find good land for a hundred miles on three sides of the town. There are eight hundred or nine hundred French half breeds, and these, with the Scotch and Irish half breeds, largely outnumber the settlers from other parts of Canada, who do not exceed four hundred or five hundred. What the half breeds at Prince Albert want is more land. They received liberal grants when the Territory was made part of Canada, but they ask now far more in proportion to the number of families.

An Outbreak of Hostilities in Central America is reported. Guatemala is opposed by the Republics of Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and San Salvador, which have formed an alliance offensive and defensive against Guatemala. On March 24th the citizens of San Salvador learned that President Barrios, of Guatemala, was approaching with fifteen thousand men. Barrios desires a union of the Central American States, which he proposes to effect by force, as diplomatic means have failed. President Diaz, of Mexico, will assist the three Republics in opposing Barrios. Several United States ships have been sent to the scene of the disturbance to protect American citizens, and the Senate has passed a resolution offered by Senator Edmunds to the effect that an invasion of Nicaragua by Guatemala "ought to be treated by the United States as an act of unfriendly and hostile interference with the rights of the United States."

The Probabilities of War between Russia and England formed the chief topic of interest in transatlantic affairs last week. The events of the week have a decidedly warlike aspect, although both governments profess to be, and probably are averse to taking up arms. The great danger is that matters may drift, as they did before the Crimean war, into a state in which it is impossible to withdraw peaceably and with honor. Mr. Gladstone's weak and vacillating policy is distinctly tending to that end. A profound conviction exists in England, Germany and France that Russia would withdraw from Afghanistan if she were sure that her refusal to do so would involve war with England. That fact is by no means clear, and therefore she temporizes, hoping that she may retain the coveted country without fighting. The English people manifest impatience with the administration. They contend that Mr. Gladstone should either have allowed the annexation of Afghanistan to be made by Russia without protest, or should have acted promptly.

A Message from the Queen was Sent to the British House of Commons on March 27th which caused much public excitement. The Queen's message informed the House that "the present state of public affairs and the extent of the demand on Her Majesty's military forces for the protection of the interests of the empire having constituted in the opinion of Her Majesty a case of great emergency, Her Majesty has deemed it proper to provide additional means for the military service. She has therefore thought it right to communicate to the House of Commons that she is about to cause the reserve forces and such proportion of the militia as might be deemed necessary to be called out for permanent service." Orders for arms and ammunition were also issued, and a notice was served on the transatlantic steamship companies that their swiftest steamers might be required by the government for transport service. It is reported that the calling out of the reserves was rendered necessary by an imperative demand for twenty-five thousand men sent by the Earl of Dufferin, the Viceroy of India, accompanied by an intimation that he would resign if they were not sent.

Another Slaughter in the Sudan is Reported. A small English force under the command of General McNeil was attacked by the Arabs on March 22d. The English formed a square as quickly as possible, but the camels, mules and horses were driven back in confusion on the troops, causing a stampede, and, amid clouds of dust, the Arabs penetrated the south and north sides of the square. The fighting for some time was very desperate, but at the close the English held their ground, and the Arabs, retired still firing and in good order. The English loss was five hundred and eighty men killed and wounded. Efforts are being made in Parliament to procure the withdrawal of General McNeil, who, the press dispatches state, displayed gross carelessness, which was the cause of the disaster.

Many Letters Have Been Received During the past two weeks from colored ministers and others to whom we were enabled to send the paper last year through the kindness of generous friends. About two hundred ministers were thus reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD every week. In a large proportion of cases the terms for which our friends paid have expired, and we have been compelled, though with extreme reluctance, to remove the names from our list. Our correspondents beg us to make another appeal this year, and plead pathetically that it is an opportunity which will not be rejected, because each copy of the journal does good not only to themselves but to their congregations. It is the only paper they see, and it supplies them, they say, with illustrations and suggestions in the preparation of their sermons which have been the means of much benefit. We the more willingly present their plea because we are convinced that the solution of the critical problem of the colored race in the South lies in the propagation of Christian truth. For every dollar we receive we will put one name on the list for a year.

Temperance Legislation in Nevada Takes the shape of an anti-treating law which went into operation on March 17th. The act makes it unlawful for any person to treat or entertain gratuitously any other person to or with any spirituous or malt liquor, wine or cider, or any beverage whatever, or to or with any other article whereby any beverage shall be obtained gratuitously, in any public barroom, saloon, beer hall or grocery in the State. It is also unlawful for any one to attempt to evade the provisions of the act by any chicanery or subterfuge whatever, such as pretending to sell one article and delivering another, or by falsely pretending to buy or sell any such beverage. Any person violating the law is to be declared guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction punished by a fine of not more than $20 nor less than $4, or by imprisonment in the County Jail not more than ten days nor less than two days, or by both fine and imprisonment.

The Faith Home For Fallen Women Celebrated its second anniversary on the mission premises, 103 West 27th Street, New York, on March 18th. In the two years of its work under the superintendence of its founder, Miss Strachan, several hundred girls and women have found shelter, sympathy and renewal there, and have gone out to begin the world as followers of Jesus; two hundred and three have been restored to friends; one hundred and fifty-five have found situations; many have married. Between fifty and sixty are now crowded into the small house which Miss Strachan occupies. She proposes taking a second house for the work, trusting God to provide means, as more accommodation is needed.

A Christian Convention Will Be Held at Pittsburgh, Pa., April 9th-12th, at which both Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey have promised to be present. The executive committee conducting the arrangements shows by its general character the unanimity of the Protestant churches in their desire for a revival of Christian work. It consists of Rev. J. C. White, Episcopal; Rev. E. P. Cowan, D.D., Presbyterian; Rev. C. W. Smith, Methodist; Rev. David Jones, Welsh Calvinistic; Rev. J. G. Goettman, Lutheran; Rev. J. T. McCrory, United Presbyterian, and Rev. B. F. Woodburn, D.D., Baptist.

Tidings of the New Missionary Ship, the Morning Star, have been received in a letter from the wife of Captain Bray. It came by way of Valparaiso, and is dated January 17th, at which time the vessel was at Sandy Point in the Straits of Magellan, with all on board well.

Two Kinds of Sermons have been Preached by a minister in Florida, according to the Jacksonville Herald. It says: "There is a man in Florida that we never pass without a sigh of regret. This man was the finest pulpit orator of the South. His tongue dropped diamonds, and his thoughts were pearls. No congregation ever tired of his eloquence. He held attention breathless, and thousands hung upon his words. If he had followed one good purpose with unflinching zeal through his life; if he had kept his eye single and his heart set in one direction; if to all his radiant gifts had been added stable purpose and sincere consistency, he might have been among the most famous and the most useful men of his time. But he followed all things; he sought to give God and Mammon equal service, and his melancholy shipwreck points the solemn moral of his plan of life. The story of this man is more eloquent of warning than the best sermon that he ever preached." Such men are not peculiar to this generation—the type has always been present in the world, and prophets and apostles have deplored their fall (Isa. 56: 11).

An Alligator Attended a Baptismal Service in Florida recently. The Charleston (S. C.) News reports that while several converts were being baptized by immersion "at McGirt's Creek, Jacksonville, Fla., on Sunday last, Rev. T. R. Banks officiating, an alligator approached, but the congregation objected to his presence and handled him roughly." The report may be a mere canard, the invention of some opponent of baptism by immersion; but such services, whether they take place in the open air or in a church, are certainly watched by an enemy more ruthless and voracious even than the alligator. Of that fact we have apostolic warning (1 Peter 5: 8).

A Handsome Collection in a Colored Church in Georgia was taken up some time ago as the result of a warning by the preacher that he did not want the contributions of certain persons. The Youth's Companion relates that when the ushers were about to start with the plates the minister said: "I 'se tole dat Mr. Thomas, up de land yonder, had some turkeys stole Friday night. I don't want any man who had a han' in stealing dem turkeys to put any money in de plate." Every one present gave something, even the editor of an out-of-town paper, who had only one half dollar in his pocket, which he had reserved to pay his fare home, was so concerned for his reputation in the matter of "dem turkeys" that he deposited it in the plate. This was only a glaring evidence of a fact well understood, that people who will not give from the pure motive of a desire to promote the cause of Christ will give to retain the good opinion of their neighbors. There would be poor collections in our aristocratic city churches if no one gave from that motive; but the collections would vastly increase, and there would be no lack of funds for the Lord's service if Christians realized the true extent of their obligations (Philemon 19).

The Queen of the Earthmen was Buried at Chicago, with grotesque ceremonies, on March 23d. While a number of the N'Chubbas or Earthmen from the Kalahari Desert in Africa were on exhibition in Chicago, their queen died, and the surviving members of the tribe buried her with native rites. They took two soft stones, which they brought with them from Africa, and drew broad lines from their foreheads to their chins in black, and from ear to ear in red. Around their eyes they marked alternate rings of red and black, until they bore not the least resemblance to human beings. To heighten the weird effect, they had obtained some blood from a butcher's shop and traced fantastic designs upon their breasts. When these preparations were completed they covered their faces with their hands and marched slowly around the body, chanting a mournful dirge. Suddenly, and with a terrific shriek, they all prostrated themselves upon the floor and remained perfectly silent for about ten minutes. At a signal from the chief they got up with another shriek, and gazed mournfully upon the corpse for the last time. It was with great difficulty that their manager could get them away and induce them to let the body be taken to the Forest Home Cemetery for burial. The ceremonies appeared foolish to the spectators, but they were entitled to respect as expressions of natural sorrow for the departed. Only at the grave of a Christian can there be any alleviation of the grief death causes. There the value of Christ's promises is realized (John 11: 25).

How an Invisible Communication May be made visible and a visible one be made invisible is explained by the Paper World. That journal informs its readers that in using postal cards they may write so that only the initiated can read the message, and write a misleading message which will disappear. The true message, it says, should be written with a gold or a quill pen dipped, not in ink, but in a mixture of one part sulphuric acid and seven parts water. When dry the card bears no trace of writing, but, as a blank card might excite suspicion, it may be covered with writing in tincture of iodine. When heat is applied to the card, the writing in iodine disappears, and the writing in diluted sulphuric acid becomes legible. There is reason to fear that the same process is going on in the record of some people's lives. In the day when all secrets are revealed and every one appears in the naked light of the great white throne, the records on the tombstones will disappear, and in their place will stand the hidden, true record of the actual life (Eccles. 12: 14).

A Large Reward for a Missing Book is being offered by a Wall Street lawyer in advertisements in the New York daily papers. The book sought is a manuscript record of marriages solemnized in 1772 by the Rev. John Ogilvie, who in that year was assistant minister of Trinity Church. The Reverend Ogilvie appears to have been rather an unmethodical man, for the registers of the church contain no records of any marriages solemnized by him during the whole of that year, though it is known that he officiated at many weddings. It was his custom to make a rough memorandum in his diary that he had married such and such persons on a certain day, intending, it may be hoped for his credit, to write up the register when he had opportunity. If the diary can be found it is believed that it will contain proof of a certain marriage having been solemnized between a man and woman whose great-grandson is the claimant of an estate worth more than half a million dollars. The claim will be valid if the book can be found with the record of the marriage in it. The search for the missing volume is very ardent, as may be imagined, and its discovery would be hailed with joy. The time is coming when men will find that in their Bible they had a far more valuable treasure had they but had the sense to know it. It tells them how to attain everlasting riches (Isa. 34: 16, 17).

The Sale of a Child for $1000 in New York was a matter investigated by the Supreme Court last week. Two weeks ago a man advertised that he was willing to give away his daughter, a girl eleven years old. An agent from the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children called upon him and states that the father said he wanted capital to start in business and intended to get it by selling his daughter for a thousand dollars. The child was in a benevolent institution at the time, and the society served the managers of the institution with a notice restraining them from surrendering her. Last week a wealthy gentleman applied for the child and was informed that he could not have her. The case was carried to the Supreme Court, where Judge Van Vorst closely questioned the parties. He finally sanctioned the transfer of the child, on condition that the father received no money for her, and that she should be adopted and brought up by the wealthy people as their own. The judge would not believe that any man could be so destitute of natural affection as to be willing to dispose of his child for money. Judge Van Vorst's faith in natural affection is remarkable—many parents are as destitute of it as this father was said to be. The father who forces his daughter into a marriage for the sake of the wealth and station it will secure her, really sells her. Many such bargains, which are sacrifices to the god of our time, are carried out in defiance of natural affection and of God's displeasure (Jer. 32: 35).

HOW "THE UNSPEAKABLE" IS SPOKEN OF.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And men shall speak of the might of thy terrible acts: and I will declare thy greatness. They shall abundantly utter the memory of thy great goodness, and shall sing of thy righteousness."—PSALM 145: 6, 7.

David in Beulah Land—His Prophecy—His Own Determination—How Men Speak of God's Works—I. Awe-struck Talk—Nations Judged in this World—Visits to Cholera Patients—The Time to Speak—II. Bold Discourse—Characteristics of this Century—III. Grateful Outpouring of Thankfulness—What There is to Sing about—The Righteousness of God—Horror of Worshipping Jupiter—God Righteous in Everything—Wanderings from Orthodoxy—The Attitude for Bible Readers.

IN this psalm David has reached the Beulah land of his songs, where we hear nothing else but praise. He begins, "I will extol Thee, my God, O king; and I will bless thy name forever and ever. Every day will I bless Thee; and I will praise thy name forever and ever," and he closes with, "My mouth shall speak the praise of the Lord; and let all flesh bless His holy name forever and ever." Happy is our condition when the glory of God fills both heart and tongue!

This leads to a consideration of the various ways in which men speak of the Lord and His acts when their minds are moved in that direction. All see not the same points of His greatness, neither do they see with the same eyes, nor speak in the same spirit. It is ours at this time to review the various orders of mankind, and to observe how the revelation of God to them affects their minds and moves their tongues.

There is an ascending scale in the four sentences of our text, as the poet-prophet observes and records the ascending forms of human thought and speech.

I. We begin at the lowest step of the ladder. "Men shall speak of the might of thy terrible acts." We mingle with the multitude during a great occasion of national calamity, or upon the receipt of thrilling news from a foreign land, and we hear the of the throng. We join a sobered and thoughtful company; they have come together under a common fear, and they speak one to another of the terrible acts of God because they impress them at the moment. They are of the Athenian kind, desiring continually to say and hear some new thing, and now they have found a novel subject which has the piquant flavor of terror.

There have been times in human history when this text has been fulfilled with tremendous emphasis. The first men who lived after the flood must have been affected with the solemn memory of the universal deluge; they must have often spoken to one another concerning God's terrible acts, when He drew up the sluices of the great deep, and burst open the reservoirs of heaven to drown a guilty world. They that dwelt over against the five cities of the plain, once so prosperous and rich, withal so luxurious and vicious—they, I say, that dwelt in the neighboring cities must have said one to another, "Have you heard what has happened—how God has rained fire out of heaven upon those wicked cities?"

These are but early instances in the gray old past, but they are typical of like judgments which are scattered throughout history. The terrible acts of the Lord are few, but no age is quite left without them, for the Lord liveth still, and He is evermore the same.

HE PUNISHES NATIONS

in this present life. Seeing that there will be no resurrection for nations as nations, and no judgment day for nations as nations, they are judged in time, and their sins are followed up by national judgments. Have ye not heard of the might of His terrible acts that happened unto Babylon? Know ye not that He made Nineveh to be such a heap of ruins that for many a century it was altogether hidden away from mortal ken? Have ye not heard what God did to the colossal empire of Rome, when it had filled up the measure of its iniquity? Do ye not remember how He broke it in pieces as with a rod of iron?

No Englishman should ever forget in modern times how the Armada of Spain was given as chaff to the wind, and that cruel, persecuting power was degraded from her pre-eminence. Men have spoken again and again to one another as they have hidden away from the scourge of war, or as they have stood weeping at the graves of their beloved ones slain by the pestilence which walketh in darkness, and they have said, "Behold the might of Jehovah's terrible acts!" Men will speak of that side of the Lord's dealings if they are dumb concerning His innumerable benefits.

When God's judgments are abroad in the world the inhabitants thereof shall learn righteousness; and this is a consolation in times of disaster and death. None of us would dare to desire these judgments; we are of another spirit from Elias, who, in holy jealousy for Jehovah his God, could pray that there should be no rain by the space of three years except according to His word. But yet the thought must have crossed the mind of many a faithful follower of God that atheistic nations ought to feel into thoughts of God, and oppressing peoples ought themselves to taste the bitter cup of tyranny. The least that we can do, whenever these terrible acts are abroad, is to turn them into special prayer, and cry mightily to God that men may speak of the might of His terrible acts, and may learn to "kiss the Son, lest He be angry, and they perish from the way, when His wrath is kindled but a little."

Sinners pray in a storm, and curse again in the calm. When the pestilence is abroad, they tremble and adore; but they become atheists when the graves are all filled, and things return to their usual course. When God sends forth pestilence (and He has of late scourged cities that are scarce a day's ride from us), let us pray that the scourge may not fall upon our own land. Yet I do remember, when first I came to this city, how many days and nights I stood at the bedside of men and women dying of cholera; and though it was a grievous thing, and this neighborhood felt the scourge very heavily, yet I noticed that infidelity was singularly quiet, and that persons who never entered a place of worship before began to attend our services. Bibles were routed out of the dust in those times, and religious talk was tolerated. The minister, who was formerly the subject of their caricatures and jokes, was viewed with reverence for the time being, and his visits were sought for in the hour of sickness.

Dear friends, whenever you find sickness in a house, or death in a darkened chamber, seize the opportunity to speak for your Lord. Your voice for truth will be likely to be heard, for God Himself is speaking, and men must hear Him whether they will or no. Meanwhile plead earnestly that the hammer of God may only break hard hearts, and that the fire of God may consume nothing but that which is evil. Pray that the Holy Spirit may work with the chastisement, to produce health and healing to the souls of men.

II. Be ready with the second part of our subject, which is this—

THE BOLD DISCOURSE.

Observe how the one follows the other: "Men shall speak of the might of thy terrible acts, and I will declare thy greatness." After the many have spoken in awe, I will deliver my soul with courage. Come in, O single testifier for God, for now you will be welcomed! When they have advanced so far as to tremble at God because He has begun to smite them, do you stand forward and declare His infinite greatness. Tell them of the greatness of His justice, and how He will by no means spare the guilty. Tell them of the greatness of His grace, and how in the person of Jesus Christ He passeth by iniquity, transgression, and sin.

To-day, my brethren, the most approved preaching makes much of man. Philanthropy, which is good enough in its place, has supplanted loyalty to Jehovah; the second table is put before the first, and in that position it genders idolatry—the worship of man, which is only a form of self-adoration. All divinity is now to be shaped according to man, and from man's point of view; and men are to think out their theology, and not take it from God's mouth, or from the Book inspired of the Spirit of God. Men are such wonderful beings in this nineteenth century that we are called upon to tone down the Gospel to that is, to the fashions and the follies of human thought, as they vary from day to day. This, by God's help, we will never do—no, not by one diluting drop, nor by the splitting of a hair. I believe in God, the God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob; if there be another god newly come up, let those worship him who will; but the stern God of the Old Testament, the loving God of the New Testament, it is evermore my resolve to magnify. He who is faithful to His God, and declares His greatness in this evil time, shall be accepted as a faithful servant in the day of the last account. Of course, he will to-day be stigmatized as "behind the times," and be little esteemed by those who deem themselves cultured and advanced, but of this he may make small account.

III. In the third sentence you see a company of godly people, and in their talk you mark of thankful spirits: "They shall abundantly utter the memory of thy great goodness." Did you ever tell out the story of your life to anybody to the full? Did you ever write it? I am sometimes not a little amused, certainly not surprised, when I get, as I did this week, a letter upon foolscap, twelve sheets, four and twenty pages, all filled up with the story of a man I never saw, who lives far away in the backwoods. Nothing will do but he must tell somebody or other what God has done for him, and he has selected me to be the receiver of the narrative. He has only followed the example of many others. I regret that so many of these autobiographies come to me, for such good things ought to be a little more evenly distributed. I have scarcely the time to get through that length of writing, and having so many other epistles, it is possible that I am not as grateful for this one as I ought to be; but it is a good theme, of which we cannot weary. I would encourage all believers abundantly to utter what they remember of the Lord's love; and if they cannot tell it viva voce they must write it. You need not send me the manuscript; but do not let it be lost. Tell your friends the happy tale of Jesus and His love.

Such utterances would help us in reference to the former sentences of the text. When men are speaking of the terrible acts of God with bated breath, then come you in and say, "But He is good. These acts of judgment are few and far between. It is not often that we have a thunder-storm. What soft, bright mornings, what clear days, what dewy evenings we have, and only now and then a tempest!" Tell them of God's great goodness. And when at other times you have declared His greatness, it will be wise to change the strain, and soften down the terror of His grandeur by speaking of the majesty of His love.

IV. And now, you see, all the while it has been tall, but now in the fourth part we rise a stage higher, for we come to singing. Listen to

THE SELECT SONG.

"They shall abundantly utter the memory of thy great goodness, and shall sing of thy righteousness." When good men talk of God they soon find that the tongue leaps with liberty, for the strings that held it are broken. Then they cannot be satisfied with talking to men; they must rise to something better, and talk with God in holy song. "They shall sing." Singing is the language of joy, the special vehicle of praise, the chosen speech of heaven.

But is not this a very singular text? Do you not wonder at the subject of their song? "They shall sing of thy righteousness." Probably a large part of my audience will not understand how it can be regarded as a joyful subject. The righteousness of God is a theme of terror to many; they wish He were not righteous. He will by no means spare the guilty, but will hold His plummet to every bowing wall and tottering fence, and His hall shall sweep away all the refuges of lies; and because of this men dread the Lord, and turn away from Him; and yet, you see, there are hearts that can sing of His righteousness, and who, having other themes, having God's terrible acts, having God's greatness, having God's goodness to sing of, yet prefer this to their song—"They shall sing of thy righteousness."

WHAT IS THERE TO SING ABOUT in this? Just let me enlarge upon it for a minute or two. I count it a very great joy to every Christian that God is essentially righteous. What an awful thing it would be to have an unrighteous God! If the heathen who worshipped Jupiter, for instance, had sat down and deliberately studied the character of Jupiter, as taught to them by their own priests, they must have felt it a degrading thing to be under the rule of such a detestable being as Jove was said to be. A licentious God—fancy that! An unrighteous God, who could do what He pleased, and pleased to do iniquity! What a horror! An unrighteous God! That were to remove the foundations upon which all things must rest; for, after all, the character of God must be the basis of our confidence. If He were not righteous, what reliance could we place upon Him? His promises of grace might be broken; His covenant might be a fiction; the atonement itself might turn out to be a sham, and save nobody, unless the contract involved in it had been made by a righteous God.

RIGHTEOUS IN ACT. He is righteous; let us be sure of it, and sing about it—righteous in all that He reveals. There is no revelation of God in the Bible, or anywhere else, that is unrighteous. It is the same with God's doings. The Lord has never performed an unrighteous act. I want you people of God, especially, to feel this, so that if you have lost any one very dear to you, you may hold your peace, like Aaron, even if you cannot go further, and bless the Lord in the midst of your trials. That surgeon's knife of His does but remove a cancer. That bitter medicine does but heal you of a disease that else would be your death. Therefore, accept all that cometh from God, and kiss the hand that smiteth, and honor the lip which upbraideth.

And here is matter to sing about. The Lord is righteous in all His judgments. You may not need this fact at this present, but you may require it in some darker hour, when you lie under a false charge, and your defence is not believed. You have been doing your best in your situation, and you are accused of dishonesty, and you cannot clear yourself; perhaps the circumstantial evidence looks against you, though you are as innocent of the deed as the angels of light. If you have faith enough, you may now sing of the righteousness of God. Some of us have sung of it when everybody has misrepresented us; and we have been sustained thereby.

But the loudest song and the sweetest is concerning the righteousness of God in Christ Jesus. The cross is at once the loudest proclamation of divine righteousness and the plainest proof of divine love. The Lord is able to save to the uttermost; but He is not able to retract His declaration, "The soul that sinneth it shall die." He must punish, even though He must pardon. It is necessary that the authority of law should be sustained, and therefore the Lord will not withdraw from the execution of His justice upon the ungodly, though it be His strange work, and He desireth it not. On His Son He has executed justice for all those who are in Him.

And now at this time I want you to sing of the divine righteousness, because the righteousness of Christ is yours. If you are believers you can joyfully wrap yourselves up in the righteousness of God Himself. This is the name whereby she shall be called, The Lord our Righteousness." See Jeremiah 33:16. Notice the feminine; it is not "wherewith he shall be called," but "wherewith she shall be called." The wife takes the husband's name; the Church is named after Christ, her Bridegroom. It is a wonderful sentence to be in God's book—that His Church shall bear His name, and Jesus Christ the eternal God shall become the righteousness of poor sinners like ourselves.

But I must close, and I want, therefore, to say to you, dear friends, that I conceive this singing of God's righteousness to be the choicest evidence of real conversion and reconciliation to God, and of likeness to God. If we were more sanctified we should be less tempted to cavil at the righteousness of God. Here is a man who takes down his Bible, and he reads, "These shall go away into everlasting punishment." "Can't bear it," says he. It is because you do not know the mind of God fully, or else, terrible as it is, you would say, "It must be right if God determines it." Instead of that the man assumes to judge God, and dares to weigh the Word of God in his scales, and say, "This does not suit my inner consciousness, and therefore it is wrong." Is our inner consciousness infallible? Is revelation a nose of wax to be shaped by our inner whimsies?

When a man once alters the Word of God a little, within a year he alters it again. I have noticed brethren who began their WANDERINGS FROM ORTHODOXY with the life-in-Christ theory, who have now reached the restitution of all things; devils included. Why preachers who believe this last theory keep on preaching, I do not know, for there is no practical reason why they should. If what they say is untrue, they had better hold their tongues; and if what they say is true, their occupation is gone; for clearly it is only a matter of time, and everybody will come right.

Brethren, let me not deceive you by pandering to the idle prattle of the times. Men dream, and then assert that their visions are truth. If there be anything of conjecture and of "larger hope," so be it. I may conjecture, and I may imagine; but for me to preach my conjectures and my imaginations as doctrines would be damnable. It is an atrocious disloyalty to the majesty of revelation to add to it the manderings of our poor fallible judgments. The better thing is always to feel as a little child at his father's knee, when we are reading the Scriptures; and to ask to be taught of the Spirit. Whatever the truth may be, I shall never quarrel with God. Paul was wont to silence those who had objections to offer concerning the ways of the Lord; he did not argue, but he simply said, "Nay but, O man, who art thou that resistest against God?" "Bad argument," modern thinkers dare to say. Yet it is the best that such people deserve, and the best that inspiration deigns to offer them.

My brethren, say one of you unto the Lord, "I will sing of thy righteousness." It is AN AWFUL TRUTH! It is a truth that makes me tremble as I utter it; but I do read in the Revelation, concerning those that are tormented day and night, that it is "in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb." Whatever that torment may be, it must be right. Nothing in the presence of the angels of God can be contrary to their joy over repenting sinners—nothing in the presence of the Lamb can be contrary to His ineffable love. It is not for us to explain to others, or even to understand for ourselves, all that the Lord does or is; but it is our duty as His subjects, our pleasure as His children, to bow before Him and adore.

Oh, eternal God, I do not understand Thee!

If I could comprehend Thee Thou wert not God, or I not man. The parts of thy ways which thou hast revealed stagger and almost slay me, but, as I fall at thy feet as dead, my heart cries, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him." For the Lord is good, and righteous are all His ways. My hearer, when you speak thus from your heart, you are a converted man. There is no mistake about it; you are reconciled to God, indeed, when you thus honor Him. Alas, many are only reconciled to the half of God, or to the tenth part of God! Indeed, I fear that many have shaped a god for themselves, and so are not reconciled to the true God at all. We want a conversion which shall make us run in parallel lines with the God who has revealed Himself by His prophets and apostles, and by His ever-to-be-adored Son. So may it be with each one of us, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

ACROSS THE RIVER.

SCRIPTURAL views of the Heavenly Home. A miniature gem of a book only two and a quarter inches in width by three and a half inches in length, gilt edged, its cloth cover profusely gilded, and its one hundred and twenty-eight diminutive pages ornamented with a red line. It contains six short articles on the Heavenly Home from the writings respectively of Dr. Allon, Dr. Norman McLeod, Dr. James Hamilton, Dr. R. W. Hamilton, and Dr. James Spence. Their subjects are: Our One Life has Two Homes; The Spiritual Body; A Glimpse of the Redeemed in Glory; The Perfect Service of Heaven; The Recognition of Friends in Heaven, and Perfect Manhood in Heaven. The passages are selected with the design of consoling bereaved Christians by directing their thoughts to the home "Across the River." Price 25 cents. Mr. Thomas Whittaker.

THE REALITY OF RELIGION.

by Henry J. Van Dyke, Jr., D.D., is a disappointing book. Its theme is of the highest importance, both to the church and to the world, but the author fails to use it so as to benefit either of them. In the church are many young people who were converted in seasons of religious excitement and are now distressed to find a slow but sure decrease of the joy and happiness they experienced when they first found peace. They need to be taught that the reality of religion consists not in the ecstasy, the decline of which they are deploring, but in that union with God through Christ which transforms the life. The world, too, mistakes the reality of religion and doubts whether there is any reality in a religion the professors of which are often guilty of grievous sins, and whom they see seeking their pleasure in the theatre, the ball-room, and other places to which ordinary people resort. A writer on the reality of religion should have a message for each of those classes, and he cannot be more usefully employed than in delivering it. But Dr. Van Dyke has missed his opportunity. His dogmatism and his feeble arguments will be only ridiculed by the world, while the anxious young Christian will turn in utter weariness and disappointment from the trite remarks, the stale platitudes, and the empty, sonorous phrases with which Dr. Van Dyke fills his pages. Many a hungry soul will we fear, open this book hoping to find bread and will find not even a stone—nothing but wind.

Very elementary is some of the teaching here given. It surely was not necessary to devote so much space to explaining that reality in religion is not "a literal and physical touching of" God. Nor does it need an elaborate argument by a doctor of divinity to convince us, as Dr. Van Dyke labors to do (p. 13), that "appearances are not realities. Far from it." The mere child is aware of that fact very early in his existence. On the other hand, propositions which are not exactly self-evident are stated without any evidence to support them. "Many of the grandest theories of science," says Dr. Van Dyke (p. 88), "are but the unfolding of seeds which have fallen from the fulness of Scripture into the hidden places of the human mind." It may be so, but that is not the prevalent opinion, and if a few of the "many" had been mentioned the world might have been the wiser. Again, we are informed (p. 111) that "myriads of bulls and goats should take away sin." We knew that "it is not possible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away sin" (Heb. 10:4), but, until this doctor of divinity told us so, we did not know that anything done in obedience to an express command of God was ever done absolutely "in vain." Dr. Van Dyke informs his readers that the book was written from his heart. It is well that every man should put his heart in his work, but in writing books, the head, too, should not be idle or the book may be worthless. This work is an illustration of that fact. A Handy Classical and for popular use, by H. C. Faulkner, is, as its title indicates, a valuable book of reference for readers who have not had a classical education. How numerous such readers are is often forgotten by writers for the press, preachers and lecturers. They frequently make allusions to classical stories which are sufficiently apt when the reader or hearer has been to college or to a good school, but which are meaningless to "the common people who ken Latin but little," and who know nothing of Greek. Mr. Faulkner's little work will be of great service to such readers. In brief, concise paragraphs, arranged in alphabetical order, he supplies an astonishing amount of classical information, which will aid the uneducated reader to understand the allusions and illustrations most frequently employed by public writers and speakers. Bound in cloth, with seventy illustrations. Pp. 183. Price 50 cents. Mr. J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York.

THE BEATEN CARPET.

ON one of those bright days in spring when all nature seems joyous with returning life, an aged Christian walked meditatively along an unfrequented road on the outskirts of a city. A glance sufficed to show that the old man was not happy. He walked slowly and wearily, as if under a heavy burden. His eyes were downcast, taking no note of the bright sky or the budding trees; he sighed heavily and shook his head with a mournful expression, as if in silent protest against his lot. "The Lord hath dealt very bitterly with me," he muttered, audibly, quoting the sad words of the desolate widow. It was the old problem that has exercised the minds of God's children since the days of Job that was disturbing the old man's soul: How is it that the trials of life fall so heavily on men who are honestly serving God? How many Christians have had occasion to consider that problem!

There was no need for him to review the circumstances of his lot; they were ever present before him. His neighbors, had they been asked, would have told the inquirer that he was an unlucky man. He had plenty of energy when he was young. He carried out extensive works which should have brought him a large fortune, but the people on whom he relied failed, and he lost all he should have had. Then he procured remunerative employment and for some years succeeded well. He was thrifty and saved sufficient money to support him in his old age. A bank cashier was now the life of "the American Colony" in Canada, living joyously on the old man's money and that of other depositors. In his old age he had to go to work again, and he worked even harder than he did in his youth, serving his employers faithfully and well. But a hypocritical colleague, jealous of him, sent false and slanderous reports of him to his employers, who were in a foreign land, and he was discharged. His eldest son, on whom his hopes were set, and of whose abilities he was justly proud, fell into an untimely grave in a railroad catastrophe. His wife, who should have been his support in trial, was a burden to him through her querulous and discontented temper. Her reproaches added the last drop of bitterness to his cup. Aged, infirm, broken in spirit, and his faith often wavering, it was no wonder that the bright sunshine and the glad face of nature awakened no response in the old man's heart.

As he slowly sauntered along a road at the back of a long avenue of handsome brown-stone houses—for he avoided the streets where the presence of prosperous people seemed to taunt him with his poverty—he heard the sound of heavy blows. He started, fearing that some crime was being committed. He listened, and the thuds ceased for a minute. Then a voice said encouragingly, "At her again, George," and the heavy blows recommenced. Turning a corner, the old man saw two strong men beating a carpet suspended over a line, their sturdy blows driving a cloud of dust out of it. They stopped for a minute, and one of them suggested that that would do. "No," said the other; "there's a lot more dirt in her yet; come on!" and again the blows descended, with perceptible evidence that he was right. Presently the work was done, and as the carpet was taken down and trailed over the grass, the men agreed that the beating had done it good. "She looks as good as new, and is clean and sweet, anyhow," they said.

"That's so," thought the aged spectator, diverted for a moment from his sad thoughts; "but those blows must have damaged the carpet some. Well, it's no business of mine, and the owner's right to prefer cleanliness to anything else." He passed on, but the carpet mixed itself up in the current of his thoughts. What if he had himself been going through that process? "I will turn my hand upon thee, and purely purge away thy dross" (Isa. 1:25) was a passage with which the old man was familiar, but he had never thought of it in connection with himself before. Surely in the darkness surrounding him, such a solution was a light beautiful and comforting. Long years ago he had given himself to God; he would utter no more complaints. God was doing what He would with His own. He would soon understand it fully; until then he would trust blindly, and holding fast his faith would murmur no more.

THE LATE MR. FRANK POWER.

(See Portrait.)

NEARLY all we at present know of the events which occurred in Khartoum after General Gordon arrived there we have learned from the communications of Mr. Power, who was British Consul at Khartoum, and who acted as the special correspondent of the London Times. He was shut up in Khartoum with General Gordon and Colonel Stewart, but contrived to get his letters and journals through to Dongola, whence they were sent to London and published there and in this country. The three Englishmen were held together by no common tie in the presence of continual danger. A pathetic sentence which General Gordon uttered as he stood on the platform of the railway depot in London, just before starting on his fatal expedition, shows that his confidence and love for Colonel Stewart was very deep. Speaking to a relative of Colonel Stewart, he said: "Be sure that he will not go into any danger which I do not share, and I am sure that when I am in danger he will not be far behind." The reports received of subsequent events show that Mr. Power enjoyed the confidence of both officers. All three are now dead.

Mr. Power was murdered at the same time as Colonel Stewart and M. Herbin, the French Consul. They were conveying dispatches from General Gordon to Dongola when they lost their lives. They set out in a steamer from Khartoum on September 10th. In passing a cataract the steamer was wrecked, owing to the treachery of a pilot. It did not sink, but remained fixed on the rock. A sheik, named Suleiman, invited Colonel Stewart to land, promising to conduct him safely to Merawi. The invitation was accepted, and, leaving some of the men in charge of the boat, Colonel Stewart, Mr. Power, and the French Consul went ashore. They were taken to the house of a blind man, named Fabri, to drink coffee. While they were there the natives armed themselves and surrounded the hut. Sheik Suleiman appeared at the door and gave a signal, on which the Arabs rushed in and killed all except one man, a stoker of the steamer, who in the confusion succeeded in making his escape, from whom these details were obtained. General Brackenbury visited the scene of the murder on February 21st, and found there some papers that belonged to Mr. Power, some of Colonel Stewart's visiting cards, and a shirt sleeve stained with blood. He ascertained that the bodies were thrown into the river immediately after the murder.

General Wolsley, who has no love for newspaper correspondents, appears to have had a genuine admiration for Mr. Power. His secretary thus wrote to the mother of the murdered man: I am directed by the General to express to you, not alone his deep sympathy with you in the heavy blow that has fallen upon you, but to add, after the gallant defence made at Khartoum, in which Mr. Power, your son, played so distinguished a part, that in his opinion his sad death is a national loss.

THE GRAVE-DIGGER'S LITTLE FRIENDS.

THE evening shadows of a glorious summer day fell on an old graveyard in the country. The rays of the setting sun touched many an inscription cut nearly a century ago, and put a warm tint on the newer marble headstones, lessening the glaring contrast of the black letters. A group of merry children were playing among the graves and around the giant trees, under which generation after generation had walked, now lying at rest beneath their sheltering branches. The children, unvexed as yet by the problems of life and death, skipped around light-hearted. They were enjoying a holiday in the country.

"Mamma is sick," said the eldest of the group, in reply to a question; "oh, very sick, indeed, and we have come to stay with grandmamma while she gets better. It is so nice to play here among the trees. We have no trees nor grass like this in the city, and there are ever so many little flowers we haven't seen before. Look here," opening her little sister's apron and revealing a collection of floral treasures; "we shall take these to show mamma when we go home. Grandmamma says mamma used to play here when she was a little girl, so she is sure to like them. Here's old John going to dig a grave. This as a bent old man with a spade on his shoulder entered the graveyard.

John knew the little folks very well. He knew their mother, and could remember her playing around those very trees a little toddler like them. He had been present when she was married in that very church, and remembered how all the school children had come to the wedding and thrown flowers in her path. He was a Scotchman of a taciturn disposition, peculiar in dress and speech, and he had been grave-digger there ever since he came across the Atlantic a young man. Generally he had a kind word for these little folks, whom he loved for their mother's sake; but to-day as he passes them he turns his face away, and affects to be deeply interested in the top of an old gravestone on the other side of his path. The gloomy expression on his face repelled the children, and prevented their running to him with joyous greetings, as they usually did.

John went on his way through the graveyard to a spot where a willow spread its graceful branches over a family lot. There he began to dig.

"Those little things don't know yet," he soliloquized. "I'm glad they didn't speak to me. Poor motherless bairns, it'll be hard work telling them. Ay, but she was a bonnie lass. I didna think I'd ever have to dig her grave. Strange that a poor withered fellow like me, that don't care to live and has nobody to wish him to live, should stay, and such a bonnie lady as that should be taken. Well, the Lord knows best, but I canna understand it."

As the sun sank below the horizon, the children left the graveyard, and walked slowly homeward to show "grandma" the pretty flowers, and take counsel with her how to preserve them for mamma. The old lady saw them coming, and her eyes, red with weeping, were wet again as she thought of the desolation she must put in their young hearts.

"What is the matter, grandma?" asked the eldest of the group. "You've been crying."

"You haven't been naughty, grandma, have you?" asked one of the younger ones.

"I am afraid I am, my dear," said the old lady. "I cannot do as my Father wishes me."

"O grandma, have you a father? We did not know that."

"Yes, my dear, the best and kindest of Fathers. My Father is in heaven, and He has taken my best treasure from me. I know He is wise and kind and I ought not to grieve, as He wills it, but I do still. I am trying to be patient, but I am very sad. Then the old lady told them of the bliss of heaven, of its pure, unalloyed happiness, and how those who went there never wept again, and were saved from all weariness and pain. Then very gently she told them that God had taken her daughter, their dearly loved mamma, to that happy place, where she would be ready to welcome them when God called them.

"Shall we never see dear mamma again?" was the agonized cry of the eldest child, whose sense of present loss was too strong to be overpowered by the thoughts her grandmother had presented.

"When God calls you to join her, my dear, not until then; and while you wait you must be getting ready to go, doing just as she wishes you, and loving God, and taking care of your sisters."

It was a hard lesson to instil, but the old lady found that in helping those young hearts to grasp by faith the hand of the All-wise, her own heart was strengthened. In spite of her long Christian experience it was the children who first learned to say, "Thy will be done."

THE JEW'S WARD.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Rescue.

A YEAR passed by, with all the changes of the seasons, and Carola had not been absent for a night from her new home. It had grown dearer to her every day, the first spot on earth that had been dear to her. It was known by all about her that she was an orphan, and had no friends, having come direct from school to take her present post; but she had not spoken of her past life, and no one had felt curiosity enough to ask her any questions. As for herself, the past had been cast so completely behind her that she had well-nigh forgotten it. Her life was too full, and her interest in the present too deep and absorbing, to allow her to look back into a past that was utterly set aloof from her.

The harvest was gathered in again, and the busiest season of the farmer's year was over. Great ricks stood in the stack-yard, which lay immediately behind Carola's cottage, near enough to allow Philip Arnold to hear her voice singing, or to catch sight of her figure flitting past the window as he loitered along the narrow path running between the ricks, keeping out of her sight and his mother's. His love for her had been growing slowly and secretly, though he could see no one hopeful point in it. He did his best to conquer this perverse and secret love.

For if he spoke to her of it, it might drive her from the quiet home, where she was so happy. It would make him unutterably miserable to bring trouble upon her. Even if she cared for him trouble must come of it, for his father and mother would never give their consent to his marrying beneath him.

Beneath him! The young man's heart rose in revolt. It was he who was beneath her. There was nothing he could offer her which she would care to accept. What were riches, and lands, and stores of this world's goods to her who cared not at all to be richer than her Lord was? Poverty had greater attractions for her than wealth. If she did not care for him personally, there was nothing belonging to him to tempt her.

He could have wished himself a poor man for Carola's sake almost; but he had been brought up to think much of his position, and the money that was accumulating for him. He knew how many thousands were profitably invested as his future inheritance, for his father liked to talk of the different investments he made, priding himself upon his shrewdness and knowledge of the money-market. It was a very subtle worship of mammon that had taken possession of them both. But Carola's vivid and picturesque convictions of what Christ's disciples must be was piercing through the thick scales that crusted his conscience. Only a little while ago, when he heard her speaking familiarly, as she always spoke of people in the New Testament, of the rich young ruler who came to Jesus asking what was lacking in him to inherit eternal life, Philip Arnold had confessed in his heart that he, too, would have turned and gone away very sorrowful, but unwilling to sell all and follow Christ. Yet he could almost wish himself a poor man to win Carola's love.

It was early in November, and the yellow leaves were falling fast and thick from the trees at every gust of wind, when Philip rode down the lane past the school-house one morning. There was a meeting of the hounds on the other side of the Park, and a day's hunting was before him, though the busy and monotonous hum of a steam threshing machine sounded from the stack-yard. His father, who had long since given up hunting, would see to the day's work.

Philip had seen his mother watch him out of sight, with an expression of fond pride on her grave face; and surely Carola could not but look at him favorably to-day. He saw her afar off, leaning against the gate through which he must pass, and watching a group of merry children at play. At the sound of his horse's feet she looked round, and made haste to open the gate for him, holding it open with a smile upon her face. How pretty she looked in the soft sunlight! But she would have held the gate open, and looked as pretty, if John Windbank had been riding through on one of the wagon-horses. That was the vexation of it. But as he drew nearer he saw the smile fading away into a wistfulness that was almost sadness. Was it possible she was afraid of some accident befalling him in the hunting-field? He had heard other girls express such fears when they had been visiting at the Grange; how pleasant it would be to hear them from Carola's lips!

"What is the matter?" he asked, taking off his hat, and bending down to her. "What are you thinking of?"

Carola cast down her eyes, and a slight flush suffused her face, but she looked up again frankly and answered him unhesitatingly. "I was trying to think," she said, "if our Lord was holding this gate open for you to pass through, what He would think about what you are going to do. You know He and His disciples were workmen, and they had not time to go out for pleasure. But they would think about it of course. Would He be grieved as you passed by? There is nothing about it in the Testament, I know; and I am only a girl, and very likely to make mistakes. But it will be on my mind all day."

"But you would take all pleasure out of life," he said, almost angrily.

"Should I?" she asked, wistfully. "I should not like to do that, for I am so happy myself. And I hope you will enjoy it, and have a very pleasant day," she added, looking at him again, with a bright flush and smile.

But how could he enjoy the day with her words ringing incessantly in his ears, and her sweet and serious face haunting him? It was in vain to tell himself it was only a girl's fond; the notion of one who led a very narrow life, and saw everything from a fanatical standpoint. It was a manly sport. His mother was one of the best women living, and she never said a word against it. What allied him that the words of an ignorant girl, who had never been away from school, should spoil his enjoyment?

He was fifteen miles away from home when the day's run was over, and his horse was too fagged to carry him back. He put him in a stable, and waited for a train that would take him to the station nearest to Hazelmount. He had four hours to make away with at the inn where he dined; they were slow and dreary hours to him. He could not but feel that if he took Christianity simply and literally, as Carola seemed to think it necessary to take it, his existence would be all changed to him. How many trivial things, making up a large sum of daily life, would become impossible to him? Really to do what the teachings of Christ demanded, to become the salt of the earth, to be the light of the world, whether he ate or drank, or whatsoever he did, to do all to the glory of God; why, what an astonishing, what a terrifying change it would require in him!

He fancied he could hear Carola's clear, unflattering voice, saying, "One thing thou lackest; go thy way, sell all that thou hast and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and take up the cross and follow Christ." His spirit died within him at the thought of such a claim and such a sacrifice. "One thing thou lackest! one thing thou lackest!" rang through and through his brain.

He was glad to leave the train and start on his midnight walk homeward. It had been uncertain whether he would return that night, and no one would be sitting up for him, but the key of the kitchen-door would be left for him with John Windbank, who slept in a loft over the stables. He was in no hurry to reach home, and he loitered along under the dark sky with the hedgerows on either side of him as black as ebony. All the desolate country was as silent as if every creature was dead. Part of his way lay across a heath, all the little by-paths of which were as familiar to him as his own fold-yard, but to-night his feet stumbled among the tufts of heather as if he was walking on strange land. His thoughts were so busy he could pay no heed to his footsteps.

He was still more than a mile from home, and the long inland crag lay dark against the sky in front of him, when suddenly a fine thin tongue of flame darted into the air, flickered for a moment and then died out. His eye caught it instantly on the horizon, and he stood still for a minute gazing at the point where it had flashed and vanished. But now a second flame, and a third, leaped upward against the blackness of the night, and with the quick promptings of terror he hurried on swiftly. There was a small thick coppice to pass through in the park, and he tore his way through the underwood which hid the fire from his view; but coming out upon the road along which he had ridden in the morning, he saw the gate Carola had held open for him, and behind it Carola's cottage forming a background of leaping flames.

How far off it seemed as he sped along, and how silent and still the night was! There was no stir of any one coming to her help. The whole village would be asleep at this time, and the school-house, standing alone at the end of a lane, might burn to the ground before any one knew of it. He remembered that the steam-engine had been at work all day; no doubt a spark from it had fallen somewhere on the damp thatch and smouldered there. All the stack-yard was in danger, and so scarce was water on the brow of this hill, nothing could be done but stand by and see it burn. But Philip was thinking only of Carola. Could he get to her in time? What hindered him that he ran so slowly?

When he reached the porch all the roof was alight, the roof underneath which she was sleeping. The door was fast, so she could not have made her escape; but it resisted all his efforts to burst it open. He had uttered no shout while he had been speeding to her help, and he could not spare breath now. It was too late for any one to help but himself. If he could not save her in a minute or two there would be no hope for her.

He ran round to the school-house door and flung his whole weight upon it; it gave way before him, but the dense smoke that filled the place almost suffocated him. He groped his way through the thick folds to the inner room, and reached the foot of the little staircase. The current of air from the open doors fanned the smouldering thatch at the head of it, and there lay Carola insensible at his feet.

To catch her up in his arms and make his way back to the open air was the work of an instant, and scarcely had he carried her out of the deadly peril than he heard the shouts of people waking up to the discovery of the fire. All the village seemed running to them, but his strength was gone, and now that she was safe he felt himself trembling in every limb. Yet he held her fast in his arms till his father, who was the first to reach them, could take Carola from him. "Take care of her, father," he said, gasping for breath; "she is dearer to me than my life."

It is of no use fighting against fate, thought Mrs. Arnold, as she received Carola, cold and shivering, from her husband's arms. There could be no more sleep that night for any one in the farmhouse, for the stack-yard must be closely watched, and every hand be ready lest a fire should break out anywhere. The pits were full of water, but they lay at the bottom of the hill, and the machinery for pumping it up was slow and heavy. There was no chance of saving the schoolhouse, but fortunately the wind blew away from the stack-yard, and the firebrands of burning thatch fell harmlessly into the fallow fields on the other side of the cottage. Nothing was left of Carola's first home but the thick stone walls.

"I would rather it had been anybody else," said Mrs. Arnold, when Philip and her husband were lingering over their early breakfast, after all danger was over.

"No, my dear no," answered Mr. Arnold; "there's not a girl who would make us a better daughter. And if our boy here loves her better than his life, don't let us spoil the matter for him. I never thought to say I'd take a schoolmistress for my daughter-in-law, but I've watched her closely, and they'll be happy together—as happy as you and me."

"But perhaps she will not have me," said Philip, with an anxious glance at his mother's clouded face.

"No danger!" she said, fretfully; "if she was a girl I should choose for you, your equal, Philip, perhaps I should think her a little indifferent in her manner. But she will jump at you; oh, yes! a girl in her position; after saving her from such a horrible death, too!"

But Philip Arnold soon discovered that he could base no claim to Carola's affection on having rescued her from death. It was evident she did not hold her life very dear to her; there was in her something of that contempt of death which made the early followers of Christ meet martyrdom joyously. Probably she had never heard any speculations about the hereafter, and had no idea except that which Paul had, that to be absent from the body was to be present with the Lord. She listened to Philip's account of how he had forced open the door and found her lying insensible at the foot of the staircase, with wonder at the strong emotion the recollection of it produced in him, for his voice faltered and his hands shook as he spoke of it.

"I would have been such a terrible death," he said, shuddering and drawing nearer to her.

"I did not think of that," she answered; "it would have seemed terrible to you, but oh, how much I should have known by this time! Perhaps the first thing I should have seen would have been the face of my Lord. I suppose I must have been very near dying, but I did not know it, the time, for when I awoke, almost suffocated, I crept down-stairs at once to find the door. But if you had not found me, I wonder where I should have been now?"

"Are you sorry, then?" he asked.

"Oh, no!" she cried, holding out her hand to him. "I am glad you saved me; I am thankful, very thankful to you. Of course, if God wishes me to be here, I am glad to be here; but I am not afraid of going away, you know. You need not have been very grieved if you had not been in time to save me."

But the thought that he might have been too late to save her almost unmanned him. He left her abruptly, and went away down to the ruined cottage, wondering what would have become of him this day if he had been only a few minutes later in reaching it a few hours ago. One necessary result from the conflagration was, however, full of pleasure to him: Carola must find a home under their roof until the place could be rebuilt. The school-room, which was built altogether of stone, with a roof of red tile, had not been destroyed by the fire, and might in a few weeks be ready for occupation again; but the half-timber cottage could not be rebuilt till the spring came. Until then Carola must live at the Grange, and if he could not win her by that time there would be no hope left in him of ever doing so.

It was an unutterable delight to Philip to see her going to and fro about the house, taking her full share of the household cares, and busying herself in the winter work of the farm. For Carola could not hold herself aloof from the life around her, and this new chapter of farmhouse doings was crowded with interest to her. December is always full of work, and the days are short; and Mrs. Arnold had often sighed for a daughter who would take some part of the burden of house cares off her shoulders. There could hardly be a better daughter than Carola; and Mrs. Arnold half-grudgingly admitted it. Nor could she detect in her any lurking coquetry of manner with regard to Philip. If she had been a girl whom she wished to see his wife, her fears would have turned in the direction that she was indifferent to him.

A MEMORABLE SHIPWRECK.

S. S. Lesson for April 12, Acts 27: 27-44. Golden Text, Ps. 107: 28. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Distraction of the Ship's Company—Paul's Calm Confidence—He Assures them of Safety—No Encouragement to Idle Security—Means to be Used—Cannot be Saved if the Sailors Go—Their Health to be Preserved—Encourages them to Eat—Cargo must be Thrown out—The Wreck—The Prisoners in Danger—Paul's Prediction Exactly Fulfilled.

PAUL's words, "I believe God that it shall be even as it was told me," were left undisputed by the ship's crew, and he said, moreover, "Howbeit, we must be cast upon a certain island." It must have been somewhat startling to the mariners that a simple passenger, and he a prisoner, should pretend to know more about the course they were taking than even the captain of the ship; that while there were no human means by which it could be ascertained, this man should speak with such quiet, about it! They saw a man living in communion with God—a man in whom God dwelt; one who could not be tossed to and fro by circumstances, inasmuch as He who overruled all circumstances was with him and in him. They saw him, by faith in God, superior to circumstances; and just where all human knowledge of geography and of navigation failed, they saw him acquainted with the knowledge which they longed for in vain; and while they were all in terror for their lives, they saw him, not only in perfect quiet regarding his own life, but perfectly sure that God was about to spare theirs in answer to his prayer. What amount of theology, what amount of logic, would have so convinced them of the reality and of the presence of God? It needed but that Paul, filled with the Holy Ghost, should be on board—that Paul and his

God should be at one; and no single member of the crew could be unaffected by it. There is unconscious but certain power in the very presence of a man who is filled with the Spirit. It is not that the man is anything in particular, but Christ is in him, and

HE CANNOT BE HID.

"When the fourteenth night was come, as we were driven up and down in Adria, about midnight the shipmen deemed that they drew near to some country." Were Paul's predictions about to be realized? They "sounded, and found it twenty fathoms; and when they had gone a little further, they sounded again, and found it fifteen fathoms." Having gone on a whole fortnight in a dread uncertainty, with no indication as to their route, it must have been a relief to find that they were at least near shore. "Fearing lest they should have fallen upon rocks, they cast four anchors out of the stern, and wished for the day." Suspense was adding now to the strain of the long uncertainty; hope had revived; would the long hours of darkness never pass that they might once more see something besides the white foam of the sea and the leaden, heavy clouds above? There was one on the ship who was not anxiously wishing for the day. Paul was quietly resting in his God, knowing that "all things work together for good to them that love God." Seeing the vast machinery of God's purposes at work, knowing the mighty power which moved that machinery, and having perfect confidence in that Power, Paul could wait.

But he was not asleep. Under cover of the darkness some of the sailors, selfishly thinking of their own safety, plotted to desert the ship and "let down the boat into the sea, under color as though they would have cast anchors out of the foreship." Their real intention, however, was to flee out of the ship in the hope of saving their lives. Oh, how ready man is to depend upon himself and his own efforts! how unready to trust in God alone! "Paul said to the centurion and to the soldiers, ye cannot be saved." Paul had asked and received safety for all those that sailed with him, for the company as a whole, not for the sailors only. Any interference with God's dealings might cut the soldiers off from blessing. Circumstances had proved that they were unable to save themselves. Paul had put them into God's hands, and they must not take themselves out. "God helps those who help themselves" is a very common saying, but we do not find it in God's Word. On the contrary, we find that which God seeks in us is faith. Faith rests in what God is, what God does, what God says. When we put a thing or a person into God's hands by faith, we believe God undertakes that thing or that person, and that we need not meddle with it or with him, except when clearly directed to do so by God. Some think they have trusted God to make them holy, but they are continually dealing with themselves—judging themselves—legislating for themselves, watching themselves—all of which hinders God from undertaking and carrying out His purpose. If they are going to do the work, why then ask God? If God is going to do the work, why not leave it to Him, unless they think Him incompetent? Again, some trust God to heal their bodies, or think they do; but they think they must help Him somewhat. They must continue to diet themselves, they must avoid all which has formerly induced the disease, or they must continue some remedy—they must, in fact, have a hand in it. Now, nothing hinders God like this. "Except these abide in the ship," in the place of apparent danger, but just where God has met them, "ye cannot be saved."

EXCEPT THESE ABIDE IN THE SHIP,

GOD WAS IN COMMAND of the ship; the man who of all on board had the least official right, from a human point of view, was used as His instrument. Influenced by him, "the soldiers cut off the ropes of the boat, and let her fall off." Here was a prisoner in command over the soldiers whose office was to guard him, and he and they completely frustrating the designs of the sailors, whose part it was to manage the ship; so strangely God overturns human relations of men, the one to the other.

The state of terror among the crew had been so great that no regular meal had been taken all this time. Paul, knowing how certain their safety was, while the day was coming on, besought them to take food, saying, "This is the fourteenth day that ye have tarried and continued fasting, having taken nothing. Wherefore I pray you to take some meat; for this is for there shall not a hair fall from the head of any of you." God in command, misery and terror ceased, and like a loving Father He cared for His children's needs. Paul when he had thus spoken "took bread, and gave thanks to God in presence of them all; and when he had broken it, he began to eat." Living before God as he did, no consideration as to what they might think of it would hinder him from publicly thanking God both for their coming deliverance and also for the food which they were about to take. God had made the opening for Paul to testify of Him, and he simply walked into it; there was no forcing; God had set before him an open door, and no man could shut it (Rev. 3: 8).

THE WRECK.

"Then they were all of good cheer, and they also took some meat." The influence of one man so free in spirit, so confident and happy in God, reacted on them all. The current was turned. Thus two hundred and seventy-five persons were brought to see something of God. Courage rose, they were all ready to lend a hand to help; and so, after a good meal, they cast out the wheat into the sea. Morning dawned, and with it they saw the shore, but it was unknown to them. However, they discovered "a certain creek with a shore, into the which they were minded, if it were possible, to thrust in the ship." So they took up the anchors and committed themselves to the sea, as it seemed; but really to God, who has winds and waves under His command. "They loosed the rudder bands, hoisted the mainsail to the wind, and made toward shore." It did not look as though Paul's word would come true that the ship would be lost. But before reaching the shore they came to a place where two seas met, and ran the ship aground. Until they touched shore the Lord did not permit the ship to go to pieces. Then the forepart stuck fast, and "the hinder part was broken with the violence of the waves."

Still another danger threatened. The soldiers gave counsel that all the prisoners should be killed, "lest any of them should swim out, and escape." It would seem as though at the very last the word of the Lord would fail. But it could not; God is not a man that He should lie; neither the son of man, that He should repent; hath He said, and shall He not do it? or hath He spoken, and shall He not make it good (Num. 23: 19)? "The centurion, willing to save Paul, kept them from their purpose; and commanded that they which could swim should cast themselves first into the sea, and get to land: and the rest, some on boards, and some on broken pieces of the ship. And so it came to pass, that they escaped all safe to land." And every one of them knew that the hand of that God whom Paul worshipped had brought about their deliverance. Who knows whether all this crew were not saved in soul as well as body?

SEVERAL popular books widely read in this country have made American readers very familiar with life in the English universities. Mr. Tom Hughes, the founder of the colony at Rugby, Tennessee, wrote "Tom Brown's School-days" and "Tom Brown at Oxford." These with "Frank Fairleigh" have all been so extensively circulated that the ways of English undergraduates, their customs, their modes of thought, and especially the amusements of which they are fond, are well understood here. It will, therefore, be easy for our readers to share in the astonishment of the English people at the announcement that the two heroes of their year at the University of Cambridge have gone as missionaries to China. Though the universities are seats of learning, the undergraduates themselves are apt to regard as the most enviable men among them, not the men who stand highest at the examinations, but the men who excel in athletic sports. The majority of them if offered the choice of being senior wrangler or captain of the University Cricket Club would unhesitatingly choose the latter. Reading men are not popular outside of their set, but the man who pulls stroke in the university boat or is captain of the university eleven, commands the respect of the whole university. They are men of whom all the undergraduates are proud, and of whom great things are expected. That both should give up their brilliant prospects in life to endure hardship and privation that they may preach Christ to the heathen, is an event causing absolute amazement to all university men. Yet this is what has occurred, and we this week publish on the first page the portraits of the two noble, devoted men.

The fact that renders the event especially interesting to American Christians is, that it is mainly due to the blessing of God on the labors of Messrs.

MOODY AND SANKEY

that these young men have given their lives to Christian work in the foreign mission field. The London Christian says: "It would not perhaps be easy to connect in complete succession the various links in the chain of events that have culminated so happily, but we cannot help feeling that two important links are the London missions of Messrs. Moody and Sankey. It will be an unspeakable joy to these brethren to know that such far-reaching fruits are growing out of their earnest labors in the gospel in this land."

The two missionaries whose portraits we give are not going out alone. Five other young men accompany them, three of whom are Cambridge men, and the other two are officers in the army, who have resigned their commissions to work in the army of the Prince of Peace. They are all members of the aristocratic families of Great Britain. Their names are W. W. Cassels, B.A., D. E. Hoste, Montagu Beauchamp, B.A., Cecil Polhill-Turner, and Arthur T. Polhill-Turner, B.A. They sailed for their new sphere of labor on February 5th. On the previous evening a valedictory meeting was held in Exeter Hall, London, which was crowded, in spite of a pouring rain, with friends anxious to bid them God-speed. The great gathering was one of very remarkable and even historic interest. It formed a fitting climax to a series of meetings in London and the country districts that can find no parallel in the records of missions. Larger bands of missionaries have gone forth, but not at any time has there been a band the members of which were so remarkable for high social position, personal character, and attainments, as those who sat on the platform of that meeting.

Apart altogether from the work they may do in China, it is evident that by their means a remarkable work has been done in Great Britain—young men and others in Scotland, the North of England, London, and the Universities have been stirred as never before with regard to the mission field.

Forty undergraduates were present from Cambridge, a large body of students from the Wesleyan College, from Mr. Grattan Guinness's Training College, and Mr. Spurgeon's Pastors' College, while members of the Young Men's Christian Association turned out well.

Personal details of the lives of the young missionaries are supplied by the English newspapers, but the following reports of the addresses they delivered at the valedictory meeting furnish indications from which it is not difficult to form an estimate of the men. The chairman of the meeting having told the apocryphal story about Queen Victoria having once given a Bible to a heathen chief, which chairmen of missionary meetings are expected to tell, and the people to applaud, he presented a copy of the Bible in Chinese to each of the young men. The secretary of the China Inland Mission then explained the methods and principles of the mission under the auspices of which the band of young missionaries are going out. Then whose portrait appears on our front page, who was the stroke, or leading oarsman of the Cambridge University boat, said: "I suppose we all allow that we are under solemn obligation to spread the knowledge of the Gospel. It is this conviction which is sending us out from England's shores. This Gospel made the Thessalonian Church of old such an evangelistic church, that in the space of one year the Word of the Lord had sounded out throughout the regions of Macedonia and Achaia. The secret of it was this: Paul had been through Amphipolis and Apollonia, and came to Thessalonica, and the burden of his message was that there was another King, one Jesus. This Jesus was received as the Lord of their whole being, and they gave themselves right up to Him. This Gospel must be preached until all mankind and womankind bow their hearts before this Almighty Saviour, whose blood has atoned for sin, and made peace for the whole world, if only the whole world knew it."

"In England we have every possible privilege for getting truth and bathing ourselves in Gospel light; but the Gospel has been rejected by the people of this country, and the words might go from many throats—Ye put it from you, and now we go to the Gentiles." God has unbosomed His heart to the world to show that He desires to bring it back to Himself, and He has committed to us the glorious privilege of making known to men the way by which they may come to the Father. If we take and its needs, we shall not long keep our hearts fixed upon England. Yet it was not until the beginning of this century that we began to think at all of the great need of the world. The pope was ready enough to send his missionaries; but this nation, with the Bible open before us in the spoken dialect of the people, read for three centuries, 'Go ye unto all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature,' and until the end of the last century nothing was done to obey that command. And the first man to send the Gospel to the heathen was not a man great or learned, but a cobbler.

THE CELEBRATED WILLIAM CAREY.

"You will remember that in the miracle of feeding the five thousand the apostles were employed to distribute the bread to the people; and I will ask this audience to imagine that it constitutes the multitude to be fed, and to suppose that the distribution has been made to about eight rows just here in front of the platform, and that then, instead of going on to those behind, those who are dispensing the food begin again at the first row, and so on to the eighth, beginning again at the first, and so on, pouring the bread and fish into their laps, a piling it up around them and leaving the den multitude behind there in the hall to starve. This is what we have done. The Syrophenician woman told our Lord that even the dogs ate the crumbs that fell from their master's table but we have almost been

KEEPING BACK THE CRUMBS.

Our Lord wants us to go and take the Gospel the perishing world, and by our lives among these people to commend the Gospel. Unfortunately, many English people who go out distant unevangelized lands do not commend the Gospel, and the Chinaman, observing their conduct, turns away from the message, belittling his own religion better. He says: 'I have got my little stone idol. My grandfather we shipped it, and my great-grandfather worshipped it, and at any rate it has the honor of antiquity. If you ask me to take the Christian's God answer that I would rather have my little stone idol. It is at least quite harmless, and it certainly does not teach me to get drunk and impure.'

"We look at Africa, and remember how a brave young Scotchman—Frederick Stant Annott—started from the bottom of the continent and went through hardships cold a wet alternating with the parching desert. Little farther north, and we saw, a few years ago, that great man,

LIVINGSTONE, IN HIS TENT.

He was breathing his dying prayer for Africa. He died, and his body was brought to England. Crowds followed that body to its last resting place, and spoke well of the dead man's deed. If Livingstone could have come back to tell what would he have said to those crowds? He would have said: 'Don't follow my body here to this cathedral, but follow to where my lies, away yonder in Africa, and obey ye the Lord's commands to go forth and preach the Gospel to every creature.'

"I do not know whether God will raise Scotchmen or Englishmen to do it, but work will be done and the Gospel shall spread. It seems to me that Christ has come right into our midst, and has looked into the face of young, middle-aged, and old. Bishop Taylor, at the age of sixty-three, started a day ago for the heart of Africa. Christ has come into our midst, and His command 'Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature.'

Mr. D. E. Hoste (late Royal Artillery), Mr. Cecil Polhill-Turner, Mr. M. Beauchamp, B.A., and Mr. Arthur Polhill-Turner having spoken.

representing the Cambridge undergraduates said: "There are many of our friends who are the missionaries their great privilege of going out so soon. It has been said to me that a great pity that these men are going abroad that such men are wanted at home; that, having distinguished themselves in athletics, they could win the souls of young men in England but some said doubtfully they hope for the best. I do not hope at all. I know what it is for the best, because I know what it is going out has done for me and others at Cambridge. We had been having missionary meetings, and had been hearing missionaries, when we heard of these men going out, we brought face to face with the heathen abroad it taught us that the Church of Christ is Church of the world, and not merely of England. Not only has their going out stirred the missionary interest at Cambridge, but it taught us what it is to give ourselves to Christ. It has taught us that there is to be no compromise, however small, and that there is to be nothing between us and Christ. On behalf my fellow-students I will give Mr. Smith his co-missionaries a verse to remember: 'Be strong and of good courage, be not afraid, neither be dismayed, for the Lord thy God with thee whithersoever thou goest.'

MR. C. T. STUDD, B.A.

(late captain of the Cambridge Cricket Club)

whose portrait appears on the first page, said: 'I have been a Jack-of-all-trades, but now I have found the best of masters, and I want to tell you how I sought the Lord, and found Him. It is seven years since I was converted; but I kept the knowledge of God's love to myself, and consequently grew cold. The love of the world began to come in again, and for six years I was in an unhappy backsliding state. God brought me back to Himself at the beginning of last year, and I then saw how little the world is worth. It is all due instrumentally to what was thought to be the death-bed of my brother. As night after night I watched beside that bed, I began to see how little is the value of the things of this world; and when it pleased God to restore my brother, I went to hear Mr. Moody.

MR. MOODY SET ME TO WORK for the Lord, and I tried to induce my friends to read the Gospel, and spoke to them individually about their souls. I soon had the consolation of leading to the Saviour one of my nearest and dearest friends, and I can speak of the great joy it gave me to bring the first soul to the Lord Jesus Christ. I have tasted, I believe, of every pleasure that this world can give; but I can say before God and before man that the whole lot of them are nothing compared to the joy it gave me to save that one soul.

"I went on working in the mission for some time, and then the cricket season came on, and I thought I would go into the cricket-field, and get the players to accept the Lord Jesus as their Saviour. It was, perhaps, a mistake, but still it was my honest intention. I had as much as any man ever had; but when the Lord Jesus came into my heart I felt I had got something infinitely better than cricket. My heart was no longer in the game, for I wanted to win souls to the Lord Jesus Christ. I knew that cricket would not last—that indeed nothing in this world would last—but it is really worth while living for the world to come. Shortly after this the mission came to an end. Mr. Moody left for America, and I wanted to know what my life's work was to be for the Lord Jesus, whom I wanted to serve. I afterward prayed devoutly to God to show me what I was to do. I remembered to read for the Bar, but I became restless, and thought how could I spend the best hours of my life in the pleasures and honors of this world, while thousands and thousands of souls are perishing every day without having heard of the Lord Jesus Christ, and going down to Christless and hopeless graves. I remember about this time reading which stated that if Christians were consistent their whole lives should be given up to going about the world doing good. It went on to say that they should consider the pleasures, honors, and riches of this world as dross, and that their whole lives should be spent in pleading that men might come and be reconciled to God through the Lord Jesus Christ. I at once saw that the atheist's view is the truly consistent light, and I determined that from that time forth, with God's help, my life should be a consistent one.

"Just then a great friend of mine asked me to go to a Bible reading with him; and he said, 'Have you heard of the extraordinary blessing so and so has received lately?' 'No, I have not,' I replied. Well, he told me she had been an earnest Christian worker for years, but God had given her lately such a blessing that, although she had much trouble, nothing seemed to ruffle her peace. We resolved to look into the Bible and see if God really promised such a blessing as this. We found He had promised a 'peace that passeth understanding'—and our peace did not go beyond comprehension—and a 'joy unspeakable'—and we had no such joy. We wanted this peace and joy, and knelt together to ask it, and then we separated. When I got home I fell on my knees, and asked God to give me this great blessing. After I rose from my knees, my eyes fell on a book, entitled 'The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life.' Why, that was the very thing I wanted! I opened it, and saw it was nothing more or less than a gift, and further, I saw I had not received it because I had not made room for it. I found I had been keeping back what was not my own, but really belonged to Him who gave His life for me; so there and then I gave myself up to Him, in the words of Miss Havergal's hymn—

'Take my life, and let it be Consecrated, Lord, to Thee;
Take my moments and my days,
Let them flow in ceaseless praise.'

So I gave up to Him my hands, my feet, my voice, my goods, my all. I found that, when I thus yielded to Him, He did give me the 'peace that passeth understanding,' and the 'joy unspeakable.' Well, it was not very long before God led me to determine to go to China. I had never thought of going there before. England had seemed big enough and good enough for me; but everything went out of my heart.

AND CHINA CAME IN.

Some friends of mine said one day, 'Are you going to hear Mr. McCarthy to-morrow?' 'Who is he?' I inquired. 'He is the man that walked across China,' was the reply. 'Well,' I thought, 'if he walked across China, he's certainly worth going to hear.' Next day my friend Stanley Smith came to the house, and I asked if he was going to hear Mr. McCarthy. He said he was, and we went together. I thank God He led me to that meeting. I was greatly stirred by what I heard; but I meant to be cautious. We sang—

'He leadeth me! He leadeth me!
By his own hand He leadeth me;
His faithful follower I would be,
For by His hand He leadeth me.'

"I plainly recognized, however, that God was leading me to China, but I said I won't decide here and now, but wait until I get home and make sure that it is God's leading. I asked Him for definite guidance, and He gave it me in these words, 'A man's foes shall be they of his own household.' I knew only one thing could keep me back, and that was my mother's love. I went and told my eldest brother, 'The Lord hath told me to go to China, and I am going.' He did not see it at first, but we prayed over it, and I shall never forget the solemn way in which my brother asked that God would convince me at once whether it was His will or not that I should serve Him in China. I went back to my room, and after reading the Bible for some time, I got into my bed, but could not sleep! For two hours I lay awake, and when at length I dozed twenty times or more I would awake, and this verse kept running through my mind, 'Ask of me and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession.' I had not read the verse for months. I knew it was the voice of God speaking to me, and telling me in answer to prayer what I should do, telling me to go to Hudson Taylor and say, 'If you are willing to take me, then

I AM WILLING TO GO.'

I cannot tell you how the Lord has flooded my soul with blessing since I resolved to follow Him where He is leading. Let me say to you it is easy to follow if you only yield yourselves to God. 'How long halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow Him.' Let us follow Him fully. God or the world! which is it to be? Will you not come right out and yield to Him? Remember, you are only going to be on earth a very short time, eternity is coming very soon; which are you living for? God grant His power may flood England, and that thousands may arise and go and tell of Christ to the perishing nations who are dying without Christ and without hope."

The Rev. Hugh Price Hughes having spoken, the Rev. J. T. Waller commended the outgoing missionaries to God in prayer. With hearty handshakings and promises that unceasing prayers should be offered to God for them, the devoted young men bade all friends farewell, and the next morning commenced their journey to China.

A CONVERTED GERMAN INFIDEL'S SUCCESSES.

MR. VON SCHLUEMBACH, the converted German infidel, whose work in New York is well known and has now been crowned by the organization of a German Young Men's Christian Association, has been laboring in evangelical work for a considerable time in Berlin. The conservatism of some of the Lutheran State Church clergy necessitated the utmost caution, and although Dr. Stocker, the court chaplain and Jew-baiter, Professor Christlieb, and a few others supported the movement, it was carried on with great quietness. Halls were rented in the most obscure and poorest parts of the city, handbills carried to the homes of the people, but no announcements were made through the public press. Meetings were for some time conducted in six different parts of the city. The largest halls that were available were crowded by poor people, who stood, hungry and weary, listening to hear the word of God.

After months spent in such labor, a clergyman invited the evangelist to speak in his church. This called out a warning in a religious paper against these novelties, with the Latin quotation of church law, forbidding any man to preach who had not passed the regular theological examination. But the storm blew over, and the work went on.

In the northern portion of Berlin stood the old Fursten Blucher, a notoriously disreputable dance-hall, where the most vicious and degraded people of the city gathered, especially on Sunday night, for purposes of dancing, drunkenness, and debauchery. Hardly a Sunday evening passed without bloodshed, and on January 2d, 1883, the tumult was so outrageous that the military were called in to clear the hall. That ended the dancing, and on the third of January the hall was purchased for $21,000 for a Christian Association Hall, receiving its new name, Christlich Vereint House. Its walls were hung with Scripture mottoes, and the place that so long had echoed sounds of drunken revelry, is now resounding with Gospel hymns.

The time of private meetings is now over. The new association has been recognized and sanctioned by the highest personages in the empire. The Emperor has given $500, the Empress $125, and the Crown-Prince $75, to its funds. The work of the evangelist was then publicly applauded, and the most aristocratic churches threw wide their doors to receive the man whom royalty had honored. The rooms of the association were soon opened; noblemen, high professors, and pastors were present, the most prominent society of Berlin gave hearty support to the enterprise, and a candle has been lighted which we trust may shed its beams far and wide through the German Empire.

Mr. Schluembach, after a brief period of work among Germans in London, has again returned to Germany. None can tell the value of the work he is doing; there is no antidote so successful as that Herr Schluembach presents with convincing force to his countrymen, to the rapidly spreading socialistic doctrines which constitute the greatest danger in our time to the welfare of society. Germans are the leaders in this anarchical crusade, and in converting them to Christianity Herr Schluembach is serving his country and the whole world. The will of the wisp of political and social brotherhood and the equality of men cannot be realized in this world, though men labor and sacrifice their own lives and shed a sea of blood to attain it; but the instincts which lead the best of the socialists to seek it can find supreme satisfaction in a religion which has but one door for all, and which admits the poor more easily than the rich. There is hope for the world in this mission, and we wish that in all countries a similar effort to reach the foes of society was in progress.

THE QUEEN OF FESTIVALS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, April 5, 1885.

"Death is swallowed up in victory."—1 COR. 15: 54.

ABOUT eighteen hundred and fifty-one Easter mornings have awakened the earth. In France for three centuries the almanacs made the year begin at Easter, until Charles IX. made the year begin at January 1st. In the Tower of London there is a royal pay-roll of Edward I., on which there is an entry of eighteen pence for four hundred colored and pictured Easter eggs, with which the people sported. In Russia, slaves were fed and alms were distributed on Easter. Ecclesiastical councils met at Pontus, at Gaul, at Rome, at Achaia to decide the particular day, and after a controversy, more animated than gracious, decided it, and now through all Christendom, in some way the first Sunday after the full moon which happens upon or next after March 21st, is filled with Easter rejoicing.

THE ROYAL COURT

of the Sabbaths is made up of fifty-two. Fifty-one are princes in the royal household, but Easter is queen. She wears richer diadem, and sways a more jewelled sceptre, and in her smile nations are irradiated. Unusually welcome this year because of the harsh winter and the late spring, she seems to step out of the snow-bank rather than the conservatory, come out of the North instead of the South, out of the Arctic rather than the tropics, dismounting from the icy equinox; but welcome this queenly day, holding high up in her right hand the wrenched-off bolt of Christ's sepulchre, and holding high in her left hand the key to all the cemeteries in Christendom.

My text is an ejaculation. It is

SPUN OUT OF HALLELUJAHS.

Paul wrote right on in his argument about the resurrection and observed all the laws of logic; but when he came to write the words of the text, his fingers and his pen and the parchment on which he wrote took fire, and he cried out, "Death is swallowed up in victory!"

It is an exciting thing to see and flying. They run each other down. They scatter everything valuable in the track. Unheeded artillery. Hoof of horse on breast of wounded and dying man. You have read of the French falling back from Sedan, or Napoleon's track of ninety thousand corpses in the snow-banks of Russia, or of the retreat of our own armies from Manassas, or of the five kings tumbling over the rocks of Bethoran with their armies, while the hail-storms of Heaven and the swords of Joshua's host struck them with their fury. In my text is

AN ARMY ROUTED

A WORSE DISCOMFITURE.

It seems that a black giant proposed to conquer the earth. He gathered for his host all the aches and pains and malarias and cancers and distempers, and epidemics of the ages. He marched them down, drilling them in the north-east wind and amid the slush of tempests. He threw up barricades of grave-mound. He pitched tent of charnel house. Some of the troops marched with slow tread commanded by consumptions, some in double-quick, commanded by pneumonias. Some he took by long besiegement of evil habit, and some by one stroke of the battle-axe of casualty. With bony hand he pounded at the door of hospitals and sick rooms, and won all the victories in all the great battlefields of all the five continents. Forward march, the conqueror of conquerors, and all the generals and commanders-in-chief, and all presidents and kings and sultans and czars drop under the feet of his war-charger. But one Christmas night his antagonist was born. As most of the plagues and sicknesses and despotisms come out of the East, it was appropriate that should come out of the same quarter. Power is given Him to awaken all the fallen of all the centuries and of all lands, and marshal them against the black giant. Fields have already been won, but the last day of the world's existence will see the decisive battle. When Christ shall lead forth His two brigades, the brigade of the risen dead and the brigade of the celestial host, the black giant will fall back, and the brigade from the risen sepulchres will take Him from beneath and the brigade of descending immortals will take Him from above, and death shall be swallowed up in

VICTORY.

The old brag that threatened the conquest and demolition of the planet has lost his throne, has lost his sceptre, has lost his palace, has lost his prestige, and the one word written over all the gates of mausoleum and catacomb and necropolis, on cenotaph and sarcophagus, on the lonely khan of the Arctic explorer, and on the catafalque of great cathedral, written in capitals of azalia and calla lily, written in musical cadence, written in doxology of great assemblages, written on the sculptured door of the family vault, is "victory." Coronal word, embannered word, apocalyptic word, chief word of triumphal arch under which conquerors return.

Victory! Word shouted at Cluloden and Balaklava and Blenheim, at Megiddo and Solferino, at Marathon, where the Athenians drove back the Medes; at Poitiers, where Charles Martel broke the ranks of the Saracens; at Salamis, where Themistocles in the great sea-fight confounded the Persians, and at the door of the Eastern cavern of chiselled rock, where Christ came out through a recess and throttled the King of Terrors, and put him back in the niche from which the celestial Conqueror had just emerged. Aha! when the jaws of the Eastern mausoleum took down the black giant "death was swallowed up in victory." I proclaim

THE ABOLITION OF DEATH.

The old antagonist is driven back into mythology with all the lore about Stygian ferry and Charon with oar and boat. Melrose Abbey and Kenilworth Castle are no more in ruins than is the sepulchre. We shall have no more to do with death than we have with the cloak-room at a governor's or President's levee. We stop at such cloak-room and leave in charge of a servant our overcoat, our overshoes, our outward apparel, that we may not be impeded in the brilliant round of the drawing-room. Well, my friends, when we go out of this world we are going to a King's banquet, and to a reception of monarchs, and at the door of the tomb we leave and the wrappings with which we meet the storms of this world. At the close of an earthly reception, under the brush and broom of the porter the coat or hat may be handed to us better than when we resigned it, and the cloak of humanity will finally be returned to us improved and brightened and purified and glorified.

You and I do not want our bodies returned as they are now. We want to get rid of all their weaknesses and all their susceptibilities to fatigue and all their slowness of locomotion. They will be put through a chemistry of soil and heat and cold and changing seasons out of which God will reconstruct them as much better than they are now as the body of the rosiest and healthiest child that bounds over the lawn at Prospect Park is better than the sickest patient in Bellevue Hospital. But we will cross right over, not waiting for obsequies, independent of obituary, into a state in every way better, with wider room and velocities beyond computation; the dullest of us into companionship with the very best spirits in their very best mood, in the very parlor of the universe, the four walls burnished and panelled and pictured and glorified with all the splendors that the infinite God in all the ages has been able to invent. Victory!

This view of course makes it of but little importance whether we are

CREMATED OR SEPULTURED.

If the latter is dust to dust, the former is ashes to ashes. If any prefer incineration let them have it without caricature. The world may become so crowded that cremation may be universally adopted by law as well as by general consent. Many of the mightiest and best spirits have gone through this process. Thousands and tens of thousands of God's children have been cremated—P. P. Bliss and wife, the evangelistic singers, cremated by accident at Ashtabula Bridge; John Rodgers, cremated by persecution; Latimer and Ridley, cremated at Oxford; Pothinus, and Blandina, a slave, and Alexander, a physician and his comrades cremated at the order of Marcus Aurelius—at least a hundred thousand of Christ's disciples cremated, and there can be no doubt about the resurrection of their bodies. If the world lasts as much longer as it has already been built, there perhaps may be no room for the large acreage set apart for resting-places, but that time has not come. Plenty of room yet, and the race need not pass that bridge of fire until it comes to it. The most of us prefer the old way. But whether out of natural disintegration or cremation we shall get that luminous, buoyant, gladsome, transcendent, magnificent, inexplicable structure called you will have it, I will have it. I say to you today, as Paul said to Agrippa: "Why should it be thought, a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead?" That far-up cloud, higher than the hawk flies, higher than the eagle flies, what is it made of? Drops of water from the Hudson, other drops from the East River, other drops from a stagnant pool out on Newark flats—Up yonder there, embodied in a cloud and the sun kindles it. If God can make such a lustrous cloud out of water drops, many of them soiled and impure and fetched from miles away, can He not transport the fragments of a human body from the earth and out of them build a radiant body? Cannot God, who owns all the material out of which bones and muscle and flesh are made, set them up again if they have fallen? If a manufacturer of telescopes drop a telescope on the floor and it breaks, can he not mend it again so you can see through it? And if God drops the human eye into the dust, the eye which he originally fashioned, can He not restore it? Aye, if the manufacturer of the telescope by a change of the glass and a change of focus can make a better glass than that which was originally constructed, and actually improve it, do you not think the Fashioner of the human eye may improve its sight and multiply the natural eye by the thousandfold additional forces of the resurrection eye?

RESURRECTION IN NATURE.

"Why should it be thought with you an incredible thing that God should raise the dead?" Things all around us suggest it. Out of what grew all these flowers? Out of the mould and the earth. Resurrected! Resurrected! The radiant butterfly, where did it come from? The loathsome caterpillar. That albatross that smites the tempest with its wind, where did it come from? A senseless shell. Near Bergerac, France, in a Celtic tomb under a block were found flower seed that had been buried two thousand years. The explorer took the flower seed and planted it, and it came up; it bloomed in bluebell and heliotrope. Two thousand years ago buried, yet resurrected. A traveller says he found in a mummy-pit in Egypt garden peas that had been buried there three thousand years ago. He brought them out and on the 4th of June, 1844, he planted them, and in thirty days they sprang up. Buried three thousand years, yet resurrected. "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?"

Where did all this silk come from—the silk that adorns your persons and your homes? In the hollow of a staff a Greek missionary brought from China to Europe the progenitors of those worms that now supply the silk markets of many nations. The pageantry of bannered host and the luxurious articles of commercial emporium blazing out from the silk worms. And who shall be surprised if out of this insignificant earthly body, this insignificant earthly life, our bodies unfold into something worthy of the coming eternities? Put silver into diluted nitre and it dissolves. Is the silver gone forever? No. Put in some pieces of copper and the silver reappears. If one force dissolves another force organizes.

"Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?" The insects flew and the worms crawled last autumn feeble and feeble, and then stopped. They have taken no food, they want none. They lay dormant and insensible, but soon the south wind will blow the resurrection trumpet, and the air and the earth will be full of them. Do you not think that God can do as much for our bodies as He does for the wasps and the spiders and the snails? This morning at half-past four o'clock there was a resurrection. Out of the night, the day. In a few weeks there will be a resurrection in all our gardens. Why not some day a resurrection amid all the graves?

Ever and anon there are instances of men and women entranced.

A TRANCE

is death followed by resurrection after a few days; total suspension of mental power and voluntary action. Rev. William Tennent, a great evangelist of the last generation, of whom Dr. Archibald Alexander, a man far from being sentimental, wrote in most eulogistic terms. Rev. William Tennent seemed to die. His spirit departed. "People came in day after day and said: 'He is dead, he is dead.' But the soul that fled returned, and William Tennent lived to write out the experiences of what he had seen while his soul was gone. It may be found some time that what is called suspended animation or comatose state is brief death, giving the soul an excursion into the next world from which it comes back, a furlough of a few hours granted from the conflict of life to which it must return. Do not this waking up of men from trance, and this waking up of insects from winter lifelessness, and this waking up of grains buried three thousand years ago, make it easier for you to believe that your body and mine after the vacation of the grave shall rouse and rally, though there be three thousand years between our last breath and the sounding of Physiologists tell us that while the most of our bodies are built with such wonderful economy that we can spare nothing, and the loss of a finger is a hindrance, and the injury of a toe-joint makes us lame, still that we have two or three useless physical apparati, and no anatomist or physiologist has ever been able to tell what they are good for. They are no doubt the foundation of the resurrection body, worth nothing to us in this state, to be indispensably valuable in the next state. The Jewish rabbins had only a hint of this suggestion when they said that in the human frame there was a small bone which they said was to be the basis of the resurrection body. Perhaps that may have been a delusion. But this thing is certain, the Christian scientists of our day have found out that there are two or three superfluities of body that are something gloriously suggestive of another state.

I called at my friend's house one summer day. I found the yard all piled-up with the rubbish of carpenter and mason's work. The door was off. The plumbers had torn up the floor. The roof was being lifted in cupola. All the pictures were gone, and the paper-hangers were doing their work. All the modern improvements were being introduced into that dwelling. There was not a room in the house fit to live in at that time, although a month before when I visited that house everything was so beautiful I could not have suggested an improvement. My friend had gone with his family to the Holy Land, expecting to come back at the end of six months, when the building was to be done. And oh, what was his joy when at the end of six months, he returned and was enlarged and improved and glorified. That is your body. It looks well now—all the rooms filled with health, and we could hardly make a suggestion. But after awhile your soul will go to the Holy Land, and while you are gone the old house of your tabernacle will be entirely reconstituted from cellar to attic, and every nerve, muscle and bone and tissue and artery must be hauled over, and the old structure will be burnished and adorned and raised and cupolaed and enlarged, and all the improvements of Heaven introduced and you will move into it on resurrection day. For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. Oh, what a day

WHEN BODY AND SOUL MEET AGAIN!

They are very fond of each other. Did your body ever have a pain and your soul not pity it? or your body have a joy and your soul not re-echo it? or, changing the question, did your soul ever have any trouble and your body not sympathize with it? growing wan and weak under the depressing influence. Or did your soul ever have a gladness but your body celebrated it with kindled eye and cheek and elastic step? Surely God never intended two such good friends to be very long separated. And so when the world's last the soul will descend, crying, "Where is my body?" and the body will ascend, saying, "Where is my soul?" and the Lord of the resurrection will bring them together, and it will be a perfect soul in a perfect body, introduced by a perfect Christ into a perfect heaven. Victory! Do you wonder that to-day we swathe this house with garlands? Do you wonder we celebrate it with the most consecrated voice of song that we can invite, and with the dearest fingers on organ and cornet, and with doxologies that beat these arches with the billows of sound as the sea smites the basalt at Giant's Causeway? Only the bad disapprove of the resurrection.

A CRUEL HEATHEN WARRIOR

heard Mr. Moffat, the missionary, preach about the resurrection, and he said to the missionary; "Will my father rise in the last day?" "Yes," said the missionary. "Will all the dead in battle rise?" said the cruel chieftain. "Yes," said the missionary. Then said the warrior, "Let me hear no more about the resurrection day. There can be no resurrection, there shall be no resurrection. I have slain thousands in battle. Will they rise?" Ah, there will be more to rise on that day than those who want to see whose crimes have never been repented of. But for all others who allowed Christ to be their pardon and their life and their resurrection it will be

A DAY OF VICTORY.

The thunders of the last day will be the salvo that greets you into harbor. The lightnings will be only the torches of triumphal procession marching down to escort you home. The burning worlds flashing through immensity will be the rockets celebrating your coronation on thrones where you will reign forever and forever and forever. Where is death? What have we to do with death? As your reunited body and soul swing off from this planet on that last day you will see deep gashes all up and down the hills, deep gashes all through the valleys, and they will be the emptied graves, they will be the abandoned sepulchres, with rough ground tossed on either side of them, and slabs will lie uneven on the rent hillocks, and there will be fallen monuments and cenotaphs, and then for the first you will appreciate the full exhilaration of the text, "Death is swallowed up in victory."

"Hail the Lord of earth and heaven!
Praise to Thee by both be given;
Thee we greet triumphant now,
Hail the resurrection Thou!"

Special Services have been Held during the past six weeks at the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church of Chicago by the Rev. Thomas Harrison (the boy preacher). On April 3d a remarkable jubilee service was held, in which the new converts to the number of five hundred took part. An extensive work of grace has been going on in the city since New Year's day. Large accessions have taken place in all the churches.

The President's Selection of a Church has occasioned some surprise in Washington. He has taken a pew in the Presbyterian Church of which the Rev. Byron Sunderland is pastor. The Washington correspondent of the New York Sun thus explains the selection: "Thirty-five years ago Dr. Sunderland was pastor of a Presbyterian Church in Buffalo, and came from that city to Washington. Among those who attended his church there was Mrs. Cleveland, the President's mother, and in all probability the little boy Grover was often taken to hear the man who will now preach to him as President. Miss Cleveland, some days ago, recalled to the President's mind the many times she had heard her mother speak in warmest terms of regard for the pastor, Byron Sunderland, who was then noted for his impassioned eloquence and sturdy zeal.

Free Quarters at a Virginia Hotel were En-joyed by a New York merchant recently. The New Yorker alighted at the hotel, and having registered and inspected his room, proceeded to explore the neighborhood. Day after day passed and the visitor seemed to be enjoying Virginia with a great deal of zest. When he finally made up his mind to move homeward again he tripped once more to the clerk's desk, this time to ask for his bill. He gave his name and the number of his room, but the clerk said he had no bill for him. "No bill? why, what are you talking about. Do you know how long I've been here, Mr. Clerk?" "Yes, sir, I do know; but I have orders from headquarters to take none of your money—not a cent." The New Yorker then sought the proprietor and asked for an explanation. To his surprise the guest found himself heartily grasped by the hand. "Don't remember me, eh?" said the hotel man. "Well, let me recall a little incident which happened when I was struggling along in the world years and years back. You belonged to one of the leading wholesale drug firms in Maiden Lane, and I was the driver of an express wagon. One day I had to unload some packages going from your store to some Western town. My horses were scared just as I was handling the goods, and one package was dumped to the ground and broken. At headquarters I was told that I'd have to make good the loss, a little matter of $20 or so, which meant a great deal to me. With a sore heart I went down to your store the next day to ask what was the lowest figure at which I could settle, and you, without a moment's hesitation, told me that I need not pay one cent, that you could stand the loss better than I could, and that must be the end of it. But it isn't the end of it, all the same, for I'm making a round $100 a day down here now, though if I wasn't making a cent I would not let you pay for anything under my roof, if you stayed here the whole year through." Many instances are related of bread cast upon the waters thus returning after many days, but acts of kindness to the poor are often uncompensated in this life. That, however, as the hotel man said, though in another sense, is not the end of it (Luke 14: 13, 14).

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Satan's Fatal Falsehood.—At a recent Meeting a Scotch pastor said: "In Edinburgh some years ago, when I was quite a young man, I was working for the Lord in a meeting such as this. A case came under my notice of one who, in great distress of soul on account of sin, said: 'It is too late!' Just a second lie of the devil. And when, shortly afterward, she was stretched upon her death-bed, loving friends bent over her sweetly, telling her of forgiveness through a crucified Saviour; but her only sad answer was, 'It is too late!' I shall never forget that pale face and those petrified lips as she died, exclaiming, 'It is too late! too late!' What a warning for us all! 'Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation.' Boast not thyself of to-morrow."

All Saved from a Wreck.—A Christian worker said: "One very dark stormy night a ship was wrecked on the Scotch coast, and several brave men manned the life-boat, and went at once to the assistance of the crew who were in peril. After leaving the harbor, the boat rounded a point, and for a time was lost sight of by the excited watchers on shore, but very soon it reappeared, and the people, straining their eyes seaward, saw a man standing in the bow of the life-boat and crying aloud, 'All saved! all saved!' and soon the precious freight reached the harbor in safety. I wonder when we shall raise our voices with the glad tidings 'All saved! all saved!' All the family saved! All our friends saved! Oh, for the time when righteousness shall flow like a river, and when Satan shall be cast into the lake of fire forever!"

An Obedient Minister.—The Rev. Mr. Ross related that the Rev. Dr. McDonald in all his sermons preached the divine sovereignty, and expected to see souls converted to Christ at every service. One of those persons who are always prone to find fault with others, and their mode of doing the Lord's work, asked him why he always preached divine sovereignty, and yet expected to see souls saved at every service, when he knew that the people had not the power to save themselves. "Why is it?" said Dr. McDonald, "because I am told by God to do so. I just do what I am told, and leave the results with Him whose Word I preach. I have no power of myself to save the people." They were standing in a graveyard, and Dr. McDonald pointing to the graves, said: "Should the Lord order me to command these dead to arise I would do so, and fully expect to see them all rising from the grave."

An Old Man Gathering Sticks.—Mr. Steel said: "A parable is told of an old man, an angel, and another individual who were in a forest. The old man was gathering sticks, and after he had gathered a quantity together, he lifted them to try if he could carry them. He was able with an effort to lift his bundle, but he laid it down, and proceeded to gather more. He added so many to the bundle that he was now absolutely unable to lift the load. Night came on, and the weary old man lay down by the side of his bundle and fell asleep, and perished there. The person accompanying the angel, who was standing by, inquired of his celestial companion the meaning of this, and he answered: 'This scene shows how people carry about a burden of sin, already too heavy for them; but they continue adding sin to sin, until the burden becomes too heavy, and they sink beneath its load, and go to that world where God has forgotten to be merciful.'"

A Man without Any Hope.—The Rev. Mr. Carstairs tells us: "Some time ago I was speaking to a man about eternal matters, and he said, 'No, there is no hope for me, no!' 'That is strange,' I said, 'because it is just what the Lord has said about you.' He gave me such a look as if to say, 'Is that all the comfort you can give me? I at any rate expected sympathy from you.' For people who say such things really do not believe what they say themselves; but they seem to have a morbid satisfaction in making the very worst of themselves. I directed him to Jer. 2: 25, 'But thou saidst: There is no hope;' and to Jer. 2: 19, 'Thine own wickedness shall correct thee, and thy backsliding reprove thee,' etc. 'And you have well said, there is no hope; no, because if you continue in your sin you will not be able to answer for one of your countless sins.' 'Do not think,' he said, 'I never wished to be better. I have tried it, and even gone to my knees; but when I tried to utter a word it seemed as though I should choke, and I could not pray.' And in great distress he added: 'Oh, I believe I have sinned the sin against the Holy Ghost, and I shall not be forgiven.' I prayed for him, and God had mercy on that soul, and led him to trust in Christ as his Saviour."

Three Vows Made to Mother.—Mr. Ferry Related: "I heard recently of a worker who was called in to see a man who was dying. When he reached his bedside the dying man, looking at him, said, 'Oh, I am afraid I am lost; I have broken the vows which I made to a dying mother.' 'And what were they?' asked the worker. 'Before she died she called me to her bedside, and made me make three promises to her; the first was, that I would never let a day pass without reading my Bible and praying to God; the second was, that I would go to church every Sunday; and the third and last was, that I would meet her in heaven; and not one of these vows have I kept.' 'It is now past your power to keep the two first vows,' answered the worker, 'but the third one you can still keep.' After telling him to flee to the Saviour, and asking prayer for him, the man was enabled to cry, 'God be merciful to me a sinner,' and we have no doubt he kept his third vow, and met his mother in heaven."

A Hungry Man's Lament.—Dr. Cameron Related: "In an evangelistic meeting last night I noticed a young man who looked very much troubled. At the end of the meeting I spoke to him, and he said: 'I am just going empty away, as I have done hundreds of times before. I have been attending meetings for more than a year, and each time I go empty away. I do not understand this love of which you so confidently speak.' Whose fault is it that you are going empty away? Is it the speakers' or is it mine?' 'No,' he replied, 'it is neither.' I then said: 'If a starving man were to come to a free breakfast, and find the tables loaded, and yet go away without satisfying his hunger, whose fault would it be? Would it be the fault of the people who supplied and prepared the food?' 'No,' he answered, 'it would not be their fault.' 'Is the food, then, not good enough?' 'No,' he replied, 'the food is very good.' 'Well,' I said, 'it is just the same with you; the food is provided, why not take it? It is a free gift. He did take it that very moment, and went away trusting in the Saviour, whose love flashed upon him as a bright revelation, and filled him with a satisfying joy.'"

A Dying Girl's Frenzy.—A Well-Known friend of evangelistic work observes: "An earnest Christian worker told me the other day of a visit he had paid to one who was dying without hope. When he stood by her and tried to speak to her of Jesus, that dying girl, on the threshold of the eternal world, uttered a shriek and exclaimed: 'Oh, don't speak to me! don't speak to me!' 'But I must speak to you about the love of Jesus and His willingness to save, even unto the uttermost,' said the Christian worker; but she continued to cry, 'Don't speak to me! Don't speak to me! Take away that nian, and don't let him speak to me.' My friend replied tenderly, 'You will let me pray?' And he and a friend that was with him knelt down; but when he tried to pray, not a word could he utter; his tongue seemed to cleave to the roof of his mouth. His friend, thinking that his heart was too full to speak, tried to pray, but the only words which he could say were, 'O Lord! O Lord!' Their tongues seemed to be tied, and speech to fail them, and they had to rise from their knees without prayer, even in thought, for they could not think, and they went away from the house weeping bitter tears for the dying girl they had left in that awful condition."

JEWISH EXILE AND RECALL.

By the Rev. E. J. Hytche.

Moses on the Dispersion—Never to Become Extinct as a Race.—The Dispersion to End—Judah and Israel to be United in the Millennium—Distinctions between the Houses—The Present Indifference Predicted—Number of Jews in the World and in Palestine.

THE great Hebrew lawgiver, Moses, about fifteen hundred years before the Christian era, in his valedictory charge to the Israelites, said that (Deut. 4: 25-27), "When Israel shall beget children and children's children, ye shall have remained long in the land, and shall correct yourselves, and make a graven image, and shalt do evil in the sight of Jehovah thy God to provoke Him to anger—Jehovah shall scatter you among the nations, and ye shall be left few in number among the Gentiles, whither Jehovah shall lead you."

TWO SUCH SCATTERINGS OF THE JEWS, consequent on the violation of the covenant of the Jews to serve God loyally and continuously are recorded in the national annals known as the Book of Kings. The first occurred under the Assyrian king Shalmaneser (II Kings 18: 11), who "carried away Israel unto Assyria, and put them in Halah, and in Habor, by the river of Gozan, and in the city of the Medes; because they obeyed not the voice of Jehovah their God, but transgressed the covenant." This expatriation into Central Asia mainly concerned the ten tribes, whose whole history had been one of disobedience and idolatry. The remaining two tribes were about one hundred years after this even also punished by exile, as predicted by Moses, for similar violations of the national covenant with God.

THE LAST DISPERSION OF THE JEWS under Titus need not be referred to, save to say that whenever we see the Jews we have a practical proof that their expatriation was not a mere allegory of their national ruin, but a terrible literal fulfilment of Old Testament prophecies beginning with Moses and ending with Malachi. But whether of the tribe of Judah, or of Ephraim, the Israelites were, in the design of God, never to become extinct as a distinct race. There are many definite promises that, whether they be Judahites, or the sons of Ephraim, and that at an assigned period. One prediction will suffice to show this fact (Deut. 30: 1-5): "For when they shall return unto Jehovah, their God, and shall obey thy voice according to all that I command thee—thou and thy children, with all thy heart and all thy soul"—then as a result of such national penitence God says, "I will have compassion on thee, and will return and gather them from all the nations, and will return and gather thee whither the Lord thy God hath scattered thee. If any of thee be driven unto the utmost parts of heaven, from thence will the Lord thy God gather thee, and from thence He will fetch thee. Yet after all, this is but a specimen of the teaching of all the Hebrew prophets, from Isaiah to Malachi, as to the future national existence and the restoration of the Jews when "the times" or the reign of the Gentiles shall come to an end.

DURING THE MILLENNIAL AGE

they will—as in the days of David and Solomon—become one nation. For the divine promise, by the pen of Ezekiel, has never been fulfilled (Ezek. 37: 15-23), "I will take the children of Israel from among the Gentiles whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land, and I will make them one nation upon the mountains of Israel: and one king shall be king to them all; and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all." Thus will the parabolical "sticks" of Judah and of Ephraim be once more united.

There is a noticeable contrast between the dispersion and recall of Judah and that of Ephraim, consequent on their different expatriations by halmenezar and Nebuchadnezzar. This distinction between the ten and the two tribes is poignantly expressed by Isaiah when he intimated that God (Isa. 11: 12) will "assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth." This fact is further confirmed by the prophecy of Zechariah (12: 1-14), respecting

THE LAST INVESTMENT OF JERUSALEM
Antichrist and his ten vassal kings. For in the penitential mourning of the inhabitants of the besieged city, the only tribes mentioned besides that of Levi are those of Judah and of Benjamin. We may thus infer that it is not until the multitudinous hosts of Antichrist are destroyed by Christ in person (Rev. 19: 11-16), that the ten tribes will be restored, and become one nation with Judah to be disunited no more.

And here a glance at another distinction between the restorations of Judah and of the ten tribes cannot be omitted, as it throws much light on the subject. We learn from Zechariah 12: 6-8) that "in that day (or day of Messiah, say all the Jewish Rabbis rightly affirm) I will take the governors of Judah like a hearth of re, and like a torch of fire in a sheaf, and they shall devour all the Gentiles round about, on the right hand and on the left." There is reason to believe that at first the Judahites will not arrive there en masse, but in units; and hence we read (Jer. 3: 14), "I will take you one of a city, and two of a family, and will bring you to Zion," a phrase synonymous with Jerusalem. The ten tribes, however, will not thus return by elays which may be counted on the fingers; they will be restored not by units, but as a great nation (see Hosea 2: 14, 15).

At present there are but few signs of the approaching restoration of Judah, and much less of Ephraim. Though the bankers of Europe are of Hebrew race, and so to their Fatherland if they pleased by making their financial arrangements conditional on their restoration as a nation, yet they are so immersed in money-getting, or so engrossed by luxury, stentation, or the craving for social distinction, that they do not care for the prophetic future of their race. Unhappily, too, those British Jews who are of a higher type are so influenced by German rationalism that they have either given up, or do not care for the hope of their fathers. But even this fact was predicted, for in Ezekiel's vision of the dry bones it is stated of the whole house of Israel (Ezek. 37: 11), "Behold they are dead, and our hope is lost—our parts are cut off" from any expectation of national revival. Hence, for example, Mr. Claude Montefiore, in a recent article in the Fortnightly Review, entitled "Is Judaism a Moral Religion?" indicates that the Jews are merely the custodians of the doctrines of Monotheism. Thus, too, in the Fortnightly Review of October, 1884, Mr. Lucien Wolf, in a paper entitled "What is Judaism?" represents the Pentateuch to be only a code of health and temporal prosperity, irrespective of any hereafter, a doctrine which he asserts Moses did not teach. It is painful to find that those who ought to be the "men of light and leading" of their kinsmen never advocate a refined Deism which leaves no room for that supernatural element which is the very basis of their marvellous history. Both these leading Jews ignore, even if they believe in, the coming of the Messiah. They also practically deny that doctrine of vicarious sacrifice which permeates the Pentateuch, and which was thus summarized by Moses (Lev. 17: 11), "It is the blood which maketh atonement for the soul."

THE NUMBER OF KNOWN JEWS is variously estimated at from 455,000 to 3,500,000. The last of these statistics are supplied by Volger in his "Manual of Geography," and the first by the "London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews." As the former figures were tabulated by their devoted missionaries—many of whom are of Israelitish descent—they might be accepted as correct, were it not that the four or five millions of Afghan Jews are omitted in their calculation. There are too few Jews at present in Palestine to constitute a distinct nationality, but they have much increased of late years. In 1847 there were only 20,000 in the Holy Land; but in 1884 there were 40,000—or about the number who accompanied Ezra from Persia. Of these 10,000 live in Jerusalem, who are chiefly supported by European Jews.

The noblest of the Benjamites, the apostle Paul, confirmed the predictions of the distinctively Hebrew prophets, and assigns three reasons for their restoration: First (Rom. 11: 25-32): "The gifts and calling of God are without repentance." Second: That "the Jews are still beloved for the fathers' sake." Third: The excision of the Gentiles consequent on the universal apostasy of Christendom. No wonder, then, that when he was instructed to declare the reinstatement of his kinsmen, Paul was constrained to utter an anthem of gratitude: "Oh, the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God—how unsearchable are His judgments, and His way past finding out; for He hath concluded them all (Jews and Gentiles) in unbelief, that He might have mercy on all" (Rom. 11: 32-36)!

THE MOTHER'S LAST JOURNEY.

THE following pathetic picture is from the Detroit Free Press. It tells its own touching story of a sorrow that only faith in Christ can alleviate.

When the doctor came down-stairs from the sick-room of Mrs. Marshall, the whole family seemed to have arranged themselves in the hall to waylay him.

"How soon will mamma dit well?" asked little Clyde, the baby.

"Can mamma come down-stairs next week?" asked Katy, the eldest daughter and the little housekeeper.

"Do you find my wife much better?" asked Mr. Marshall, eagerly. He was a tall, grave man, pale with anxiety and nights of watching.

The doctor did not smile; he did not even stop to answer their questions. "I am in a great hurry," he said, as he took his hat. "I must go to a patient who is dangerously ill. This evening I will call again. I have left instructions with the nurse."

But the nurse's instructions were all concerning the comfort of the patient; she was professionally discreet and silent. The children playing on the stairs were told to make no noise. The gloomy day wore on, and the patient slept and was not disturbed. But that night, before they went to bed, the children were allowed to go in and kiss their mother good-night. This privilege had been denied them lately, and their little hearts responded with joy to the invitation. Mamma was better, or she could not see them. The doctor had cured her. They would love him for it all their lives.

She was very pale but smiling, and her first words to them were: "I am going on a journey."

"A journey," cried the children. "Will you take us with you?"

"No; it is too long a journey."

"Mamma is going to the South," said Katy; "the doctor has ordered her to go. She will get well in the orange groves of Florida."

"I am going to a far-distant country, more beautiful than the lovely South," said the mother, faintly, "and I shall not come back."

"Are you going alone, mamma?" asked Katy.

"No," said the mother, in a low, tremulous voice, "I am not going alone. My Physician goes with me. Kiss me good-by, my dear ones, for in the morning before you are awake I shall be gone. You will come to me when you are made ready, but each must make the journey alone."

In the morning she was gone. When the children awoke their father told them of the beautiful country at which she had safely arrived while they slept.

"How did she go? Who came for her?" they asked, with the tears streaming down their cheeks.

"A messenger from God," their father said, solemnly.

People wonder at the peace and happiness expressed in the faces of these motherless children; when asked about their mother they say, "She has gone on a journey," and every night and morning they read in the book she loved of the land where she now lives, whose inhabitants shall no more say, I am sick, and where God Himself shall wipe all tears from their eyes.

LORD LAWRENCE AND THE MISSIONARY.

AN incident has recently come to light which illustrates the noble character of the late Lord Lawrence, the illustrious Governor-General of India, and shows how true a Christian was the gallant soldier and wise statesman. England has carried to an extreme limit in India her toleration of the religion of the people. She has sanctioned their idolatrous practices, and her viceroys have been so careful to show respect for the native religion that not a few of the people mistake their conduct for personal respect for the doctrines of that religion. Lord Lawrence, however, was never so misunderstood. Every one knew he was a Christian, not in name only, but in heart, and used his influence in his high position to advance the cause of Christ in every way that the regulations of the government permitted.

A small brotherhood of Moravian missionaries had been stationed for some years at Lanou, on the borders of Thibet, and about one hundred miles from Simla, where Lord Lawrence resided as Governor-General of India. Their isolated position, their extreme poverty, and their self-denying labors among a semi-barbarous people were known only to a few; but one of Sir John Lawrence's staff told him how they were accustomed to work in the fields as common peasants, to manufacture their own paper, and to make their own clothes. He suggested that one of the body might be invited for a few days to Peterhoff, the Governor-General's house at Simla, and Lord Lawrence promptly accepting it, an invitation was sent out by special messenger.

The missionary selected by the Moravian brethren to make the visit walked the whole distance. His dress was a coarse suit of brown camel's-hair cloth, which had been woven in the village and cut out and sewed by the brotherhood. He had no shoes, only sandals made of hemp and coarse string, and his whole baggage consisted of a portable coffee-pot in one pocket and his Bible in the other. In the course of conversation Sir John elicited the fact that the greatest hardship, next after the severe cold which the missionaries had to endure, was the want of medicine and candles. The latter articles, in fact, were indispensable to enable them to carry on the work of translating the Bible during the long six months of winter.

A stock of quinine and other medicines was at once obtained from the government dispensary, and a large quantity of half-burned wax candles, amounting to several thousand pieces, which had been accumulating in the store-room of the Government House, was ordered to be melted down in the bazaar and formed into candles of a convenient size. These were the self-appropriated perquisites of a well-paid native servant, who, having no missionary proclivities, was indignant at the use to which the fragments were applied. But the grateful thanks of the missionary, as he departed, with his precious burden strapped on a mule's back, and his last beaming words of joy, "You have given us life and health," have never been forgotten by those who wished him God-speed as he passed out of their sight.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Bulletins Issued by General Grant's physicians day by day last week were eagerly read throughout the country with profound sorrow and unaffected sympathy. There were crowds around the newspaper offices, all anxious to learn the latest news of the illustrious hero, who so calmly and patiently awaited death. Not a few had tears in their eyes, for the feeling of the public toward the sufferer was one of personal admiration and love. Thousands of citizens in all the States shared in the emotion which prompted one man to a pathetic act. On Thursday night, when the General's death was expected hourly, the reporters, who were watching the house in which the dying man lay, saw a middle-aged man who had been pacing in front of the house halt at the stoop; removing his hat, he ascended three or four steps and knelt. Raising his clasped hands, he uttered an earnest prayer, remaining in that posture for several minutes. When he arose he was sobbing, and hurried off toward Fifth Avenue. In all the churches and in thousands of homes that prayer had its echo. But even the prayer was a sad one, for none could pray for his recovery. Though at the close of the week of anxiety the General was slightly better, and on Monday the improvement was continued, it is certain that his death cannot be far distant.

The President's Nomination of Mr. Pearson as Postmaster at New York is one of the most significant events of the day. It is an indication of the growth of public opinion, both in character and power. The President had to decide whether he would yield to the wishes of the people, who demanded the reappointment of Mr. Pearson, or to the wishes of the leaders of the Democratic party, who demanded that the best place in the postal service should be given to a Democrat. The demand of the people indicated that in the matter of the civil service public opinion had undergone a change in character; the compliance of the President was an indication that it had increased in power. The fact encourages the hope that a brighter day has dawned on American politics. A careful study of the events of the past few years shows that this brighter prospect is only accidentally connected with the advent of a Democratic administration. Mr. Blaine, had he been elected, would doubtless have made this very appointment. Its significance consists in the fact that the public notion of the principle which ought to regulate all appointments has changed. That change has been rapid. A few years ago it was not thought an inconsistent thing for President Garfield to put in the New York Custom House a man whose title to the post was that he had rendered valuable service to the new President. The office was regarded as a prize awarded to discharge a personal obligation. The question of Robertson's fitness for the post was but little considered. In Mr. Pearson's case there is no obligation. It is probable that he did not even vote for Mr. Cleveland. But he has proved an efficient postmaster, and on that account alone the people demanded and the President granted his reappointment. This view that Uncle Sam ought to have the best servants available, and that efficiency and honesty are the best qualifications for a candidate for office is unquestionably the right one, and its acceptance will do much to promote the purification of politics.

The Following Important Diplomatic Appointments were made by the President last week: Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary—Thomas J. Jarvis, of North Carolina, to Brazil; Alexander R. Lawton, of Georgia, to Russia; Anthony M. Keiley, of Virginia, to Italy; Ministers Resident and Consuls General—Isaac Bell, Jr., of Rhode Island, to the Netherlands; Rufus Magee, of Indiana, to Sweden and Norway; George W. Merrill, of Nevada, to the Hawaiian Islands; Edward Parke Curtis Lewis, of New Jersey, to Portugal; Rasmus B. Anderson, of Wisconsin, to Denmark; Thomas M. Waller, of Connecticut, at London; Frederick Raine, of Maryland, at Berlin; Edmund Jussen, of Illinois, at Vienna, Austria. The nominees were confirmed with the exception of Mr. Lawton, on whose nomination the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations reported adversely. It was contended that the pardon he received from President Johnson did not make him eligible for office. The President thought otherwise, but in deference to the committee withdrew the nomination. On Thursday the Senate adjourned, leaving about a dozen nominees unconfirmed. They were chiefly internal revenue collectors.

A New Form of Debt Statement has been adopted by Secretary Manning, which presents the national balance-sheet in a less brilliant light than heretofore. On March 1st the "cash balance available" was stated at $152,000,000. The statement of April 1st, after a necessary correction has been made, places it at $11,396,629. The difference is caused by the Secretary of the Treasury deducting from his balance the $100,000 which by the law of 1882 he is required to keep in reserve to maintain specie payments, and the $31,500,000 of fractional and minor coin now in the Treasury, which cannot be regarded as available cash. This leaves a balance of $22,259,029, from which should be deducted as interest accrued but not due, $10,362,396. The statement shows that the government is steadily tending to a condition when it will be unable to pay its obligations in gold, and that the suspension of the silver coinage is becoming an imperative necessity.

The Rebellion in the Northwest is Causing anxiety to the Canadian Government. Riel has received assistance from the Indians, and it is believed that a large number of Fenians are on their way to his camp. At last reports he had nineteen hundred men under his command, of whom seven hundred are Indians. They are all armed, and have six cannon with them. On April 3d a dispatch from Winnipeg, Manitoba, stated that the wires at Battleford had been cut by the rebels, and it was feared that they had burned the town. A correspondent of the New York Herald gives a new version of the trouble. He says that the half breeds sold out the lands granted them by the Dominion Government for anything offered them, and moved back into the Prince Albert country. Here they became dissatisfied and sent to the United States for Riel to visit them, and during his visit, which every one supposed was of a friendly and conciliatory nature, he quietly sowed seeds of disension, which finally culminated in this rebellion. The Dominion authorities expect a long guerilla warfare, which will probably last a year or more.

The Central American Disturbances have taken a more hopeful phase, if recent reports may be relied upon. It is stated that the Guatemalan troops have been routed, and that Barrios is dead. The frontier of San Salvador was crossed on March 30th at El Cocco. There and at San Lorenzo the battle waged fiercely for two days, ending in the defeat of the invaders. The San Salvadorian forces concentrated at Chalchuapa, at which place there was an engagement in which it is stated Barrios was killed. An outrage on the United States flag was a product of these disturbances. Colombian revolutionists at Aspinwall on March 30th seized the steamer Colon, which had a cargo of arms on board. They arrested the captain and purser of the ship and the United States Consul, but afterward released them, on their pledging themselves to deliver the arms on board the Colon. On April 1st the insurgents set fire to the town of Aspinwall and burned it to ashes. The United States and British consulates were among the buildings destroyed. The United States sloop-of-war Galena was crowded with refugees but was unable to protect property. A force of two hundred marines has been dispatched to maintain our treaty rights of transit across the isthmus.

The Anglo-Russian Dispute on the Afghan question assumed a more pacific phase last week. The Russians are adepts in diplomacy and are anxious, if possible, to maintain by peaceful means the advantage they have gained. They have conceded the unimportant demands made by England, but resolutely refuse to withdraw from the disputed districts. It is considered improbable that England will insist on the withdrawal if it is found that firmness will involve war. The Indian press strongly urges war and obviously will regard the fact of Russia remaining unmolested in possession of the territory she has seized, as evidence of the weakness and cowardice of England. That is a dangerous impression to leave undisturbed in the minds of the natives. Meanwhile Lord Dufferin, the Viceroy of India, has succeeded in effecting an arrangement with the Ameer of Afghanistan looking to measures for the resistance of further encroachments. By this arrangement England is to supply him with funds and skilled men to fortify his capital, build new forts on the frontier and place the exposed positions in telegraphic communication. The garrisons are to be composed exclusively of Afghans, but English officers will assist in organizing them. The Ameer has received an invitation to visit the British Court.

The Emperor of Austria Duly Performed the annual ceremony of washing the feet of twelve beggars on April 2d. The ceremony is supposed to show the humility of the monarch. As a matter of fact, no washing takes place. The feet of the twelve men are carefully cleansed before they enter the royal presence, and the monarch, with great condescension, touches their ankles with a wet sponge, after which an archduke applies a towel. If Republican principles continue to spread in Europe as they have done recently, monarchs may have a use for the humiliating lessons the ceremony was intended to teach.

Thy Healer: God's Dealings with Soul and Body, edited by Mrs. M. Baxter, a magazine devoted to holiness and healing, published in London on the first and fifteenth of every month. Copies are sent to subscribers in America direct from Bethshan as soon as printed. Annual subscription, including postage, seventy-five cents. Subscriptions for 1885 should be sent to Mrs. M. Baxter, 10 Drayton Park, Highbury, London, England, or to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, whence they will be forwarded to London.

Prince Bismarck's Seventieth Birthday was celebrated on April 1st in Berlin, with immense enthusiasm. Hundreds of presents were sent to him from all parts of the world some of which are highly valuable. Among them are the golden crown offered by the Emperor, the gold and silver tea-set by the Germans in Russia, the golden sword by the Germans in Constantinople, the silver and gold votive tablet from Munich, and two and a half million marks presented by the people of Germany. There were about fifteen hundred addresses and diplomas presented, most of them artistically gotten up, two being from Colorado. The day was observed as a general holiday, and the city was alive with processions and festivities.

A Severe Reverse has Befallen the French army in Tonquin. On March 30th news was received that on the previous Friday the Chinese forces made a desperate attack upon the entrenched camp which had been established by the French General Négrier between Langson and Kilua, and from which General Négrier had been making reconnaissances beyond the frontier separating Tonquin from China proper. The Chinese drove the French back to Langson and recaptured that town. During this series of fights General Négrier was grievously wounded and the French casualties were very serious. The latest accounts represent the French troops to be in full retreat with the Chinese vigorously pursuing them. A vast quantity of commissary and other stores has been lost. General Négrier received a gunshot wound in the chest. He was brought from the field, but his recovery is doubtful. In Paris the news caused intense excitement, and when the Prime Minister, M. Ferry, asked the Chambers for an appropriation for the war it was refused by a large majority. M. Ferry was hooted and hissed at by a disorderly mob which surrounded the Legislature, and threats of lynching were freely uttered. M. Ferry resigned, and M. Freycinet has been requested by President Grevy to form a Cabinet, but at the end of last week he had been unable to do so. M. Ferry's foes in the Legislature intend to impeach him. The fall of the Ferry ministry indicates that the anarchists of Paris are increasing in number and influence.

The Evacuation of the Soudan by the British forces is believed to be in contemplation. The withdrawal of the expedition from Suakim has already commenced, and it is announced that General Graham, who commands it, has been instructed to open peace negotiations with Osman Digna. The reason assigned is that the climate is fatal to British troops. The announcement is regarded as portending an entire abandonment of the Khartoum enterprise. The withdrawal is ridiculed throughout Europe. The undertaking has been so far an utter failure, fearfully costly in life and money, and without a single result to show for it. General Graham and General McNeill are blamed for their lack of energy and sagacity, and the latter, who owes his appointment to the Queen's friendship, is charged with a total incapacity and foolishness approaching imbecility. The reputation of Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues has fallen to the lowest point in the country in consequence of this disastrous and abortive expedition.

An Extensive Missionary Campaign will be inaugurated in New York in the fall by the Protestant Episcopal Church. The Rev. H. M. Hay Aitken, Canon Wilberforce and Canon Knox Little, the three most eminent evangelical preachers in the Church of England, are expected to visit this country and assist in the services. The arrangements are in charge of a committee of clergymen and laymen, who have prepared a document setting forth the reasons for holding the mission. Some of the reasons are of a practical character and show that the committee realize how much genuine religion would do to solve our most serious social problems. Among the reasons are the following: The evil of class churches and the lack of personal spiritual ministry to the rich; the fact that a large portion of society is loaded down with too much wealth.

Another reason is the evil of late hours, stores open on Saturday nights, the lack of half-holidays, and the wrongs inflicted by employers upon employes, the overweening desire for wealth, resulting in the manifold evils of unscrupulous competition, overwork, underpay, "scamped" work and the mutual enmity between employer and employe.

A Startling Statement about the Washington Monument, a picture of which appeared in this journal on February 26th, is made by the Engineering and Mining Journal, which says: "It appears that the Washington Monument is, after all, founded on quicksand. Since this assertion is based upon the report of Colonel Casey, the engineer who has recently received praise for strengthening the foundations, there can be no doubt of its truth. What must be thought of such a piece of engineering? It appears that nothing but the weight of the soil overlying this two feet thick bed of quicksand prevents the monument from squeezing the sand out from under it; and should it do this a little more on one side than the other, the monument might fall. This is certainly a serious matter and should receive prompt attention, if the facts are as represented by Colonel Casey." It may be hoped that there is some mistake about this report, and that as between the statement and the monument there is a better foundation for the latter than the former. It would be a humiliating thing for the nation and would bring upon us the ridicule of Europe if the monument should fall. The ridicule would, however, be for us, not for Washington himself, whose character is honored the world over. It is different with the monument every man is rearing of himself by his life; if that is built on the sand it is he who suffers (Matt. 7: 26, 27).

A Man Caught by the Nose in a Tree was in a ridiculous as well as a dangerous position in Wisconsin last week. A dispatch from Oshkosh, Wis., dated March 28th, states that a German living there tapped a maple tree with an axe and inserted a wedge. He then stooped to sip the oozing sap. While in this posture his nose was inserted in the slit in the tree. The wedge in some way, probably by his touching it with his forehead in his eagerness, became dislodged and his nose was caught as in a vice. It was two hours before he was discovered and rescued. We often hear of men being led by the nose in the sense of helplessness and foolishness, as when God said He would put a ring in the nose of Sennacherib (Isa. 37: 29) and turn him back by the way he came, but it is rare to hear of a man being caught by the nose as this German was. His situation, however, in its helplessness is a type of many whose desire to sip, but not of a beverage yielded by the maple, leads to their being made prisoners as securely as was the Oshkosh German. They, too, are helpless until He delivers who sets free all captives who appeal to Him (Isa. 61: 1).

Where Was the Garden of Eden Situated? Mr. William F. Warren, in a book recently issued by Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., contends that it was in the North Pole. A very ingenious theory is this he advances, and he supports it by arguments drawn from astronomical geography, geology, botany, zoology, ethnology and comparative mythology. Quoting Darwin, he believes that "in scientific investigations it is permitted to invent an hypothesis, and if it explains various large and independent classes of facts, it rises to the rank of a well-grounded theory." One argument advanced is that from no other part of the world's surface could men have wandered to America, Europe and Asia without having to cross the ocean. Another suggestion is that it explains the strange fascination and attraction the region of the North Pole still exerts over mankind, drawing men toward it in spite of the misery, suffering and death which have attended all the expeditions which have been sent to explore it. Mr. Warren calls his book "Paradise Found." We may leave Mr. Warren and the scientists to settle this question to their own satisfaction; it is curious and interesting, but not practical. The real question that concerns all is how to attain the state of innocence and communion with God which the Bible describes as existing in Eden. Eden may have been at the North Pole, as Mr. Warren supposes, or at the northern base of the Himalayas, as Quatrefores believes, or somewhere else, but Paradise Found is the state into which the Christian enters when, through Christ, he finds peace with God (Rom. 5: 18-21).

Trees that Ward off Disease form the Subject of an interesting article in the Boston Youth's Companion. It mentions, among others, the eucalyptus tree, which is efficacious in preventing malaria. The cause is supposed to be that its thirsty roots drain the soil for many yards around, and that its large leaves exhale an aromatic oil and intercept the malarious germs. An incident shows its efficacy: An officer in India whose troops were often attacked by sickness removed their huts to a place where several large trees grew between them and the swamp, and from that time until the trees were cut down the troops enjoyed excellent health; afterward sickness reappeared. It appears to be only in the case of zymotic diseases that the trees operate as a preventive, but that is of no slight value in many districts. It reminds us that in the symbolical imagery of the Apocalypse we are told that in the midst of the Paradise of God there is a tree whose leaves are for the healing of the nations (Rev. 2: 7, 22: 2).

The Contents of a Fish's Stomach are Described by a writer in the current number of the Gentleman's Magazine, who calls attention to the cannibalistic propensity of fishes. He says: "A few days ago I opened the stomach of a codfish weighing nine and a quarter pounds. I found in it two full-grown herrings, one large whiting, one codling, seven flounders, one small sole and one small skate, all newly swallowed. From the mouth of the whiting a large live worm issued. Besides these there were half-digested remains of other fish, chiefly flounders. All the large-mouthed fishes are curiously voracious and usually cannibals. I have seen a small eel swallow a still smaller eel, head first. It seems horrible to human beings that any creatures should devour others of the same species, but they act according to their nature. Those who closely watch the conduct of the business world and note the principles which govern its motions, often see merciless behavior which indicates a disposition akin to that of the fishes, and a selfish disregard for the interests of others which shows that Christ's teaching has little influence in financial circles (Luke 10: 29-37).

How a Wedding was Deferred is told by the officiating clergyman in the Philadelphia Methodist. He says: "An interesting-looking couple called at the parsonage, and I was requested to celebrate the rite of matrimony, and being assured that they were of proper age, and finding no impediment in the way, the ceremony was commenced. The question, 'Wilt thou have this woman to be thy wedded wife?' etc. was answered promptly and distinctly by the young man, 'I will.' I addressed the young lady: 'Wilt thou have this man to be thy wedded husband?' but there was no response. Again I asked, but still no answer, and the suspense began to be painful. I said that I could not proceed further without an answer in the affirmative, whereupon she said: 'I think I had better consult mother; she knows we have been keeping company, but she doesn't know we are to be married to-night.' They soon left, thoughtful and sad. Some four weeks later they called again, looking bright and cheerful. Mother was willing, and the ceremony was performed." The bride would have saved her lover some humiliation if she had not deferred the consultation quite so long, but it was better to have it then than not at all. Young people contemplating matrimony would often save themselves much misery if they would before the ceremony consult not only mother, but heed what St. Paul has to say on the subject (II Cor. 6: 14).

THE SINGULAR ORIGIN OF A CHRISTIAN MAN.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For we are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them."—EPHESIANS 2:10.

Good Works the Result of Salvation.—Not the Cause of it.—I. God's Workmanship.—A Terrible Combination—No Hope in Unsanctified Development.—His Workmanship from the First—Will be so to the Last—Should Clearly Appear.—II. The Origin a Creation.—Neither Improvement nor Development.—Effected by a Word.—In Christ Jesus.—III. The Object of the Creation—What Good Works are.—The Christian's Walk.—IV. The Preparation.—Personal.—In Circumstances.—By His Grace.

THIS text is written by the apostle as a reason why salvation cannot be a thing of human merit: "not of works, lest any man should boast, for we are His workmanship." The for indicates an argument. It is a conclusive reason why salvation cannot be by our good works, because even when we have an abundance of the best of works, they are far more due to God than to ourselves. We ourselves, in our saved condition, are the workmanship of God, and with each of us the argument holds good—"Not of works, for we are His workmanship." Good works are not the cause of salvation, for they are the result of it, and were contemplated as a result by God when He saved us.

I want, at this time, to call your attention to four things in the text; and if you can carry in your mind's eye the first creation, and the making of Adam, and what he was made for, and where he was put when he was made, it will serve as a background to the picture of the second creation, which I shall attempt to paint. I would dwell upon man as God's workmanship in a still higher sense than by His first making. I would set him forth as created anew "unto good works, which God hath before prepared"—for that is the word properly used in the new translation—"which God hath before prepared that we should walk in them."

I. To begin, then; notice first, the singular origin of a Christian man—of all Christian men, whether Jews or Gentiles; of all Christian men, even if they be the highest apostles, like Paul, or the least of all the family of love, such as we may be. As many as are truly saved, and brought into union with Christ, are the workmanship of God. No Christian in the world is a chance production of nature, or the outcome of evolution, or the result of special circumstances. "By the grace of God I am what I am," may be said by every man who is saved. To nothing can we ascribe the fact that we are in Christ except this—that we are

GOD'S WORKMANSHIP.

Of regeneration we must say once for all, "This is the finger of God." The spiritual life cannot come to us by development from our old nature. I have heard a great deal about evolution and development, but I am afraid that if any one of us were to be developed to our utmost, apart from the grace of God, we should come out worse than before the development began. Our flesh would be apt to produce by evolution something exceedingly brutish and devilish. Mr. Whitefield once raised a great outcry against himself by saying that man by nature was half beast and half devil; I have never seen any reason why the description should be altered; but I have sometimes wondered which was the worse of the two—the devil in the man, or the beast in him.

As to spiritual life coming out of our unregenerated nature, it is impossible. "Out of nothing comes nothing." There is no spiritual life in men dead in trespasses and sins; how then can life come out of them? Out of death truly there comes a something congruous thereto; horrible are the forms of corruption that arise from the body in which death holds sway; but this is dissolution and destruction, and not life. What the corruption of a human soul may be, I cannot attempt to say. Terrible as hell must be, there is nothing in the pit more awful than those who are in it. The lost themselves are more unutterably dreadful than any punishment that justice may have imposed upon them.

DEVELOPED MANHOOD,

developed without any restraining influences, if it be shut up in vast numbers, must be a fermenting mass of hate, envy, malice, lust, cruelty, and pride. Speak of evolution—here it is—"When lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." Darkness never begets light, filth never creates purity, hell never yields heaven, and depravity never produces grace.

But the point is that we are God's workmanship. We are His workmanship from the very first. It was the Lord who first taught us our need of a Saviour, and gave us our sense of sin, and our early tremblings, and our new desires. The faintest breath of spiritual life that was ever breathed by any one of us came from God Himself. We shall remain the Lord's workmanship to the very last. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be." Since, then, we do not even know what we are to be, we cannot intrude into the work, and take the pencil from the hand of the great Artist, and complete His design, but the Author must be the Finisher of what He has begun.

This is very beautiful to remember, and it should stir up all that is within us to magnify the Lord. If it be so, that from the first the Lord has wrought all our works in us, what an amount of patience, what an amount of power, what an amount of skill, what an amount of love, what an amount of grace, has God spent upon us hitherto! I was surprised when I was told, the other day, by a friend, who was a maker of steel-plate engravings, how much of labor had to be put into a finely-executed engraving. Think of the power that has cut lines of beauty in such steel as we are! See how He has continued to work upon us, year after year, with final perseverance of undiminished love! How much more of power will still be needed, and how much more of long suffering, and how much more of careful wisdom, ere we shall be perfect and complete! Happy is it for us that we are His workmanship!

One thing I would say to you who are God's people: if we are His workmanship, never let us be ashamed to let men see God's workmanship in us. "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." Let us be very much ashamed to let them see the remains of in us; hide it behind a veil of repentant grief. Christ has come to destroy it; let it be destroyed. Yet let your simple faith be known and spoken of, even though it be ridiculed by the wise men of the age, who by wisdom know not God. Let your meekness, your kindness, your uprightness, your truth, your purity, appear unto all men. Never let it be a question whether you are a Christian. Do not tremble at the persecution which the enmity of the ungodly may inflict upon you because you belong to Christ, but the rather accept it as an honor, esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt.

As to any of you who hear me at this time, and feel forced to say, "Ah, me! I do not see how I am to be a Christian," let me speak with you. I am thinking of the matter very differently. I see very plainly how you can become Christians; for all of us who are believers are God's workmanship, and that God who has made us His workmanship can make you to be the same. "Oh, but I cannot do anything!" Who said you could? Who asked you to do any part of God's work? We are God's workmanship. There is in your fallen nature no power or will toward good, and if the question were about your workmanship, the answer would be full of despair; but while God works there is hope.

"Oh, but I have a withered hand!" When Jesus bids you stretch it out, do not inquire about your own power, but look to His power who gives the command. Do not say, "I cannot save myself. I cannot make myself holy." Look you, then, to Him who is a Saviour, able to save to the uttermost, who was born for this end, that He might save His people from their sins. What is there that God cannot do for you? Rough material as you are, He can make you what you should be; He can make you what it will delight you to be. God grant that we may learn to look to the strong for strength, and no longer waste our time in inquiring for it where there is nothing but perfect weakness! Here, then, is the origin of a Christian man; he comes out of the workshop of God.

II. Secondly, here in the text we see the peculiar manner of this origin. "We are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus." "Created in Christ Jesus." Catch that thought. Our new life is

A CREATION.

This goes further than the former expression; for workmanship is less than creation. A man may produce a picture, and say, "This is my workmanship;" a piece of mosaic, or a vessel fresh from the wheel, may be a man's workmanship, but it is not his creation. The artist must procure his canvas and his colors, the maker of a mosaic must find his marbles or his wood, the potter must dig his clay, for without these materials he can do nothing; for he is not the Creator. To One only does that august name strictly belong. None other could create a gnat, or the beam of light in which it dances, or the eye with which it is seen.

In this world of grace, wherever we live, we are a creation. Our new life is as truly created out of nothing as were the first heavens, and the first earth. This ought to be particularly noticed, for there are some who think that the grace of God improves the old nature into the new. It does nothing of the sort. That which we possess since the fall is corrupt and dead, and has to be buried, whereof our baptism is the type and the testimony. That which is of God within us is a new birth, a divine principle, a living seed, a quickening spirit; in fact, it is a creation; we are new creatures in Christ Jesus. What a sweeping statement!

Creation was EFFECTED BY A WORD.

"By the word of the Lord were the heavens made." "He spake, and it was done; He commanded, and it stood fast." "God said, Let there be light; and there was light." Is not that again an accurate description of our entrance into spiritual light and life? Do we not confess, "Thy word hath quickened me"? See, then, poor sinners who may hear these words, that they have a relation to you. You are saying, "How can we become Christians?" Why, you can become Christians by being created, and there is no other way. "But we cannot create ourselves," says one. It is even so. Stand back, and quit all pretence of being creators; and the further you retreat from self-conceit the better, for it is God who must create you. How I wish that you felt this! "It would drive us to despair," say you. It might drive you to such despair as would be the means of your flying to Christ, and that is precisely what I desire. It would be greatly to your gain if you never again indulged a shred of hope in your own works, and were forced to accept the grace of God. This truth lifts the whole matter out of the region of the creature's merit, worth, or ability, and puts it on another footing, full of hope to man, and of glory to God.

But the text speaks of this creation as "in Christ Jesus." This is a deeply instructive subject, which at this present cannot fully be discussed, partly from want of time, and partly from want of ability on my part fully to open it up. It would require a series of discourses, such as Dr. John Owen, or Stephen Charnock might have been able to deliver; the theologians of to-day, if there be any, cannot come near it.

Herein is a great deep: "created in Christ Jesus." Beloved, there is a mystic unity between Christ and the twice-born, into which I will not further go. I point to a casket which just now I will not unlock. But to return to the text, here is the glory of it: first, we are God's workmanship, and the peculiar manner in which we have been created is that we have been created "in Christ Jesus."

III. We come, thirdly, to dwell upon the special

OBJECT OF THIS CREATION:

"unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them." And

WHAT ARE GOOD WORKS?

In that question lies another large subject. Tell me, ye who talk so much of good works, what are they? I should say that they are works such as God commands—works of obedience. When we heartily keep the divine precepts, we must be right; for it can never be evil for a man to do what God bids him.

Next, I should say that they are works of love; of love to God, and love to man; works done out of a pure affection to the great Father, and out of unselfish regard to men. That which we do to display our own liberality is done unto self, and so is spoiled; but where there is a single eye to God's glory, the work is good. Works done out of love to Christ, and love to saints, and love to the poor, and love to lost sinners, are good works.

ACTS OF COMMON LIFE.

I am bound to add that good works include the necessary acts of common life when they are rightly performed. We are to produce good works in our home, in our shop, in our workroom, in our travel abroad, or on our sick-bed; everywhere we are to be filled with good works to God's glory. All our works should be good works, and we may make them so by sanctifying them with the Word of God and prayer, according to that precept, "Whether ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus."

Observe that God has not created us that we may talk about our good works, but that we may walk in them. Practical doing is better than loud boasting. God has not created us that we may occasionally perform good works, but that we may walk in them—that they may be so habitual to us that the common course of our conversation may be full of them. God grant that His holy object may be carried out in us to such a degree that our path may be luminous with holiness, that we may leave behind a shining track, like that of a vessel upon the sea!

IV. And now I close with this last head. Fourthly, the remarkable for that object, for so the text may be rendered, "which God hath prepared that we should walk in them." God has personally prepared every Christian for good works. "Oh," say some, "I sometimes feel as if I was so unfit for God's service." You are not unfit, so far as you are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works. God's purpose is subserved by that which He makes, else were He an unwise worker. We are in a special degree God's workmanship, created to this end, that we may produce good works; and we are fitted to that end as much as a bird is fitted to fly, or a worm is fitted for its purpose in the earth.

"Oh," says one, "but I find it so difficult to walk in good works." Then you are not your true and real self. Pray God to put the flesh back, and to let that dead and carnal part of you be gone; and ask that the new life, which He has infused, may have good scope to carry out its own natural instincts; for it is a holy thing, created on purpose to walk in good works, and it will do so if it be not hindered. Give it liberty. Give it opportunity. Feed it. Bring it before God to strengthen it; and it must, it will, as certainly produce good works as a good tree brings forth good fruit.

Once more, observe with content that everything around you is arranged for the production of good works in you. When the Lord God created you in Christ Jesus, as you believe He did, He had prepared for you a position of service and usefulness, exactly

FITTED FOR YOUR CAPACITY.

That place for the present is the position which you now occupy. "No," says one, "but I am in the place of poverty." That is it; it is God's design that you may in that place produce the sweet fruits of contentment and patience. "Alas!" cries another. "I dwell among the ungodly." It is intended by your Lord that your light may shine among them, and that you, having your graces tried, may become all the stronger and the better man. "Oh," says one, "I am a Christian, but I believe that I am in the worst place that ever was. I am alone, like a plant in the desert." Is it not written, "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose?"

Full often the most advantageous place for our manhood is that which is surrounded with splendid difficulties. A soldier is trained by battles, and a mariner by storms. What can a man do when he has everything to his hand? Everything is possible to him, but so it is to every simpleton. He is truly a man who has nothing to assist him, and yet is aided by the opposition which confronts him. To sail against wind and tide would be more notable than to drift with gale and current. Is not he a true man who can turn to account the worst possible circumstances so as to produce the best possible results? He has an opportunity for distinguishing himself who is placed amid temptations and perils. In your life, good works are provided for—"God hath before prepared that we should walk in them."

On the whole, you are placed in the best position for your producing good works to the glory of God. "I do not think it," says one. Very well. Then you will worry to quit your position, and attain another footing; mind that you do not plunge into a worse. The wise man saith, "as a bird that wandereth from her nest, so is a man that wandereth from his place." It is not the box that makes the jewel, nor the place that makes the man. "Oh, but anywhere rather than this!" Yes, and when you get into the place you now covet, you will pine to be back again. A barren tree is none the better for being transplanted. Oh, sirs, lies not without you, but within you. Your present possibilities are the best for this present; use them as they fly. At any rate, rest assured that divine wisdom has not only prepared you for the hour, but the hour for you. All things are in a divine sense your friends; "For thou shalt be in league with the stones of the field; and the beasts of the field shall be at peace with thee."

THE REAL DIFFICULTY

Moreover, the Lord has prepared the whole system of His grace to this end—that you should abound in good works. Every part and portion of the economy of grace tends toward this result, that thou mayest be perfect even as thy Father which is in heaven is perfect. All events, whether terrible or joyous, shall be made to work together for this highest form of good, namely, your sanctification. January's snow, February's cold, April showers, March winds, and July suns, all co-operate to prepare the wheat for the garner; and all earthly changes are sent of God for the eternal future. Yes, I may even say that the glories of heaven call us to a sublime life of holiness, and the thunders of hell urge us to conquer the temptations which are in the world through lust. The crown which Christ holds over our heads inspires us with ardor in our race; while the cross on which He died stirs us to a fervent enthusiasm for His praise. Nothing in heaven, or on earth, or in hell, rightly used, will excite us in lukewarmness, but everything will impel us to intense zeal for holiness. Even the sin, which so sadly abounds around us, should make us the more watchful and careful in life.

Oh, sirs, if God calls you His workmanship, take care that none can justly find fault with the Worker! If you be indeed God's creation in Christ Jesus, take care that none despise the second birth, or the second Adam. And if it be so, that the Lord has afore prepared all things that we may walk in good works, let us get into gear with creation; let us be in harmony with providence; let us keep step with the march of God's purpose. What more shall I say? I have not yet breathed a wish. Oh, that you who have not yet believed in my Lord Jesus would do so now; for "to as many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on His name"! Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

PERSONAL TRAITS

of British authors, the series of works edited by Mr. Edward T. Mason, three volumes of which have already been noticed in these columns, is brought to a conclusion by the fourth volume, now issued. Some surprise will doubtless be felt that the series should close with no mention of authors so eminent as Carlyle and George Eliot. The omission, however, is not an oversight. The editor explains in his preface that the plan of including them in this final volume was reluctantly abandoned because the available material concerning one was too recent, and concerning the other too scanty to warrant the attempt. The authors selected are those with whose works the present generation of readers is best acquainted. Macaulay, Dickens and Thackeray have had as many readers and admirers on this side the Atlantic as on their own. Jane Eyre and Shirley have made the name of Charlotte Brontë a familiar one in the majority of American households, while Hood, Sydney Smith, and Douglas Jerrold are dear to lovers of wit and humor the world over. Those are the seven authors whose personal traits are described in this volume.

Of Tom Hood some harsh things have been said by those who misunderstood his hatred of hypocrisy; he was accused of being an infidel because on one occasion he resented with some vehemence the intrusion into a sick room of a woman whom he knew to be insincere, but who was making a show of religious zeal. He had his share—a share larger than common—of trial and sorrow, but late in life he could say, "In my graver troubles I profess a Christian faith that consoles and supports me even in walking through something like the Valley of the Shadow of Death." Very interesting are these memorials of Tom Hood, gleaned chiefly from the recollections of his own children, who loved him with passionate affection.

Of Macaulay, the chief source of information is the work of his nephew, Mr. G. O. Trevelyan. As in the case of the other subjects, this naturally favorable estimate of the great historian is qualified by quotations from the writings of others who thought less highly of him. His brilliant conversation, his prodigious memory and his profound learning are admitted by all, but complaints are numerous of the way he monopolized conversation, especially from men who, like Sydney Smith, were themselves good talkers, but who when Macaulay was present could not get a chance to speak. "I do not believe," Sydney Smith used to say, "that Macaulay ever did hear my voice. Sometimes when I have told a good story I have thought to myself, 'Poor Macaulay, he will be very sorry some day to have missed hearing that.'"
Miss Hannah More was fond of describing her first introduction to him. She called at his father's house and was received at the front door by "a fair, pretty, slight child, with abundance of light hair, about four years old, who came to tell her that his parents were out, but that if she would be good enough to come in he would bring her a glass of old spirits, a proposition which greatly startled the good lady, who never drank anything stronger than cowslip wine. When questioned what he knew about old spirits he could only say that Robinson Crusoe often had some." He was from his early childhood an insatiable reader, and could remember verbally almost everything he read. Late in life he said—not boastfully—that if all the copies of Milton's Paradise Lost were accidentally destroyed he could reproduce the first six books from memory.

Sydney Smith's quaint drolleries furnish matter for many amusing anecdotes. They were uttered in pure good nature and like summer lightnings illumined without doing harm. Some of them were a little puzzling to dull people. Calling one day on an artist who was painting a portrait of one of his friends, he gravely asked him if he could not "contrive to throw into his face somewhat of a stronger expression of hostility to the church establishment." His laughable conception of a duel between two doctors is very amusing. Smith thought such a duel should be fought with professional weapons, and drew a ludicrous picture of the two men with oil of croton on the tips of their fingers trying to touch each other's lips. Jerrold's wit was of a very different type. It cut deep, and instances are related in which the sharp edge must have given pain. Speaking of a certain air, some one said in Jerrold's hearing, "That air always carries me away when I hear it." "Can nobody whistle it?" asked Jerrold. Mr. Bentley told him that his new periodical, which he had called "Bentley's Miscellany," he thought at one time of calling "The Wits' Miscellany." "Well," was the rejoinder, "you needn't have gone to the other extremity." In spite of these keen remarks which Jerrold made whenever there was opportunity, he was essentially a most kind-hearted man. Harriet Martineau said of him, "I never feared him in the least, nor saw reason why any but knaves or fools should fear him." He was a generous giver and was often imposed upon, and was occasionally absolutely without money, having given it all away. He was once asked by a literary acquaintance whether he had the courage to lend him a guinea. "Oh, yes," Jerrold replied; "I've got the courage but I haven't got the guinea." His carriage was scratched by the street-boys who clambered on it for a ride, and the coachmaker proposed putting a few spikes in to keep the urchins off. "By no means," said Jerrold, severely; "a thousand scratches on my panels would be more welcome to me than one on the hand of a footsore lad to whom a stolen lift might be a godsend."

Of Dickens, Thackeray, and Miss Brontë, the reminiscences gathered here are very full and intensely interesting. Many exquisite pictures of these three authors might be quoted if the space at our disposal were not exhausted. We must refer our readers to the book itself, which they will find very enjoyable reading. Pp. 334. Price $1.50. Published by Messrs. Charles Scribner & Sons, New York.

a clerical symposium, will be read with deep interest at the present time. The assaults on the Bible made from within and without the church of Christ, render it more than ever necessary that the claims of the Bible as the Word of God, directly inspired by Him, should be thoroughly understood. It is also most important that the sense in which the Bible is inspired should be clearly apprehended, or the young student may be bewildered by the subtle distinctions drawn by those who are undermining the faith of the world in the Bible. In no better way can that knowledge be attained than by a comparison of the views of the eleven representative clergymen whose essays on the subject make up this volume. Among them are men of eminent learning, who differ widely in their views, but who all bring thoughts of sterling value to the discussion of this, the most prominent religious subject of our time. The best-known of these writers are: Principal John Cairns, D.D.; Archdeacon Farrar, D.D.; Rev. Edward White, Dr. Stanley Leathes and Professor J. Radford Thompson. In order to make the symposium complete, Bishop Weathers states the Roman Catholic idea of inspiration, and Professor Israel Abrahams, M.A., the orthodox Jewish conception. All these authors differ, more or less, from each other in their theories, but each viewing the subject from his own standpoint contributes light to the discussion. Pp. 242. Price, $1.50. Published by Mr. Thomas Whittaker, New York.

Volume VII. of the Christian Herald, containing the Numbers for 1884, with complete index, bound in cloth, may be had from this office; price $3.

THE DEATH OF MR. J. A. CAMERON, The Special Correspondent in the Soudan of the London Standard.

(See Illustration.)

A PORTRAIT and a sketch of the life of Mr. Cameron, the able and daring newspaper correspondent of the London Standard, appeared in the issue of this journal dated March 5th. We are now enabled to give a picture of the scene, taken from a sketch made on the spot by one of his fellow correspondents on an illustrated journal. The fatality occurred on January 19th. Mr. Cameron was with the little force with which General Stewart was making a dash across the desert toward Metamneh, with the hope of there going by the Nile to Khartoum. While the troops were rapidly pushing forward a large body of Arabs was seen approaching. General Stewart at once formed a camp, technically called a zereba, in which he placed the wounded, the sick and the non-combatants, the camels being on the outside as a protection. The effective troops then formed a square and went forward to encounter the enemy. Arab riflemen possessed the heights, while their horsemen closed the roads in the rear.

As the square moved slowly from the zereba all felt that their fate depended upon its steadiness. It was soon out of sight, but those in the zereba knew by the heavy firing that a desperate battle was in progress, and that their lives hung on the issue. Not until the next morning did they learn that the Arabs had been repulsed. While they were in suspense they were also in danger. The riflemen on the hills were expert marksmen, and several times in the course of the afternoon a well-aimed shot entered the areba with fatal results. One of these bullets struck Mr. Cameron. He ad ensconced himself behind a camel intending to have a little lunch. He urned to take a tin of arduines from the hand of is servant, when a bullet truck him in the back and enetrated to his heart, illing him instantly. His eath struck gloom into he whole party, for he as very popular. Next ay a column of British roops returned to the reba with the glad news hat the main body had eached the Nile and were afely encamped on its anks. Then, we are told, the small garrison greetd their comrades as betted the occasion. The en holding the work heered them rapturously, ome weeping for joy at heir deliverance from a orrible death at the hands f a barbarous foe." Preparations were at once made or the move to Gubat, ut before marching the ody of the dead journalst was reverently carried o the grave by Lord Charles Beresford and Mr. ameron's colleagues, Mr. urleigh, of the Daily Telegraph, Mr. Villiers, of the Graphic, Mr. Melton Prior, of the Illustrated London News, and Mr. H. I. S. Pearse, of the Daily News. His grave was dug longside those of two officers and Mr. Herbert, of the Morning Post. Lord Charles Beresford read the burial Service, which the ircumstances rendered oot impressive.

church with me, instead of going to the alehouse and singing in the streets to the shame of God's people."

"Nay, nay, the church is not for me, and I'm not for the church. Go thy ways and leave me—I'll go home quietly. I'm not minded to offend anybody. I'm no good, and I'll soon be in my grave," and with one of those sudden transitions of feeling drunken men exhibit, Blake began to weep.

Now Walter and Will had been schoolmates and had played together on the green, and when boyhood merged into youth, were to be met in the long summer evenings and the autumn twilights, wandering side by side along the margin of the river. But Will fell into idle habits and bad company. The conversation of Walter became too serious for his taste; his moral as well as his physical appetite became depraved, and could only be appeased by loose talk and strong drink. Wayneffete could not forget those old days of friendship, and doubtless the degraded man before him was mindful of them too. Intense pity for his old companion filled the heart of the young Christian, and taking him by the arm, he led him by a side street to his home. Leaving him there to his reflections, he went on himself to the church, but in the evening he went again to the blacksmith's house. There he prayed with him and pleaded with him, and had the satisfaction of seeing him weep tears of real penitence. From that time forward Wayneffete watched over him with fraternal solicitude, and soon a work of grace was commenced in the blacksmith's heart which transformed his life.

THE JEW'S WAR.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Proposal.

The days and weeks passed by quickly for Carola, who, to her own wonder, felt herself as much at home in the great rooms at the Grange as she had been in her little cottage. There was not perhaps the same freedom; but there was an atmosphere of love and care surrounding her, which she had never felt before. She could not help seeing that Philip's face brightened at the mere sight of her, and that Mr. Arnold looked at her with tenderness. As she had lost all her little possessions by the fire, except an old brown Testament which she had caught up hastily as she made her way through the smoke, he never returned from market without bringing her some article which he fancied she might want, and which he gave to her with a fatherly delight. It was a new thing to Carola to find herself the object of so much thought and affection.

The schoolhouse was ready by Christmas, and school was to begin again as soon as the new year came, though the blackened walls of the cottage still stood bare under the gray skies. On Christmas eve Carola went down to look at some decorations the village children had put up, and when they were gone she entered the whom several pairs of bright eyes rested approvingly as he strode down the street that summer morning.

Suddenly, to the scandal of the quiet groups on the way to church, a loud, hilarious tavern song was trolled out in a powerful bass voice. All heads were turned in the direction of the sound. There they saw the blacksmith, Will Blake, his dirty and scorched leather apron still on, and his doublet off, while the dirt on his face and hands testified that Will had either been at work that morning, or had not washed since his work last night. There was a hiccup, too, now and again that interrupted the song, and a staggering uncertainty of step which showed that Will had been thirsty some time lately.

Wayneffete turned, and, walking across the narrow street, confronted the blacksmith. "How now, Will Blake," he said. "Are you minded to have all men in the city know of your wicked and ungodly habits? What mean you by appearing here in your working clothes, and with your mouth full of licentious songs on the Lord's day?"

Blake's potatoes had given him courage, and he answered Wayneffete with more hardihood than he would have shown in his sober moments. "It is no matter to you, Master Wayneffete, what I do. When I'm happy I sing, and I'm happy now. Hold thy prate, and mind thy business. Leave me in peace, I say. Who made you my keeper?"

"The Lord maketh every man his brother's keeper, Will," said Wayneffete, with more softness in his tone; "I would have thee go to

A SEVENTEENTH CENTURY REV-ELLER.

(See Illustration.)

If one of our forefathers of two centuries ago could revisit the scenes of his life, he would find marvellous changes, which would astonish him. Our telegraphs, our railroads and the innumerable kinds of machines with which we save time and labor would excite his wonder, and he would find that in the interval that has elapsed since he left the world, the ingenuity of man has been marvellously active. We are right in calling this an age of progress when we limit our view of it to the material changes which it has wrought. But we have no such reason to congratulate ourselves when we extend our range of view to take in the moral aspect of our condition. The following little sketch, taken from the columns of a contemporary, might have occurred any day in any of our cities.

A bright, sunny Sabbath morning, the respectable citizens, clad in their go-to-meeting apparel, the silence of the streets broken only by the bells and the hum of conversation in the little groups wending their way to the sanctuary. Walter Wayneffete was also on his way hither, as was evident, for in his hand was his Bible with its massive silver clasp. Master Walter was well-to-do for so young a man; he was only twenty-five years old, but his strength and substance had not been wasted by dissipation, and already his business as a builder was well established, and Walter was a man highly respected in the community. A decorous, deeply religious man was Walter Wayneffete, on little ruin, which looked as desolate as a greater one could have done. The roof was gone, and the clouds driven by the wintry wind swept over the open space, while the keen air blew in through the open casements. She stood sadly on the blackened hearth, with the charred fragments of the thick oaken beams overhead falling about her. The old oak chair in the chimney-corner and the settle opposite it were destroyed, and all the small household treasures were gone. They might be replaced; but her first home could never be the same again. It was only a little ruin, and no great calamity had befallen any one; but in her heart there was a vague and indefinable sadness. This would be her home again no more.

She was shivering as much from sadness as from cold when she turned back into the school-room where a large fire was burning in the wide grate, filling the dusky room with flickering light. But the room was no longer empty as she left it, for Philip was standing on the hearth. The thick wall had been between them; but he had been standing opposite to her, and facing her, in the warmth and light of the fire, while she had been lingering on the desolate hearth on the other side.

"I came down to see if there was anything you wanted," he said, as she came toward him.

"No," she answered, softly, "I only want my little home again, just as it was before; and that can never be. It can never be the same again."

"Nothing is ever the same again," he said. "Do you think if you had died that night life would ever have been the same again to me? Listen to me for one minute. I know I'm not as good as you, but I love you. I've had a happy life; but to-morrow will be the happiest day in it if you'll promise me to be my wife. Only promise."

He looked across the hearth at her with an eager face, but he did not take a step nearer to her, so fearful was he of startling her; and she stood motionless, gazing at him with a look of wonder. She had never thought of such a thing as this; but the surprise had a strange sweetness in it. It was almost as if some young prince had come wooing her. All the people about her looked up to him and his father as their natural rulers and masters. How could it be that he should come and ask her, the village schoolmistress, to be his wife? A crimson flush suffused her face, which had been pale and sad a minute ago, at the thought of Philip Arnold coming to her as a lover; and a minute's silence passed by before either of them moved or spoke again.

"Can you say nothing to me?" he asked at length.

"I don't know what to say," she answered, almost in a whisper; "I never thought of it before. Is it true?"

"It's as true as that I'm alive," he said, vehemently; "it's true that I never loved any girl before; and it's true that I've loved you from the first moment I saw you. I cannot keep it in any longer. Promise me that you'll try to love me."

"But I never thought of it before," she repeated, in a tone of wonder.

"You're not slow in thinking," he answered, "and you know all about me. Surely, here in Hazelmount, you know all that people think of me. There is nothing to be found out. I've lived here all my life; and you have known me many months. Oh, be quick in thinking! I only want you to promise to try to love me."

"Oh," she said, speaking very low, "there isn't any need to try! How could I help loving you, if you love me?"

It was so marvellous a thing to her! She could not see anything in herself that he should love her. Why should he pass by all the accomplished young ladies who so often visited at the Grange, and fix his love on one who knew so little, and could do so few things? As he clasped her closely to him, she looked up almost anxiously into his face.

"Are you quite sure I shall suit you?" she asked; "I can do nothing but sing; and oh, your mother would like you to have so much more!"

"Well," he said, exultingly, "I'd rather have your singing than the best music in the world! And I'd rather have you at my side, keeping me right, and helping me to be a truer Christian, than have the cleverest girl in the country. My mother will love you with all her heart when you're my wife; ay, and my father too. I have never forgotten the first moment I saw you, my darling."

They walked back to the Grange slowly, hand in hand. The cottage doors were closed as they passed by, but every window was lit up, and they knew well who were gathered round the fire in each little homestead. A strangely sweet and solemn feeling was in Carola's heart. She had loved these people, and served them faithfully; and now they were to be her own people all her life long. Her place was here, in Hazelmount, not an uncertain place as schoolmistress, but a settled habitation as Philip Arnold's wife, the mistress of the little village. The old, many-gabled farm-house, the windows shining out into the dark night with the blazing fires and the lighted lamps within, put on quite a new aspect to her. This was her home; the roof under which she and Philip were to live and die together.

Carola could not sleep that night for pure gladness. There was no restlessness of mind or body; and she lay as still, with her eyes closed, as if she was sleeping like a happy child. But no unconsciousness unfolded her. A solemn sense that all happiness must come from God, and must be in harmony with His will, or it could be no happiness for her, was impressed upon her; and a ceaseless prayer was in her inmost heart. "Thy will be done" was the cry of her spirit; but without dread, and with no fears for the future, and no anticipations of trouble. Hitherto the will of God had filled her with inward blessing and tranquillity, with no sorrow added. The narrow path had been for her a path of peace.

It was Christmas-day, her Lord's birthday; and until this year it had been filled from morning to night with thoughts of Him. But there was naturally a distraction to-day. She had been very much alone in other years, either at school, or in her own quiet cottage. This morning she walked down to the parish church, with Philip at her side, and she sat in the pew beside him, and sang with him out of the same hymn-book. It was Philip's way of announcing that a change had taken place in their relationship to one another. He had not spoken of their engagement yet to either his father or mother; but they knew only too well what he meant, and Mrs. Arnold wept some bitter tears as she knelt down during the long litany.

Others besides Mrs. Arnold understood the exultant expression on Philip's face. The Hazelmount cottagers gossiped about it on their way home along the frosty lanes. It had been suspected for a long time that Mr. Philip was in love with the young schoolmistress; and some were of opinion that he was about to marry beneath him, when he might have had other girls with a large fortune. But the majority, in consideration that Carola, too, was not altogether without fortune, looked favorably on the little romance being played out before their eyes, and said to one another it was wiser to marry for love than to marry for money. At any rate, it was plain Mr. Philip was going to have his own way now, as he had done all his life long.

"Come with me round the fields, Carola," said Philip, as soon as their early dinner was over. All the farm servants who could be spared were sent to spend the rest of their Christmas-day at home; and there were the sheep and cattle to be looked at in distant fields. It was a very pleasant thing to do, thought Carola. The low December sun was going down, a hazy ball of red, in the gray sky; and a white rime, here and there tinged with rose-color, lay on all the ground, and changed the bare hedges into white-coral. The furrowed ground was frozen hard; the great meadows stretched before them spangled with frost, and the old corn stubble in the unploughed fields crackled under their feet. The pale gray-blue sky shone with delicate clearness behind the line of Scotch firs, which stood in array along the brow of the hill; and as they looked down upon the village they saw the blue wood-smoke rising from every cottage chimney, and melting softly away into the moist air.

Philip's forefathers had tilled every field and trodden every path they walked along; the hedge-rows had been planted by them; the seed been sown and the harvest gathered for hundreds of seasons. All the true wealth and blessedness of these old familiar fields were his; and as Carola walked beside him, his heart was full to overflowing. Had his father and mother known such happiness as this when they were young, and all the long years lay before them? It was like singing an old song that had been the joy of many generations. There had never been such a Christmas-day for him, as well as for her. All the world seemed full of their gladness.

The sun had sunk behind a bank of dun-colored clouds, and the moon was rising over the fir-trees before they returned into the fold-yard, and went in at the kitchen door; Mr. Arnold was sitting in the chimney-corner smoking a long clay pipe, and he made room for Carola to sit down beside him, putting his arm round her shoulders, and stroking her cheek fondly with his rough hand. John Windbank was seated at the end of a long bench, cutting with a clasp-knife at a huge piece of pork-pie, and speaking slowly, with his mouth full.

"Phil," said Mr. Arnold, in a tone of unusual animation, "you recollect poor Lumley, of Market Upton—"

"Him as was robbed and drowned four year ago," interrupted John Windbank, "that's him, sir. They've took up the man as was suspected. He's been out o' the country ever since; but he were seen one o' these last days, and the p'lice hadn't forgot him. I s'pose the reward 'll hold good yet; a hundred pound it was. I wouldn't ha' minded catchin' him myself."

"Poor fellow!" said Philip, "he went to school with me, Carol, and turned out badly; and his relations sent him up to London, with money to take him out to New Zealand, and buy a little land there. But nothing more was heard of him till the police found his body in the river, with marks of violence on it enough to cause his death."

The glow upon Carola's face died away, and the smiling light in her dark eyes grew dim. It seemed to her that once before in some former life she had heard these words spoken, and had shrunk from hearing what was about to follow, as if it would blight and crush her whole being. Her breath came and went fitfully, but she kept silence; not a word escaped her trembling lips.

"Why! what a nervous little creature it is!" said Mr. Arnold, tenderly; "that's the shock from the fire. You've no courage to hear of bad things, or sad things, my Christmas Carol. Come, come!"

"He do say he can prove he were an alibi," continued John Windbank; "he were with his sweetheart that night, if she could be found. But girls like them are always shiftn' about, and never livin' in one place. But the man's name is George Bassett; and I were wonderin' if he belonged to the Bassetts o' Market Upton anyhow. They were a bad lot, them Bassetts; and young Lumley might ha' known them, and fell in his way very likely."

But Carola heard nothing except the name George Bassett. The blow stunned and benumbed her brain, and for the moment she could think of nothing, and realize nothing.

"George Bassett! George Bassett!" she repeated again and again to herself; but the name did not seem to mean anything yet. Her face was tranquil, and she looked steadily across at the weather-beaten face of the old wagoner.

Her pulse beat no faster or slower. She felt almost as if she was going to sleep, and perhaps the long walk in the frosty air had made her drowsy. Mechanically she untied her bonnet-strings, and rose from the seat by the fire.

"I will come down by and by," she said to Philip, with a little smile and nod; "I'm tired just now."

The moon was shining in at her bedroom window, giving as much light as she needed for what she had to do. For what could she do? She crouched down on the floor, and laid her arms on the low window-sill, to wait until this unnatural calm and stupor should pass away, and the tempest break in upon her soul. She looked out, with eyes as steady and heedful as if she had nothing else to think of, on the wintry landscape flooded with the light of the full moon.

The great far-off plain was lost in the blackness of the night; but near at hand every cottage window twinkled with light, and the dark outlines of their lowly roofs showed clearly against the sky. Yonder lay the fields, dim and shadowy now, where but an hour ago she was walking hand clasped in hand with Philip; and across the eastern sky stretched the jagged line of fir-trees, over which they had watched the moon rise. The Christmas chimes from the church tower in the invisible plain below came softly and merrily up to her listening ear. She could catch, also, through the still and frosty air, the shrill voices of children singing the carols she had taught them from door to door. Almost without knowing it, she herself chanted in an undertone the anthem they had sung in church at the morning service—"Glory to God in the highest; peace on earth; good-will toward men."

Then suddenly, with a heart-shaking swiftness, she saw the narrow, dirty street where she had spent her girlhood, with its knots of demoralized men and women, and its swarms of miserable children. There was herself passing in and out among them, going with them into the gaudy gin-palaces, and reeling back again in their company. She could hear them talk; and every nerve tingled with shame. Their homes were open to her; not homes but styies, unclean and squalid. George Bassett was beside her; his arm had caught her round the neck, and she was fighting to free herself, amid the jeers and laughter of her companions. It seemed like hell to her; and she had dwelt there once. She had grown up in it.

DIVINE PROTECTION.

S.S. Lesson for April 19, Acts 28 : 1-15. Golden Text, Ps. 34 : 4. By Mrs M. Baxter.

Hospitality of the Islanders—Welcome to the Shipwrecked Crew—Opportunities of Service—Opened to the Willing Worker—Paul a Practical Man—The Viper Prepared for Satan's Service—Natural Inferences—Job's Comforters—The Message to the Fallen—A Life the Viper Could not Touch—The Hospitality of Publius—How Paul Repaid it—The Voyage to Rome—Welcome to Rome.

ALL which Paul had foretold was come to pass, the ship was lost, all who were on board were saved, and they were "cast upon a certain island." "And when they were escaped, then they knew that the island was called Melita" (the modern Malta). The inhabitants, apparently uncivilized, whom Luke calls "the barbarous people," were nevertheless very kind to the shipwrecked crew. "They kindled a fire, and received us every one." This implies that they gave them hospitality, such as they had to give. It was no small drain on the resources of this island people when two hundred and seventy-six people were turned in suddenly upon them; but they soon learned that their gain was greater than their loss. The Lord, who had saved Paul's prayer and answered it, did not leave the ship's company from the sea in order to let them die of cold and hunger. He had been at work upon the island, softening the hearts of the inhabitants that they might receive their distressed fellow-creatures.

Paul did not need to

an opportunity of usefulness. When God's children are in His hands, to be led by Him, used by Him, or set aside by Him as He wills, it ceases to be their responsibility to open a path of service for themselves. All the drive, the hurry and struggle goes out of their lives. They are no longer under a terrible dread of losing chances to speak to one and another, while they are ready at any moment, when the Spirit shall lead them, to be His voice, and to speak His words. Paul did not feel it incumbent upon him to go round to all who were present and force upon them attention to his life message—Jesus and the resurrection; but he just lent a hand to help, and went in the pouring rain to gather a bundle of sticks and lay them on the fire. This shows what a practical man Paul was.

Satan had many a grudge against Paul, and he knew four thousand years before how to use a serpent as his instrument. With Job he used hostile tribes, wind, lightning, and sickness to destroy, as far as God permitted him. Now he used a viper, which came out of the peat and fastened on Paul's hand. What a gain it would be to the kingdom of darkness if Paul should never reach Rome! What a proof to the saved crew of the vessel that only good luck had overtaken them, and that their deliverance was a mere chance, if Paul died by the bite of a serpent! The enemy of souls had no difficulty in lodging his suggestions in the hearts of the poor barbarians; they said: "No doubt this man is a murderer, whom, though he hath escaped the sea, yet vengeance suffereth not to live!" How like the natural heart of man! Always ready to condemn and find fault. A man cannot have a misfortune but that some wise persons find some reason why he is to be blamed for it. A man cannot be ill but that he has reproach to bear from his friends for something he did which caused it, and this in addition to the pain. "You shouldn't have overworked," say Job's comforters to one whose nerves and brain are strained to the last degree of tension, and who is more tried by such a remark than by the suffering itself. "I told you what would happen if you persisted in wearing yourself out with that sick friend." How easy to say; but oh, how difficult to bear, just when a maddening attack of neuralgia has set in! "He has brought it on himself" may be true, but who has commissioned him who speaks it to say the words when the self-slain drunkard or opium eater, or the self-made beggar is just suffering to the utmost? God will have mercy, and not judgment. Our message to the fallen and to the suffering is REDEMPTION, NOT RETRIBUTION.

Paul knew the heart of God, and he knew the Word of God too: "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder; the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet" (Ps. 91 : 13). So spoke the Lord by David of old. And most strongly did our blessed Lord confirm the word when He said: "Behold, I give unto you power to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy; and nothing shall by any means hurt you" (Luke 10 : 19); and also by His last charge given after His resurrection: "In my name . . . they shall take up serpents" (Mark 16 : 17, 18). Paul's custom was to "do all in the name of the Lord Jesus" (Col. 3 : 17), and thus we may know that it was in His name "he shook off the beast into the fire, and felt no harm."

The people of the island looked for the usual effects of a poisonous serpent's bite—swelling and sudden death. But they looked in vain. A life was in Paul strong enough to counteract any poison; the very life of the Son of God was in him. The poor ignorant people now changed their tone, and "said that he was a god." Oh, how men avoid attributing anything to God! They will believe in the prayers of the righteous, and so in their hearts, defy the man who prays instead of God who answers the prayer. Men dread of all things to have to do

DIRECTLY WITH GOD.

We are not told what we are sure was the case—that Paul took this God-given opportunity to preach Christ to the people. The manifest present power of God in saving him from the serpent's bite gave him a splendid vantage ground. None could deny that an unseen power was present; to explain it was an open door for the Gospel.

Publius, the chief man of the island, had property in the neighborhood, and he "received us, and lodged us three days courteously." Paul could not repay this generous hospitality, but One was with him who could. The father of Publius lay ill with fever and hemorrhage. Paul went in, "and prayed and laid his hands upon him," as all who believe are commanded to do (Mark 16 : 17, 18), and the man was healed. God did not break His promise; then, as now, signs followed "them that believe." Luke, the beloved physician, who records this blessed testimony of divine healing, seems to have been so occupied with the power of God in this direction that he does not tell us what spiritual result followed Paul's labors in Melita. But he does tell us that when the father of Publius was healed, "Others also, which had diseases in the island, came, and were healed." If the same spiritual blessing accompanied divine healing then, as we see it does in those of all countries who are healed directly by the Lord now, there must have been a glorious ingathering of precious souls in this island, and there is little doubt that thus God's purpose in the shipwreck was accomplished. The people were filled with gratitude, and far from feeling such an influx of strangers a burden, they "honored us with many honors, and when we departed, they laden us with such things as were necessary." The history of this three months in Melita settles a question often asked, "Can we pray for

"God is love;" wherever a soul will touch Him, God will respond. How many an unconverted man, when feeling the pangs of hunger, has cried to God for bread, and the answers to that prayer have been the first touch of God which he has known! And so in thousands of cases of sickness, where there has been as yet no other dealing with the Lord. He uses every circumstance, every need to draw His wandering creatures to trust Him.

After a sojourn of three months the whole company embarked "in a ship of Alexandria, which had wintered in the island, whose sign was Castor and Pollux." Their first landing-place was Syracuse, in the island of Sicily. After three days' stay they crossed to the coast of Italy, where they first touched at Rhegium, the most southerly port of that land. After one day's stay they set sail under a south wind for Puteoli, the modern Pozzuoli. And here for the first time since they left Sidon they "found brethren, and were desired to tarry with them seven days." How came it that a prisoner such as Paul, and one whose only offence was his religion, should have had such liberty and such influence that the whole band of prisoners on their way toward Rome could be allowed thus to tarry for his sake? It tells a tale which the exact words of the narrative do not so clearly convey. Perhaps the centurion was already himself a brother in the Lord, and desired as much as Paul, Luke, and Aristarchus the refreshment of contact with other believers. God so ordered it that if Paul had possessed the means to hire all the ship's company, and the centurion and soldiers as his special bodyguard, the journey could not have turned out more for his interest and service. "And so we went toward Rome. And from thence, when the brethren heard of us, they came to meet us as far as Appii Forum and the Three Taverns." It is somewhat unusual that a prisoner on his way to his trial should be met by an ovation of friends, but so it was. And when Paul saw them "he thanked God, and took courage."

THE devoted missionary whose portrait appears this week on the first page was a man whose work was exceptionally difficult and arduous. He was sent to preach to the colored people of Jamaica then in a state of slavery. His work was opposed by men of his own race and color, who had good reason for believing that the spread of education and religion would pave the way for emancipation. Their apprehensions were justified by the result, though the loss entailed upon them by the loss of their slaves was amply compensated by a grant of money. After the emancipation, Mr. Phillippo's difficulties were not ended. He had the difficult task of inculcating on his colored converts habits of industry and respectful obedience in their new relations. He was a man of marvellous tact, and the influence he had obtained over the colored people stood him in good stead. His labors were unceasing, and his success extraordinary. His name is venerated now throughout the island, especially by the colored people, who found in him a faithful friend, a wise counsellor and a devoted pastor.

Mr. Phillippo was born at East Dereham, England, on October 14th, 1798, and died at Spanish Town, in May, 1879, in the eighty-first year of his age. The family were originally emigrants from the Netherlands driven hither by the persecutions of the infamous Duke of Alva in 1575 or 1580. Very early in his young life James Phillippo exhibited a striking aptitude for the acquisition and retention of knowledge. When he was fifteen years old he was the subject of religious impressions, and expressed an intense longing for

A CHANGE OF HEART AND LIFE.

Up to this point it appeared as if the pious instructions and Christian example of his godly mother were lost upon him. His chosen companions were irreligious, and his habitual resorts were the beer-garden, the bowling-green, the theatre, the club-feast, and the "country wake," or fair. The Lord's day was desecrated, he showed a contempt for the Word of God, and became sceptical as to the existence of God and a future life, nevertheless, "all my reward," he says, at a later time, "consisted in disappointment, disquietude, and remorse."

In the midst of this career of worldliness and sin, God did not leave Himself without witness in the heart of His wandering child. Frequently he was, as he stated in after years, filled with fearful apprehensions of a judgment to come. A voice as of thunder would summon him to repent, and, although appetite and passion might resume their sway, there was left an abiding conviction that sooner or later he would be constrained to abandon his evil life and become a Christian. The struggle with his inclinations was often violent. "More than once," he says, "I ran from the house of prayer to the theatre, there to check the rising tide of conviction."

also had a lasting influence on his mind. Twice he was saved from drowning; once, he barely escaped with life from a fall from an upper floor, caused by the breaking of an elevator-chain. He was precipitated on to a wagon thirty feet below, as shown in the picture on the first page. At another time, returning from a harvest-home on a very dark night, his horse stumbled in a narrow lane which was popularly supposed to be haunted, and the terror of an apparition was added to the heavy fall and the contusions he received. The horse had stumbled over the clanking chain of a hobbled donkey.

In this state of feeling the desire one Sunday sprang up in his mind to go to the Baptist Chapel. As he sat beneath the pulpit, the words of the minister, the Rev. Samuel Green, smote him to the heart. He was overwhelmed with shame. Tortured with anger and remorse, he hastened from the chapel, determined, if possible, to STIFLE HIS CONVICTIONS.

For several weeks the strife against the voice of conscience and the Spirit of God was severe. In his distress he at length found a friendly counsellor, who led him to the footstool of mercy, and there, as he himself expressed it, "With all my sins about me, I earnestly supplicated mercy through the blood of Christ, as the greatest boon that heaven could bestow." The prayer was heard, "I felt," he said, "like Christian, in John Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress,' when he lost his burden at the sight of the Cross; my mind was filled with joy unspeakable. I thought I was in a new world, surrounded by new objects, and possessed of new senses. It was heaven to me to please God, and to be fashioned into His likeness. Old things emphatically passed away; behold, all things became new." And James Phillippo entered on a life of consecration and devoted service to the Saviour, and secured for himself a place among that heroic band of soul winners who shall one day "shine as the brightness of the firmament and as the stars forever and ever."

THE MISSIONARY FIELD.

A year after his conversion, and when he was nearly seventeen, Mr. Phillippo joined the Baptist Church, and the new life in Christ increasingly manifested its power. He became a most diligent student of God's Word. Stirrings of desire for usefulness among his fellow-men began to be felt, especially toward the far-off nations living in darkness and in the shadow of death. He read the missionary publications of the African traveller, Campbell, with avidity, and gave his leisure to the acquisition of such handicrafts as he thought would be useful in a missionary's career. Medicine, brick-making, house-building, cabinet work, the wheelwright's craft, agriculture, and the manufacture of articles of food and clothing, all received in turn his serious and ardent attention. His natural gifts, too, secured him employment as in the surrounding villages. He also assiduously visited the houses of the villagers for religious conversation, and many were led through his efforts to Christ.

As a result of a conversation with Mr. Green, the clergymen under whose preaching he had been converted, the young man now entirely abandoned business, and resolved to become a missionary to the heathen. He was introduced to the Rev. Joseph Kinghorn, of Norwich, whose experience and influence rendered him adviser-general to young aspirants to the missionary's life. "I conveyed my letter of introduction in person," writes Mr. Phillippo, in his journal, "my late employer lending me a horse for that purpose. As some evidence of the anxiety of mind as to the result of the interview with this venerable minister of the Gospel, I prayed earnestly to God during the whole of the journey, a distance of fourteen or fifteen miles, sometimes to pray in private places in the fields or along the road. My earnestness amounted to an agony that God would give me favor in the sight of His honored servant, so that my journey might be successful." (See picture on first page.) The interview took place, and the young man was encouraged to communicate his views and wishes to the Committee of the Baptist Missionary Society, with the assurance that Mr. Kinghorn would sustain the application.

On October 27th, 1819, after nine month suspense, Mr. Phillippo was invited to meet the Committee, on November 25th, at the Baptist Mission Rooms in London. The result was that he was cordially accepted for foreign service, and on November 29th he began a course.

SPECIAL PREPARATORY TUITION

in the house of the Rev. William Gray, pastor of the Baptist Church in Chipping Norton. Among his fellow-students was the late Mr. Mursell, father of the Rev. Arthur Mursell, with whom a very intimate friendship was established. In January, 1822, Mr. Phillippo was transferred to Bradford, to complete his preparations for missionary life under the tutelage of the eminent Rev. Dr. Steadman; and there he remained till the autumn of 1823, when he was in the West Indies, as a missionary of the Gospel. The farewell service took place on September 23d, and shortly afterward he was married to Hannah Selina Cecil, at Chipping Norton, and found in her one every way fitted to hold up his hands in his arduous and self-sacrificing career. And now the young missionary actually enters upon the stern labors of his long life work, sustained as many have been by the spirit to which one of the poets thus gives expression:

"Henceforth, then,

It matters not if storm or sunshine be
My earthly lot; bitter or sweet my cup,
I only pray—God fit me for the work;
God make me holy, and my spirit nerve
For the stern hour of strife. Let me but know
There is an arm unseen that holds me up,
An eye that kindly watches all my path
Till I my weary pilgrimage have done."

On October 29th, 1823, Mr. and Mrs. Phillippo sailed from Gravesend, in the ship Ocean commanded by Captain Whittle. They found in him a courteous and Christian friend. It was a remarkable coincidence that the captain during an imprisonment at Arras, in France, was instrumental in the conversion of the Rev. Thomas Godden, who was the predecessor of Mr. Phillippo in his work at Spanish Town. Mr. Godden had, like his friend, Captain Whittle, in early life entered the Royal Navy. His naval career was brought to an end when the ship to which he belonged fell a prey to a French cruiser. A captivity of eight years followed, in which he met with Captain Whittle like himself a prisoner of war, and by him Mr. Godden was led to the Saviour.

Jamaica was safely reached on December 19th and the missionaries landed at Morant Bay. The next day they started by water for Kingston, forty miles distant, and about nine o'clock a night landed from their boats under the guns of the fort of Port Royal. "The cheering of the sailors," says Mr. Phillippo, "the lights from the shipping and the shore, made us, for moment, think that our long journey was dream. It seemed so like home."

As soon as Christmas was over Mr. Phillippo paid his his designated sphere of service for Christ which he continued to occupy almost without intermission, till he was summoned home. The ancient name of the place was Jago de la Vega. It was at that time the capital of the island which it continued to be till a few years ago when the Government offices were removed to Kingston. On entering the streets, Mr. Phillippo found them crowded with colored Christians revellers, whose hideous yells and grotesque attitudes, with the rough music in which they delight, deafened the ears of the missionary and his companions, as they almost forced their way to the temporary mission-house, a dirty and in convenient dwelling of two rooms, with a sadly dilapidated interior.

HOSTILITY OF THE PLANTERS.

Mr. and Mrs. Phillippo were scarcely settled in their wretched habitation, when the difficulties of their chosen work began to make them selves felt. From a very early period the plant ers had shown a most determined hostility to the propagation of the Gospel among the slaves. But in 1823 this hostility assumed a form of more than usual virulence. It was intensified by the action taken by Mr. Thomas Fowell Buxton, in the British House of Commons. In March of that year that celebrated man brought forward a resolution declaring that slavery was repugnant to the principles of the British Constitution, and the Christian religion, and that it ought to be gradually abolished throughout the British dominions. It was not adopted, but a resolution of a similar, though less comprehensive kind was carried by Mr. Canning, and commended by him to the immediate consideration of the Colonial Legislature.

"This mild recommendation was received by the Legislature of Jamaica, and by the planters," says Mr. Phillippo, "with indignation, and finally rejected with contempt and scorn." Ebulitions of ANGRY FEELING AGAINST THE MISSIONARIES became more violent than ever. They were denounced by all the white people, by the press, and by the Colonial Legislature, as being in league with the Anti-Slavery Society, by whom the British Government was instigated to effect their ruin. Accordingly, when Mr. Phillippo presented himself to the authorities to ask the necessary permission to preach, he was at first peremptorily refused. Five months afterward temporary permission was granted, only to be almost immediately revoked. On every hand the missionary was exposed to annoyances and humiliations at the hands of the public officials and their subordinates, but he committed himself and his cause to God. At length, with the opening of the year 1825, he was able uninterceptedly to devote himself to the great and inspiring object of his life.

A new chapel was erected, schools were established, and wherever he proclaimed the tidings of salvation, a large number of conversions took place. Meanwhile in England the struggle for was growing vehement, while through the preaching of Mr. Phillippo hundreds of slaves were on every hand rejoicing in the liberty wherewith Christ makes men free. The rapid growth of missionary churches throughout the island was observed by the slaveholding interest with uneasiness, and like dismay, and the less scrupulous of the planters missed no opportunity of opposing the progress of the Gospel, but still, as in apostolic days, "the word the more mightily grew, and prevailed."

For the next ten years the contest in the British Parliament for the abolition of slavery went on vigorously led by the energetic band of men, among whom the most prominent were Burchell, Knibb, Macaulay, Wilberforce, Granville Sharpe, T. Clarkson, and T. F. Buxton. On February 20th, 1838, Lord Brougham brought in a motion in the House of Lords that what was called "Apprenticeship" should cease on the 1st of August. It was supported by only seven peers. The same motion was made in the House of Commons on March 20th, only to be rejected by a majority of 54 in a House of 484 members. But a bolder proposal was made on May 23d—viz., that the negro should be

EMANCIPATED.

It was carried by a majority of three. It was now evident that the cause of the slaveholders was lost. Indeed, Lord Sligo, a large owner of slaves in the West Indies, declared that on the 1st of August, he should set free all his "apprentices," and the announcement was hailed both in Britain and Jamaica with enthusiasm. The Legislature of Jamaica met on June 5th. The Governor called their attention to the uncontrollable agitation existing in the mother country, and said it was evident that the Government of England itself was unable to insure the continuance of the "apprenticeship" as an act of national obligation in the face of

THE NATIONAL PROTEST.

The negroes were also excitedly expecting that the 1st of August would set them free; and in some of the other islands the local Legislatures had already decreed the abolition. Thus pressed, the House, on the third day of their sitting read for the first time a bill to terminate the "apprenticeship," on August 1st. The next day it was amended, read a third time, and passed. On the 16th of June it received the Governor's assent, and thus, notwithstanding an energetic protest which marred the gratefulness of the act, freedom was secured, and the three hundred thousand bondsmen of Jamaica were made absolutely free.

THE FIRST OF AUGUST, 1838, dawned amid scenes of intense excitement. Thousands of people had gathered in the chapel and in the mission premises on the previous night, and many more kept pouring in from all quarters during the night. Appropriate and deeply interesting services of prayer and praise, interspersed with addresses, were held until dawn; and when the sound of the clock striking six was heard, one universal shout burst forth from the lips of the multitude within the building, echoed by a great multitude, without: "Freedom's come! Our wives, and our children are free! Glory to God for this blessed day!" Hymns prepared for the occasion were sung in strains that showed unmistakably the melody of the heart, and none with fuller emotion than the hymn,—

"Joy! for every yoke is broken,
And the oppressed all go free;
Let us hail it as the token,
That our much-loved land may be,
Blessed of the Lord most high,
Ruler of the earth and sky."

During the day there were other services, as well as of an impressive character, one of which is illustrated in the picture on the first page. "The whole scene which the mission presented," says an eye-witness, "will never be forgotten. Over the two principal entrances to the chapel were three triumphal arches, decorated with leaves and flowers, and crowned with flags bearing the several inscriptions of—'Freedom's come,' 'Slavery is no more,' 'Thy chains are broken, Africa is free!' " "God," says Mr. Phillippo, "was universally recognized as the Giver of the bounties enjoyed, and from first to last He was regarded as the Great Author of their deliverance from bondage."

We have only space to give two other items of interest in connection with Mr. Phillippo's history.

CHOLERA SWEEPED OVER THE LAND

In October, 1850, sparing neither sex nor age. Not less than twenty thousand persons fell before the blast of the pestilence in three months, and before its ravages ceased in the following year, it is calculated that at least one tenth of the population was swept away. While it was at its height in Spanish Town, Mr. Phillippo went one day to the hospital, where he found two lying dead, and about sixteen or seventeen more rapidly following them. Both nurses and people belonged to the missionary's flock. He asked them if they wished him to pray. Several of the dying cried out, "Yes, minister, yes!" He did so, as shown in the front page picture, kneeling on the floor in the middle of the room, the poor creatures lying on mats around him. Numbers were attracted from all parts of the hospital, and all responded with sighs, ejaculations, and tears.

THE JUBILEE OF HIS MINISTRY was celebrated at Christmas, 1873. For a few weeks before this event, Mr. Phillippo was seriously ill, from injuries sustained in a fall down a precipice in the mountains, as represented in the picture on the first page. This was not the first accident of the kind he had met with during his numerous journeys among beetling rocks and unfrequented paths. But he was now seriously injured, and for some weeks compelled to keep his room, but through Divine mercy he was enabled to be present at the jubilee services. His was rendered necessary five years later by his advanced age. He was eighty years old, and his originally strong constitution was breaking down under the weight of years and exhausting labors. His final withdrawal took place on July 7th, 1878, and the Rev. Carey B. Berry, of Cullingworth, was inducted as his successor. For the next few months he was filled with a deep longing to be with Christ. His desire was speedily realized. In October he was prostrated by ague and fever; in the following January aneurism paralyzed the whole of his left side; and on May 11th, 1879, he was seized with difficulty of breathing and violent pains in the chest, and in a few minutes he was dead. He was deeply mourned by his late congregations to whom he had devoted so many years of labor. The colored people almost idolized him.

THEOSOPHIST FRAUD.

The doings of Madame Blavatsky, who went from America to India, some few years ago to practise Spiritualism in connection with Buddhism, have been frequently referred to in the daily journals. We are now favored with a revelation made in a book published by a lady who appears to have acted for some time as Madame Blavatsky's chief assistant. This lady, one Madame Coulomb, shows how communications purporting to come from the spirit world are delivered. A certain Mr. S., in a communication to the Theosophist, had described the circumstances which led to his conversion to Madame Blavatsky's faith. He was convinced, it appears, by the receipt of a letter which fell apparently from the sky, and which contained answers to questions he had propounded to a spirit named Koot Hoomi, of whose existence Madame Blavatsky had told him. Who Koot Hoomi was when in the flesh we are not informed, but some clue to his nationality is obtained from his spelling. In the letter was the word "skepticism," so spelt, whereas it had been an East Indian who had learned English under an English teacher, he would have spelt it "scepticism," the inference being that the writer was an American, or had been taught by an American.

The delivery of the letter Madame Coulomb explains. She says it was done in the following manner: An ingeniously and well-combined trap was fixed on the floor of the garret above Mr. S.'s room; the floor was boarded one, and between the boards was a space sufficiently wide to permit a thick letter to slip through easily. The aperture of the trap met with that of the boards, so that once the letter was freed from the arrangement which retained it, it slipped down and, being heavy, did not flutter in the space, but fell right on the table before him.

In order that you may easily understand how the letter slipped through, I shall have to tell you that the opening of the trap was performed by the pulling of a string which ran from the trap, where it was fastened, all along the garret above Mr. S.'s room, to that part of the garret above Madame Blavatsky's bedroom, where it passed through a hole and hung down behind the door and the curtain of her room, which was adjoining to that of Mr. S. As to the writing of the letter, she declares that she saw Madame Blavatsky write it.

An Indication of the Effect of High License was recently given in the Missouri Legislature. A license bill having been defeated, some of the members declared themselves in favor of a much higher license law. A graduated measure, with licenses rapidly increasing according to the size of towns, was introduced, and by the committee reported back favorably within an hour. On the part of the dealers it was urged that even a high license law would be much better than no such law at all, because, without a license, there would be a strong probability of the success of prohibitory measures. It is evident that the dealers think they are reduced to a choice between two evils.

THE ROLLER-SKATE CRAZE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached last Sunday Morning, April 12, 1885.

"The noise of the wheels over against him."—

EZEK. 3: 13.

"The noise of the rattling of the wheels."—NAHUM 3: 2.

The World's Wheels in Operation—An Indication of Progress and Tendency—The Wheel in Recreation—The Scarcity of Healthful Amusements—The Evening Entertainments Offered—The Difference in Rinks—A Graceful and Healthful Recreation—The Dangers of the Amusement—The Restrictions Needed—Ladies to be Chaperoned—No Senseless Prolongation—No Unwarranted Gallantries—What Filtration is—Not to become an Insanity—The Use of Recreation—A Preparation for Usefulness—A Test—A Recipe for Happiness.

In one verse are the wheels of help, and Ezekiel heard them. In the other verse are the wheels of destruction, and Nahum heard them. The good wheels and the bad wheels will decide the destiny of this planet. Archimedes eulogized the lever, and he said if he had a place for the fulcrum outside of this world on which the lever could rest, he could move the world; but he found no such resting-place for the fulcrum. And it is not the lever that is to lift or sink this world, but the wheel, whether the solid disk, or made up of the rim and spokes and hub. Wheel of railroad accelerating travel; wheel of printing-press multiplying intelligence; wheel of sewing machine alleviating toil; wheel of chronometer announcing the passage of the hours.

Balance wheel, fly wheel, belt wheel, spur wheel, driving wheel, racket wheel, the wheel invented by whom I know not, but the idea of it is suggested to us by the planetary system, which is a wheel, and the constellations and the galaxies, which are wheels, and these smaller wheels playing into the great wheel of the universe, the axis of which is the pillar on which rests the throne of God. Tell me which way turn, and I will tell you whether it is going toward ransom or ruin. Tell me how many revolutions they make in a minute, and I will tell you how rapidly it hastens on toward disenfranchisement or demolition.

In our day the principle of the wheel has been applied to recreations and amusements, and the velocipede and the bicycle and the tricycle and the roller skate are the consequence, and the thousand-voiced question to be met is, "Are the roller-skates wheels of help, like those which Ezekiel heard, or wheels of ruin, like those that rattled in the ears of Nahum?" Never in your time or mine has there been such high, wide, popular agitation of the question of amusements, and all ministers of the Gospel, and all parents, and all young people, and all old people need to be able to give an answer to these questions, and a right answer, and a reason for the answer.

Let me premise that for the last twenty-five years I have been looking for some healthful for the body and the mind—and an amusement that would come in time to rescue this generation. Of healthful, honest, useful amusement, you know as well as I there has been an awful scarcity. Plenty of places to blight and blast and consume body, mind, and soul. No lack of gambling saloons! Within an hour of every home and every hotel and every boarding-house in these cities there are places where a young man may get divorced of his money, and where the old spider of the gaming table officiates at the funeral of the innocent flies. You can lose ten cents, or you can lose a house and lot, or you can lose all you have in a night. Plenty of gambling saloons! I do not know a community on earth that is lacking in this direction.

PLENTY OF GROGSHOPS,

where the owner, by expending twelve dollars for genuine alcohol, can fix up a mixture that he can sell for two hundred. Nice little percentage of profit! They let a young man have all he wants as long as his money lasts—one glass, two glasses, three glasses, four glasses, five glasses, until his money is all gone, and it is demonstrated that he has not so much as a postage stamp left, and then they turn him into the street to take care of himself, or be helped home by some one not quite so intoxicated as himself, for the grog-seller never accompanies his victim to his home, lest at the door he confront mother or wife, to whom the Lord may have lent for a little while one of His smaller thunderbolts with which to smite the despoiler into ashes. Plenty of gates of hell, and all of them wide open, and temptresses to say, "Come in, come in!" But of honest, useful, healthful amusements

A GREAT SCARCITY.

Seven o'clock P. M. finds tens of thousands of young men at their home, or at the hotel, or at the boarding-house. The young man says, "How shall I spend this evening?" You say, "Go to prayer-meeting." Good advice for two nights of the week, and add to that the Sabbath night; subtracting three nights for religious purposes, you have four nights left for secular purposes. What shall the young man do with the four other nights? You say, "Go and hear a lecture on astronomy." But the young man's brain is all tired out with running up long lines of figures in the account book, or from trying to sell goods to people who do not want to buy them, and he has no appetite for astronomy. He does not want to know anything about other worlds, when he has more than he can do to take care of this one!

Now, you are a good man, you are a good woman, you take up a newspaper to tell that young man where to go. You will find, if you have ever tried it, that the vast majority of the advertisements announce places illy ventilated, with depraving companionship and much of the spectacular indecent. Two hours and a half in such a place of amusement, and the young man will come forth with body asphyxiated, mind weakened, soul scarred. Continuous entertainment of that kind makes lively work for undertakers, and gives tragedy of illustration for discourses on the text: "The end thereof is death." What our young people want is some style of recreation that shall help the body and help the mind—something that will allow them to be sound asleep at eleven o'clock at night and to awaken at seven o'clock in the morning, or earlier, thoroughly rested.

We want something for

that will put them at the goal of manhood and womanhood, ready for practical and useful life. Not mere splinters of humanity, not invalids at nineteen, twenty, and twenty-one, not masculine and feminine apologies, but ready to command respect, and with their own right arm, under God, put aside all obstacles. Now, a great many people are asking the question, "Does the roller-skate recreation afford this?" This amusement was invented in 1819 by Mr. Plympton, a Frenchman, who has been called

THE "FATHER OF THE RINK."

He kept a tight grip on the invention of the skate until, in 1883, the patent ran out, and now there are factories all over the land producing roller skates, and every evening there are tens of thousands of people, young, middle-aged, and old, on these wheels, good or bad. You ask me if I favor the roller-skate exercise? I reply, Yes, with restrictions, and No, if there be no restrictions; yes, if it be restricted, and no, if it be unguarded. In other words, you can make it the best thing, or you can make it the worst thing. They have already, some of them, been exhilaration to the body—they have given health to the sick and the enfeebled, and have been innocent hilarity to a vast multitude. Other of the rinks have broken up families, have set surgeons to perform most painful operations, have produced lifelong ailments and everlasting misfortune. There is as much as between light and darkness, as between heaven and hell. I will not be misunderstood on this subject. If any one shall go away from this house this morning and say I gave unrestricted praise or blame to the skating-rink exercise, he misrepresents me, and will be found to be a defamer when the full stenographic report of this sermon shall be published.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN SKATING RINKS

The skating-rink exercise, with proper precautions—and I shall show you what they are before I get through—the skating-rink exercise, with proper precautions, seems to me the most of all amusements and all recreations. It eclipses coasting, it eclipses croquet, it eclipses football, and lawn-tennis, and skating under moonlight over frozen pond, and all the other amusements that I know of, and recreations. It is good for the muscles, it is good for the nerves, it is good for the lungs, it is good for the limbs, it is good for the circulation, it is good for the spirits—under proper precautions. It has all the advantage of the gymnasium, with more exhilaration of spirit; it has all the advantage of the skating pond over which our fathers and mothers used to dart, without any of the danger of breaking through the ice; it has all the exhilaration of outdoor sport without being dependent on the condition of the atmosphere. With proper precautions, I say.

It would be well if our young men almost every night or afternoon of the secular week would take one hour for this healthful recreation, and come back to their duties again. It would be well if the women of America, who decline the brisk walk called the "constitutional," which keeps the English women rosy and strong, would one hour—one hour of the secular afternoon or the secular evening, turn back on darning and mending and bread-making and housekeeping and try this exhilarating sport. It would bring health to some of these hollow cheeks, it would bring to the lack-lustre eye the lost light, it would give strength to the worn-out body, it would straighten the stooped shoulders and drive away consumption and merciless neuralgia, and nervous prostration would be gone forever. The great demand in this country is some reasonable, honest, healthful recreation for the women of America, who are perishing for the lack of it. It would be well if the young man in the hotel of New York or Brooklyn, while during the day he purchases goods for a Western house, should in the evening just go to a respectable rink and hire a pair of skates, and interfering with no one, independent of everybody else, take a little of this exercise and go back to his hotel again.

But while I see the possibilities, the immense possibilities of this exercise—more possibilities in it for health than any exercise I ever heard of or ever dreamed of, it has been the means of destruction to body, mind, and soul of a good many. And now come

THE RESTRICTIONS.

First of all, let us have no more of the vulgarity or immodesty of young women going along the streets of these cities unattended and alone to any place of amusement, whether it be rink or anything else. Let them be chaperoned by mother, or older sister, or father, or brother. If in a skating rink a man, without proper introduction, tips his hat to a lady, let the officers of the rink hasten that offender to the door and help him down the front steps with all modes of accelerating momentum he can think of. If these well-dressed devils who haunt skating rinks, and sometimes stand at church doors, would get their quick justice done them, there would be less crime abroad and less ruin of society, and more honest amusement allowed, and more pure recreation.

Another remark I have to make, and that is, let not the bright lights and the enchanting music tempt you to

of the amusement. Let there be no strife as to who shall be the swiftest skater, or shall count up the most fabulous number of circuits. Stop when you have got all the health there is in the amusement. Remember that the laws of health are the laws of God. Keep the Ten Commandments written on your nerves, and on your bones, and in the tissue of your lips, and on your lungs, and on your heart. Remember that at the door of every skating rink and every place of amusement, honest or dishonest, on every cold night a whole group of pneumonias stand ready to escort you to the sepulchre. Cool off before you face the north wind. Accept.

NO UNWARRANTED GALLANTRIES.

Let the law that dominates the parlor dominate the place of amusement. And I want all the people to understand that the evil I hint at is not a characteristic of skating rinks any more than of a great many other places and a great many other conditions. In other words, it is high time that people in this country understood that flirtation is damnation. When on Broadway, New York, or Fulton Street, Brooklyn, toward the evening hour, when gentlemen of business are returning from their work, I see the daughters of respectable families, with conspicuous behavior and a giggle intended to attract masculine attention, a horror goes through my soul, and I wonder if their parents are at all observant. The vast majority of those who make everlasting shipwreck carry that kind of sail. The pirates of death attack that kind of craft. If I had a voice loud enough to be heard from the Penobscot to the Rio Grande, I would cry out, "Flirtation is damnation!"

MUST NOT BE A CRAZE.

Another remark: a craze on any subject is deplorable. Ball-playing, which has given to many of us the muscle and the strength with which we have gone on to discharge the duties of life, has become with many a dementia, and the gamblers have clutched it with their fingers, and from the innocent game of ball many have gone home robbed of their person, worst of all, robbed of their morals. Is that anything against ball playing? Boating, which with many of us who lived on the banks of rivers resulted in development of chest, which has allowed us easy respiration for twenty, thirty, forty years, and which would have given stout lungs to many who long ago vanished under pulmonary complaints—innocent boating has been seized upon by college students, who have sacrificed book for oar, and brain for muscle. Victors at the boat race dead failures in all the practical business of life. Is that anything against boating? Strip this roller-sket excitement of the craze, and substitute common-sense.

There is another very important thing for us all to remember—especially those of us who have got beyond forty years of age—and that is, once ourselves. From the memory of a great many good people that seems to be obliterated. Go back forty years, and then think what was necessary for you then, and what was appropriate for you then. Rheumatism is incompetent to give law to solid ancles! You cannot expect people to have the tastes of the aged before they get to thirty. Do not go out looking for golden rod and China asters on a May morning. These people who have the tastes of the aged before they get to the thirties after a while are the people who bore the life out of prayer-meetings, and turn religion into a sniffing cant, and disgust the world with that which ought to be attractive.

Do not forget that we once enjoyed the hilarities of life, if indeed we have passed along so far that we have forgotten it. Ah! no, we cannot improve on God's arrangement. God knew what was best. He made them boys and girls, and He intends them to stay boys and girls until they are called to some other condition. They will come to the tug of life soon enough. Do not be envious of them, do not be jealous of them. They have the same battle ahead that we are fighting. Let them now cultivate broad shoulders and brawny arm and stout health, which will be taxed to the utmost long after you and I are under the ground.

Nothing of a secular nature pleases me so well as to see the young people laugh and have a good time—I mean by that

A GOOD INNOCENT TIME

—for I say to myself, in a little while all the generation now at the front will pass away, and these will come on, and they will have the battle of life to fight, and they will have burdens to carry, and oh, how many sorrows and annoyances and vexations! I rejoice now if they have amusement and hilarities. Let all the proprietors of skating rinks and all parents unite in one grand conspiracy to overthrow the poor health and the physical stagnation of our cities and the bad places of amusement will be empty, and the coming generation will have a vigor rebounding and athletic. Oh, that they might all start life with more strength of body than we have! Their battle may be greater than our battle has been. As we come on toward the great Armageddon the strife is going to be the more tremendous. And most certainly we want human

LONGEVITY IMPROVED.

We want the average of human life instead of thirty, one hundred and fifty. Why not? In olden times they lived two hundred, three hundred, four hundred, five hundred, six hundred years. The world ought to be as healthy now as it ever was. Many of the marshes have been filled up. Medical science has gone forth and crippled and balked and destroyed many diseases, and why not the average of human life now something like what it used to be? But you know now the way it is. By the time we get our education or learn our trade and get fairly started we have to quit because we are emeritus. We fall at the opening of the great war of existence instead of at the close, at Bull Run instead of Gettysburg.

Another remark I want to make—for there has not been a mail that has come to my house for the last six weeks that has not been burdened with these questions, and I propose this morning and on following Sabbath mornings to discuss the whole subject and say all I have to say—I want all to understand that our amusements and recreations are merely intended

TO FIT US FOR USEFULNESS.

I hope that none of you, my friends, have fallen into the delusion that your mission in life is to enjoy yourself. You just hand me a list of the people you find at all hours of day and night at places of entertainment, and in one minute I will give you a list of the people who are sacrificing themselves for both worlds. Pepper and salt and sugar and cinnamon are very important, but that would be a very unhealthy repast that had nothing else on the table. Amusements and recreations are the of the great banquet. But some of you overpleasuring people are feeding the body and soul on condiments. Ah! it is only those who have work to do and are doing it well—it is only such persons who are really entitled to the amusements and the recreations of this life. I know many people think this is a sarcastic passage which says, "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, but know thou that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment." It is not sarcastic, it is not ironical; it simply means to say, have a good time, have a real good time, but do not go into anything that will be frightened by the judgment throne, do not forget your duties, do not forget you are immortal. We are to make these recreations of life preparations for practical usefulness.

Solon made a law that once every year every man should show by what trade or occupation he got his living, and if he could not show some trade or occupation by which he got his living, he was imprisoned and punished as a thief. In olden time when a man wanted to become a Roman citizen the officer of the law would take his hand and feel it; and if the hand felt hard, the conclusion was that the man was industrious; and if the hand felt soft, the conclusion was he was idle. While in our time many a diligent man has a soft hand for the reason that his toil is with the brain, and hence the palm does not get calloused, nevertheless we must all have some earnest work to do, and we must concentrate on that work. We must make our amusements of our capacity. My brother, if at the close of any recreation or amusement you go home at night and cannot get down on your knees and say, "O Lord, bless the amusement and entertainment of this night to my better qualification for usefulness!" that is an amusement in which you ought not to have engaged. Living is a tremendous affair, and alas! for the man who makes recreation a depletion instead of an augmentation.

Can you imagine any predicament worse than that which I now sketch? Time has passed, and we come up to judgment to give an account for what we have been doing. The angel of the judgment says to us: "You came up from a world where there were millions in sin, millions in poverty, millions in wretchedness, and there were a great many people, philanthropists and Christians, who tolled themselves into the grave trying to help others—"

WHAT DID YOU DO?"

And then the angel of the resurrection, the angel of the judgment, will say: "Those are the women who consecrated their needle to God and made garments for the poor." And the angel of the judgment will say: "Those are the men who consecrated their sword to patriotism and fought for their country; those out yonder are the angels of Northern and Southern battlefields; these people are those who were eyes to the blind and ears to the deaf and bread to the hungry and heaven for the lost. What did you do?" The angel of the judgment, facing the group of pleurists: "What did you do?"

"Well," says one of them. "I was very fond of the drama, and I spent my evenings looking at it." "Well," says another. "I was the champion of ball pitchers." "Well," says another. "I could beat any one in our town in lawn-tennis." "Well," says another, "I could go around swifter on the skate than any one else, and my gyrations won many applaudits."

"WAS THAT ALL?"

says the angel of judgment. "That was all," say the pleurists. "That was all!" says the keeper of the records. "That was all," say multitudes who were saved by others, but not saved by them. "That was all!" says the earth, reddening in the last conflagration. "That was all!" says the Judge of quick and dead as He seals their destiny. "That was all!" echo the ages of eternity. "That was all, that was all!" May the Almighty God forbid that you and I should make the terrific mistake of substituting merriment for duty.

Pliny says that the mermaids danced on the green grass, but all around them were dead men's bones. Neither bat nor ball, nor boat, nor skate, although they all have their uses, can make death life and eternity happy. A king said to two of his wise men, "You go out and get me a recipe, you make me a recipe for happiness, and you will have two months to make the recipe in, and I want you to tell me in that prescription how I can be happy, and how I can make all my subjects happy." Well, they took two months, and then the wise men came in, and one of them had a roll of two hundred rules by which this king should be happy and make all his subjects happy, and the king got tired with the recital. Then he turned to the other wise man, and said: "What is your prescription for making myself happy and making all my subjects happy?" and the wise man answered in two words: "Love God." "Why," said the king, "I gave you two months to give me a rule for happiness; is that all you have to offer?" "Yes," he replied; "that is all I have to offer. Love God, and if you love God you will be happy, and if you love God you will make all your subjects happy." Love the world and you will be miserable. Love God and you will be happy.

"MOTHER GILES."

By Mr. T. C. Garland.*

"MOTHER GILES" having found peace with God in Spitalfields Chapel, became a member of the society at the Seamen's Chapel. She became very anxious to do something for Him who had done so much for her, and earnestly besought the Lord to teach her what He would have her to do. She was soon deeply impressed with the thought that she must go to the Tower of London and distribute tracts among the soldiers who are kept on guard there, and on the following Sunday went with her bag well filled, and commenced her work by giving tracts to officers and men. At first they were amused at what they called the "little woman's" efforts to make them "pious"; but her faith never failed, and she toiled on in this field of labor alone for many years. In all weathers she was at her post on the Sunday mornings, and many will be her crown of rejoicing at the last great day.

One evening she attended a love-feast at Spitalfields Chapel. During the evening a soldier gave his experience, and told what a wicked life he had lived for several years, till a tract given by "good Mother Giles" had led him to Christ. "Since then," he said, "my dear mother has been saved through my efforts and prayers, and four of my comrades have given their hearts to God." Mother Giles sat unobscured by the speaker, her heart overflowing with joy. At length she exclaimed, "Bless the Lord! I give all the glory to His holy name."

At one time her heart was drawn out in deep concern for two tradesmen who opened their shops on the Lord's Day. She regularly called with her tracts, and spoke faithfully to them as to the sin they were committing, and urged them again and again to close their shops on the Sabbath; but all in vain. One told her, "We cannot afford to close; it would be our ruin." On account of these refusals she would often weep in secret before the Lord. One Sunday when she called with her tracts the shopkeeper said: "My dear woman, how ill you look! what is the matter with you—what's your trouble?" She was silent till all the customers had left, and then she replied: "Oh, sir, I am in trouble about your soul, and those of your wife and family. I have been asking the Lord to stop your Sabbath-breaking, and I have the answer. Sir, He will stop you; but how or when I cannot say;" and bursting into tears, she added, "I feel sure it will be a heavy blow when it does come." The man only smiled, and began to serve another customer who had entered the shop.

Next morning, very early, the cry of "Fire" was raised, and flames were seen proceeding from the baker's shop. In a short time the house was burned down, the tenant, his wife and family, having only time to escape with their lives. The house was not insured, and they were left utterly penniless. The other tradesman, when he heard of the calamity, said, "If it had been my house and shop it would not have been so bad, for I am well insured." Strange to tell, however, before the week was over, the Almighty visited that family with an awful affliction, and in his deep sorrow the Sabbath-breaker sent for this godly woman, urging her not to pray against him any longer, but to pray for him, and he would never open his shop again on the Lord's Day. She entreated the Lord to withdraw His hand and show mercy to the penitent. Both men were converted to God.

Another case is, I think, more remarkable still. There lived in Limehouse a sailor, James Witchell, a professed infidel, and in other respects a very wicked man. He appeared to have only one good quality—he was passionately fond of his mother. This man was quite a stranger to Mrs. Giles, and she only heard of his name and wickedness while taking tea at a friend's house. The good woman could not restrain her feelings, but began to weep, saying, "Poor James! I must pray for him!"

The next Sabbath morning, immediately after breakfast, she left home with her bundle of tracts. She offered one to the first person she met, but the man looked at her with contempt, saying with an oath, "Keep your tracts." "I have plenty more," was her soft answer. "Please take and read it, it may do your soul good."

"I have no soul," said the man. "There is no soul, no God, no hereafter. Why, my little woman, you don't know whom you are talking to; my name is Witchell, of Limehouse. Nobody that knows me would offer me a tract." She looked him in the face and asked, "Is your name James?" "Yes, James Witchell is my name."

Placing her hand on his shoulder, she said, solemnly, "Listen to the word of the Lord of Hosts: Turn ye, turn ye, . . . for why will ye die?" James, I have heard of you, and of your wicked life, and have been asking the Lord to convince and save your soul. Once more listen to me, James. He says, 'Turn ye, turn ye, . . . for why will ye die?' The astonished sinner turned pale, his lips quivered, and he could scarcely speak. At length he inquired what place of worship she attended.

"That's my chapel," she said, pointing to the Seamen's Chapel. "Then I'll be there this evening," he said. James was true to his word, and became a true Christian, a zealous worker, and died a most triumphant death.

She was seized with a slight attack of paralysis, which for a time affected her speech and one side of her body. In answer to prayer God restored her speech so that she could speak quite distinctly. For several weeks her sufferings were great, but not a murmur escaped her lips. The last time I saw her she said, "Praise the Lord! The race is almost over. I want you to pray for two things: first, for my speedy release, if it is God's will; if not, for perfect resignation. And I want you to pray for my family; I have done it, as you know, for many years, but I can pray no longer." Then with a significant look, she whispered in my ear, "You know all about them; pray till they are all saved." She closed her eyes and lay quiet for some minutes; then raising her hands, she cried out, "He is faithful—who hath promised—I do believe—all, yes, all will be saved." In a few days her happy spirit had left the body to be forever with the Lord. She entered into rest on the 13th of January, 1883.

CRUEL CHEAPNESS.

AN article under the above heading, from the pen of Rev. Archibald G. Brown, appeared in this journal on March 26th. A Christian gentleman in New York, Mr. S. F. Kendall, was impressed with the vivid picture of the misery of the workers presented by the London clergyman, and wrote him asking the question: "How can Christian women individually lessen 'to-day' the awful evils in the lives of their suffering sisters, caused by 'cruel cheapness'?" and adding: "May we not hope that the aggregate of even individual effort, wisely directed, may accomplish some amelioration of the untold anguish which is caused by 'cruel cheapness'?" This is Mr. Brown's reply:

"MY DEAR SIR: The question is no easy one to answer. I always feel that the bitterest thing about the bitter cry is the inability to respond to it in any other way than that of sympathy. I feel it is humiliating to have to say: 'I don't know'; but it is better to say so, like Moses (Num. 9: 8), than sacrifice truthfulness to keeping up an appearance of knowledge. I see the evil, but I do not see how Christian women are to materially lessen it. While human nature remains human nature, it will be selfish, and soon to get the most it can for the least return. In addition to this, thousands, by the lowness of their wages—the result of cheapness—are driven to the cheap market. That which they suffer from they must yet patronize. Paid on the cheap, they must buy on the cheap. It is a vicious circle, from which there seems no escape.

"On the other hand, there are many to whom 'cheapness' is not a necessity of life, and on these I believe it is incumbent to keep clear from complicity with the wrong, if powerless to undo it. When a lady deliberately and needlessly patronizes 'a cutting house,' and purchases things concerning which she is herself bound to say, 'I cannot think how it is done for the money,' I hold she is implicated in the evil. There are still in all trades respectable dealers, who are trying to hold out against the mad competition of the day, and do not court customers by the bait of 'excessive cheapness'—men who pay fair wages and charge fair prices. These traders should be supported by Christian customers.

"I do not for a moment suppose such action would go far to cure the evil. It would, however, save from complicity, bear a faithful witness, and help the deserving. Let Christians, as far as possible, support businesses that are conducted on Christian principles. It is hard for a godly tradesman to see fellow-Christians give all their support to any worldling, simply because he owns a noted cheap house. A Christian conscience in the matter of bestowing custom is sorely needed.

"The whole matter is an intensely difficult one, and I can only wish the remedy was as clear before my eyes as the evil. Yours sincerely, ARCHIBALD G. BROWN."

THE REIGN OF CHRIST.

By Rev. G. W. Pendleton, A.M.

Expected in Ancient and Modern Times—Its Spirituality a Modern Idea—Allusions to it in Prophecy—More Numerous than those of the First Advent—Testimony of Milton, Bunyan, and Others—All Believers will Reign with Christ—The Millennial Glory.

The belief prevailed among both ancient and modern men of God that a great King would come in the line of David, who would conquer all His enemies and establish a universal reign of righteousness and peace over all the earth.

The idea of a spiritual reign, except that over the Church in its present state, is a novel conception of modern times. And it is encouraging to know that the number of those who have been holding this novel conception are continually decreasing, as they are led to investigate the Scriptures on the subject of Christ's reign. They find touching the personal reign of Christ more numerous than those which point to His humiliation, sufferings, and death. If they take the Old Testament and turn to Isa. 16: 5 they read: "And in mercy shall the throne be prepared; and He shall sit upon it in truth in the tabernacle of David, judging and seeking judgment, and hasting righteousness." Ezek. 37: 22: "And I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all; neither shall they be two nations, nor divided into two kingdoms any more at all," etc. Jer. 23: 5-8: "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a king shall reign," etc. Amos 9: 11: "In that day will I raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen, and close up his breaches, and I will raise up his ruins," etc. Jer. 3: 17: "At that time they shall call Jerusalem the throne of the Lord; and all the nations shall be gathered unto it, to the name of the Lord, to Jerusalem," etc. Isa. 24: 23: "Then the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before His ancients gloriously;" or, "There shall be glory before His ancients," Ps. 72: 8-11: "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth." "Yea, all kings shall fall down before Him; all nations shall serve Him."

* Mr. Garland's work among the soldiers, sailors, and destitute poor in the most squalid districts of London is well known. The incidents related here happened within his own personal knowledge, and are facts, not fictions.

If they take

d turn to Luke 1: 32, 33, they read: "And the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David; and He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of His kingdom there shall be no end." This means that Christ must reign on the throne of David in Palestine. David never had a throne anywhere else. This is a personal reign of Christ over the redeemed people of God after their resurrection, when He hath put all enemies under His feet, and He is manifested head of creation, ruler over land and sea, and making His name glorious to the ends of the earth.

This cannot be a spiritual reign, for Christ is been reigning, spiritually, over His Church for near two thousand years. Christ said to Satan: "Now my kingdom is not of this world." He had not, at that time, come to sit on the throne of His father David; and yet He was born to be King, and He will "reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of His reign there shall be no end."

John Milton, the poet, says of Christ's personal reign: "That this reign will be on earth evident from many passages." Quoting Ps. 8: 9; Dan. 7: 22-27; Ps. 110: 5, 6; Isa. 6: 7; Luke 1: 32, 33; also 22: 29, 30; Rev. 25: 27. John Bunyan held to the doctrine of the personal reign of Christ on the throne of David forever. Thomas Goodwin says: "There is a special world, called the world to come, appointed for Jesus Christ eminently to reign in." "There is a world to come appointed for the second Adam." "And as God takes the same substance of man's nature, and engrafts the new creature upon it, the same man still, so He takes the same world that was Adam's, and makes it new and glorious, a new world for the second Adam." "And He shall reign on the earth."

All believers will reign with Christ. Matt. 9: 28, 29: "And Jesus said unto them, Verily say unto you, that ye who followed me in the generation (new world), when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of His glory, ye," etc. "And every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren," etc. Rev. 5: 9, 10: "And they sung a new song," etc. "And on the earth." David's throne will be established, and Christ will sit upon it, and this promise will be fulfilled, "I will make my firstborn higher than the kings of the earth. My mercy will I keep for Him for evermore, and my covenant shall stand fast with Him. His seed also will I make to endure forever, and His throne as the days of heaven" (Ps. 89: 27-29).

Isaac Watts says of this reign: "The Wonderful, the Counsellor, shall have honor and wide dominion. Jesus shall sit high on the throne of His father David, and crushing all His foes beneath." His feet, He shall reign to unknown ages." Then all the promises of the Bible touching the universal prevalence of the truth and peace will be fulfilled. The song of the angels which they sang over the plains of Bethlehem—"Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace and good-will to men"—will be repeated, as of a fact accomplished. "The lamb and the lion shall lie down together." Then the true Israel of God will inhabit the land from the river of Egypt unto the great river Euphrates (Gen. 15: 18), which land the Israelites have never inhabited. Then the ancients shall be raised out of their graves (Ezek. 37: 12-14), and shall dwell in their own land, and "the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before His ancients gloriously."

How the heart of Abraham swelled with joy as he looked down through the intervening ages and "saw the Lord high and lifted up, and His train filled the temple!" How joy lifted up the souls of all the ancient people of God, when, by faith, they saw the Conqueror of kings and of wicked nations coming in triumphant majesty to maintain the rights of a long-outraged throne in the presence of all His saints!

THE MILLENNIAL GLORY.

Now, earth's long dark night is passed; the toils, sorrow, and pain of the Church are ended; Antichrist and all false systems of religion and governments are overthrown; and the mystery of God is finished; and the Sabbath, the rest, the crowns, the joy, the glory, and the throne have come. "And pains, and groans, and griefs, and fears, and death itself shall die." The reign of heaven will be restored to earth. The divine administration will be established among men. Rev. 21: 3: "And I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them, and they shall be His people, and God Himself shall be with them, and be their God."

THE NEW JERUSALEM

—the redeemed of all nations, coming down from heaven with their raised bodies to reign on the renewed earth—will be lighted and enriched by the presence and pervaded by the living energy and love of the reigning King. "The Lamb is the light thereof."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Bound with his Own Chain.—At a recent meeting the Rev. Mr. Cowe said: "There was a certain blacksmith who was ordered by an emperor to make a chain. He did so, and brought it to the emperor, but was told to take it back, and make it a little longer; and a third time he was ordered to take it back and make it longer still. When he brought it the third time the emperor said: 'Take the chain which he has made, and bind him with it, and throw him into prison.' Is now this what sin is doing to many everywhere, around us? Men and women, at the bidding of the devil, are slowly but surely forging a horrible chain for themselves, and ultimately they will be seized, and bound tightly by the chain of sins and evil habits, and thrown into the bottomless pit, without hope of mercy or liberation."

A Knotted Tree.—A Christian Worker Said:

"In a wood, near the place where I lived when a boy, there was a tree in which I took very great interest. It was a large strong tree and knotted right through the middle of the trunk, and I often used to wonder how that knot came there. One of the oldest men in the village told me that when he was quite a boy the tree was a slender green twig, and he tied a knot upon it, wondering if it would grow, and it had grown into a strong tree, but the knot was still there. This, dear friends, is like the sin tied in our children's hearts; if the knot of sin be not unloosed when the children are young, and their hearts tender, that knot of sin will grow, and strengthen with the child, and will be almost as hard to unloose as the knot in the tree. Lead them while children to Christ."

The Only Man on the Wreck.—A Temperance advocate said that:

"A ship was wrecked, and a cry for help arose. The small boats were hurriedly being prepared to go to the assistance of the drowning crew, when some one said, 'Where is John Harding?' 'I have no idea,' was the reply; 'he was seen going into the town some time ago.' Well, we shall have to go without him, said the first speaker, and off they went. A shout of joy arose when the boats returned, filled with people. John Harding was now on the scene, and was one of the most eager of the waiting crowd. 'Have you saved every one?' he eagerly asked. 'All but one,' they joyfully answered. 'All but one,' he repeated; 'and you have left a poor fellow to perish on that sinking ship alone?' 'Who will come with me into the old boat, and risk their lives for the man on board the wreck?' he exclaimed. Eleven hands were at once raised as a signal that they would go. When they were about to leave the shore a woman was seen eagerly pushing her way through the crowd until she came right up to Harding, and said, 'Oh, don't go out on such a stormy sea; you know that your father was drowned, and your brother Will went to sea eight years ago, and we have not heard anything of him since, and you are all that is left to me; don't go, John!' 'O mother, let me go!' cried Harding; 'I cannot stay here and see a poor fellow perishing; you may be sure that the Lord will provide for you if anything comes over me.' 'Go, my son,' said the mother, 'and may God bless you.' The brave men got into the old boat, and were soon tossing on the stormy sea, and the eager crowd waited anxiously for their return. They soon came in sight of the shore, and some one shouted, 'Have you got him?' 'Yes,' answered Harding, 'and tell mother that it is brother Will.' 'Yes, it was the long-lost son and brother, who was left on the sinking ship.'

An Old Man's Prayer.—A Scotch Evangelist

said: "I recollect a woman who was converted in our meeting at Bridge of Weir. The first week after she had given herself to Christ, she was a happy, joyful woman; but the second week all was dark; she had no faith, and she could not see the love of Jesus, although she continued coming to the meeting. At the end of the meeting, one night an old man rising, said: 'Let us close with the prayer that we learned at our mother's knee,' and the old man clasping his hands together, and closing his eyes, repeated the well-known prayer beginning with, 'This night I lay me down to sleep, I give my soul to Christ to keep.' The childish prayer was not without effect; it awoke old memories in the woman's heart of the time she had learned that prayer at her mother's knee. She again entered into light and liberty, and is now a faithful and rejoicing child of God."

From Destitution to a Kingdom.—A Member of the Mizpah Band thus testified: "Although I had been a Presbyterian church member for many years, and the father of a family, I had wandered from God and from the enjoyment of communion in consequence of intemperance. I had suffered severely in body and mind, and lost all I had—business, position, and friendship. I went to London for a change, to work there for a year and a half, and gave way on one or two occasions to the old enemy. At last, in despair, having no one near to pity or help, I resolved to call upon the Lord with all my heart, and in a lonely room in the north-west of the great city, I pleaded with my Father in heaven to save me. Blessed be His holy name, deliverance came; the drink appetite was taken away, and there came new joy in my soul. I now sing in my heart, 'My tears are wiped away, for Jesus is a Friend of mine; I'll serve Him every day.' I prayed to God to send me home to my beloved wife and family. He did so, and I have been singing and praying with them ever since, and, believe me, I never was so happy in my life as I am now."

Secret Indulgence Discovered.—A Christian

gentleman narrated: "There was a young man, a friend of mine, who was much given to strong drink; but he indulged his degraded appetite in a secret way, quite unknown to his family. One night, coming home at a late hour very much the worse for drink, and sick from the effects of it, his mother met him at the door. She had waited up for him, although all the others had retired to rest. She pleaded with him to take some refreshment before retiring for the night; but he, not willing to let his mother know that he had been drinking, hastily brushing past her, said that he did not wish for anything to eat. But she, with all a mother's care, followed him into his room, saying, 'Oh, William, you must take something to eat.' At this moment he could stand no longer; he staggered and fell, and now she knew what was the matter with her boy. Speaking of it afterward to me, he said: 'I was so filled with shame at mother, for the first time, finding me overpowered by drink, that I resolved from that moment the accused thing should never touch my lips again.' And neither has it, dear friends. He has been true to his resolve, and has given himself, body, soul, and spirit, to the Lord."

CURRENT EVENTS.

Notwithstanding the Improvement in General Grant's condition, which the physicians reported at the beginning of last week, neither the illustrious patient nor the public had any hope of his recovery. It was, however, some relief to know that his acute sufferings had diminished, and that he was more cheerful than before. It was, therefore, with a new disappointment that the people learned on Tuesday, April 7th, that an alarming attack had that morning caused apprehension of a sudden collapse. At about four o'clock in the morning the general had a fit of coughing, which was followed by a flow of blood from the mouth. It soon ceased, but it showed that the disease had weakened the arteries of the throat. This of itself was cause for alarm, apart from the fact that the loss of blood was serious in the patient's weak condition. It was thought he could not live through the day, but his amazing vitality and his unruffled composure were strong points in his favor. He rallied, and on Wednesday he was pronounced much better. On Thursday, too, an improvement was reported, but the reply cabled to Queen Victoria, who had instructed one of her attendants to inquire after General Grant, showed that the family were not deceived. Colonel Fred Grant acknowledged the Queen's sympathy on his mother's behalf, but added: "General Grant is no better." On Friday and Saturday the general's condition was unchanged, except that the cancer was slowly but surely making progress. About eleven o'clock on Saturday night he had a severe paroxysm of coughing, but without hemorrhage. Sunday night was tranquil and on Monday the bulletins were again favorable.

The Secretary of State has Directed the representatives of the United States in Europe to signify to the governments of those countries the willingness of this government to consider the question of adjusting and fixing a common rate between the coinage values of gold and silver when European countries are ready to unite, with a view of securing the unlimited coinage and legal tender of the two metals on an internationally agreed upon ratio. These instructions have been sent up in view of the approaching monetary congress in Paris of the representatives of the countries forming the Latin Union. This makes no change in the attitude of this country, though the action of the convention may seriously affect our interests. If the convention should agree on a ratio, the value of our silver dollar would fall to eighty-three cents. The probability, however, is that the government will fix no ratio, but allow the United States to go on coining silver alone. The subject is a serious one, as our present system threatens the treasury with the loss of all its gold.

The Serious Illness of the Hon. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, ex-Secretary of State, was announced last week. The ex-Secretary is said to have contracted his disease five years ago, when he had an attack of intermittent fever, which was followed by a liver trouble. It was against the advice of the family physician that he became Secretary of State. He devoted himself with much assiduity to his duties, with the result that when he quitted office he was suffering from nervous prostration. On Thursday, April 2, he was obliged to take to his bed. Mr. Frelinghuysen rallied a little on Saturday night, and his condition was more comfortable than during the day. The physicians, however, give but little hope of a favorable termination to his disease.

James D. Fish, the Ex-President of the Marine Bank, of New York, who was implicated in the transactions of the firm of Grant & Ward, was found guilty on Saturday last of misapplying the funds of his bank and making false entries on the books, with intent to defraud the bank and deceive the bank-examiner. The indictment originally contained twenty-one counts, and the jury found Mr. Fish guilty on twelve counts. These charged specific acts of misapplication of the bank moneys and making false entries. On three of the counts, or, as afterward condensed, one count, charging abstraction of the bank's securities, he was not found guilty. One count alone would give Mr. Fish from three to five years in prison. The trial has occupied the court for a month, and has been watched with the closest interest by financial circles. The jury were six hours in consultation before they agreed upon a verdict. A new trial is to be asked for; meanwhile the defendant has been sent to prison.

A Massacre by the Half Breeds and Indians is reported from Winnipeg, Man. The agent there of the Hudson Bay Company received intelligence on April 10th that an attack had been made on the inhabitants of Frog Lake, a place about one hundred and twenty miles north-west of Battleford, and fourteen persons were killed. The rebels had surrounded Battleford, and were believed to have one thousand Indians as allies. They are chiefly Crees under the command of Big Bear. The Crees are threatening the Blackfeet with extermination if they do not join in the rising. Reports from Fort Pitt, which is forty miles from Frog Lake, lead to the fear that the fort has fallen into the hands of the rebels. If so, the massacre has been terrible, for the fort was crowded with refugees from the surrounding country, among whom were many women and children. There is intense excitement throughout the Dominion, and troops are being rapidly sent forward.

The Probability of War between England and Russia was increased last week by the report received on April 6th, that a battle had been fought between the Russians and Afghans. It appears that on March 20th the Russian commander, General Komaroff, attacked the fortified positions of the Afghans on the Kushk River. The Afghan force, numbering four thousand men, with eight cannon, was defeated. Their loss was five hundred men killed and wounded. All the artillery, two standards, the entire camp equipage and provisions, were captured. The Afghans stubbornly resisted their assailants. The weather was wet at the time of the attack, which rendered the muzzle-loading guns of the Afghans useless. Two companies held one position against the Russians until its defenders were killed. The Afghans retreated in perfect order. The Russians made no pursuit. Mr. Gladstone, in announcing this outbreak of hostilities to the British House of Commons, characterized the Russian attack as an act of unprovoked aggression. At a late hour, however, when he had received further information, he qualified his first statement. He then stated that the Afghans had made an advance into the territory claimed by Russia, which advance the Russian general may have regarded as provocation.

A Decidedly Warlike Spirit has been manifested by the British press and people since the news of the battle in Afghanistan was received. The attack is spoken of as an insult to England and an act of treachery, which must be avenged. Underlying this feeling is the true cause of the excitement. For many years England has seen with uneasiness that Russian troops have been creeping nearer to the frontiers of India. The frontier on the north is protected along the greater part of its course by the Himalayas, but at the north-western extremity there is a vulnerable place. There Afghanistan is situated. Russia ever makes her way into India, it will be through Afghanistan. The English Government, therefore, has always watched that country with a jealous eye. This particular quarrel has arisen out of a demand on the part of England that the boundary line between Afghanistan and Merv, the province recently annexed by Russia, shall be clearly defined.

The New Premier of France is M. Brisson, who has formed a cabinet since M. Freycinet proved unequal to the task. M. Brisson at first could not succeed, as he had not sufficient followers in the Legislature to give him a majority over all. Ultimately a coalition was effected between him and M. Freycinet, who enters the cabinet as Secretary of the State Department. The ministry is regarded in France as a weak one, unlikely to have a long life. The department of Foreign Affairs is the most critical of all, and in the hands of M. Freycinet will inevitably be mismanaged. M. Freycinet has held the office once before, when he proved that he had neither the ability nor the experience necessary to keep him from gross blunders. M. Brisson is a lawyer, who is, however, better known in France as a journalist of the radical republican type. He was sub-Mayor of Paris during the siege, and in 1882 he was elected President of the Chamber of Deputies. He is an able speaker, but his qualities as an administrator have yet to be tested. A part of his programme is the separation of Church and State. At present the Roman Catholic priests draw the bulk of their income from the public treasury. The withdrawal of this money will array all zealous Roman Catholics against the new cabinet.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, accompanied by their eldest son, arrived in Dublin on April 8th. They were received by a large crowd with enthusiastic cheering. It was, however, remarked that in parts of Dublin where the Nationalists are most numerous there was a sullen apathy maintained. The Lord Mayor's absence from the demonstration was conspicuous. The prince's reply to the addresses presented to him was prudent, and his words well chosen. He plainly intimated that the present tour would inaugurate a series of visits to Ireland, which would be continued every year hereafter. Such an intimation, if it had been made a few years ago, would have gone far to render the present hostile attitude of Ireland impossible. The Princess of Wales captured the populace at sight. The refined beauty of her face and the elegance of her figure were most artistically set off in a special costume of green, which had been made for the occasion. The dress was composed of a close-fitting, dark-green velvet bodice, with a silk skirt to match, and a princess bonnet, trimmed with shamrocks and green feathers. This tribute to the Irish colors, so deftly and beautifully made, was instantly recognized by the people, and her Royal Highness was everywhere greeted with applause.

The Death of Another of the Roller-Skaters who took part in the recent six days' race in New York occurred last week. William Donovan, who won the race with a record of ten hundred and ninety-two miles, died on April 10th. The physicians who attended him say that the race was only indirectly the cause of his death. At the conclusion of the race he was much exhausted and in need of rest, but he visited other links to exhibit himself, and was at his father's liquor saloon, attracting business, until a late hour every night. As a consequence, he sank under a cold which he caught, and died of pneumonia. The physician warns roller-skaters that after rapid skating it is dangerous to go into the open air without a previous rest.

Mr. Moody Conducted a Christian Convention in Kansas City, Mo., of three days' duration, March 20-22d. A local correspondent of the Observer says: "The attendance at all the services was very large. At the three principal meetings of the Sabbath the throngs were so great that the doors of the Opera House were closed a full hour before the time for beginning. Great good seems to have been done by the simple preaching of the Gospel and practical suggestion of these services. Two hundred and fifty for the first time expressed an interest in the things of religion. The pastors of the churches attended very regularly. Mr. Moody organized the Young Men's Christian Association at this point in 1876, and last Sabbath night inaugurated the first collection toward a building. It amounted to over $6000. The association owns a fine lot in the best portion of the city."

The Twenty-Fifth Anniversary of Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler's entrance into the pastorate was celebrated on April 6th, with much enthusiasm, at his church in Lafayette Avenue, Brooklyn. Two services were held, at which the church was crowded with Dr. Cuyler's ministerial and lay friends. In the course of the doctor's remarks, in reply to the congratulations, he said: "Forty years have I been in the harness. I have lost but two Sabbaths during that period, and those through illness. If any man can show a cleaner bill of health than that, I should be pleased to meet him. May God bless you for what you have been to me and mine!" After a tender tribute to his wife's potential influence in his career, he spoke of his literary work for religious journals. He had written twenty-seven hundred articles, many of which were reprinted in London in many forms, to the extent of many million copies. The doctor had also written ten volumes, two of which trickled from his pen with tears; one when a little crib was empty, and another when a lovely face and lovelier character left a void that never, never could be filled.

A Testimony to the Value of Prohibition as a means of checking crime is rendered by a lawyer in Mobile, Ala., who thus states the results of his own observation: "In Clarke and Washington counties (where for four years I practised law as a State solicitor) the people at court manifested evidence of great lawlessness while spirituous liquors were vendued in the towns where courts were held, and much of the crime on the State docket was traceable directly to its influences. Subsequently, prohibition enactments not only lessened the State docket, but brought peace where riot and lawlessness had once prevailed. I frequently discussed this manifest fact with the presiding judge; and we both agreed that prohibition, in the instances named, had proved inestimably beneficial. This opinion, therefore, is founded on facts, and not on theory. I believe that intemperance is not increasing among the negroes of this section. In the cities, where they are more intelligent, they do not oppose prohibitory laws, and in the country they know nothing about them."

A Banker Acting as a Policeman has been waging war on the liquor dealers of Quincy, Mass. A correspondent of the Voice, writing to that journal, says: "In 1881 there were forty-two licenses granted in Quincy, Mass. In April of that year the Board of Selectmen of that town, knowing Mr. Henry H. Faxon's fearless temperance principles, selected him as a police officer to enforce the laws pertaining to the sale of intoxicating liquors. This was a novel position for a wealthy banker and distinguished citizen to accept, but he did not hesitate. The result was a thorough enforcement of the laws in question, and so thorough that the Board of Selectmen, friendly to liquor interests, thought he was "doing too much duty," and displaced him. At the next March election, Quincy was carried for no-license, and Mr. Faxon was again appointed policeman. Since then the saloon-keepers of Quincy, whether underground or in drug-stores, have had no peace, day or night. The liquor pest has been expelled as completely as possible; and this has been done chiefly through the fearlessness of Mr. Faxon himself."

Diamonds were Found through a Dream in New Orleans recently. Mr. A. Dessau, a diamond broker in Maiden Lane, New York, informed a reporter last week that his firm had just recovered two packages of valuable diamonds, worth several thousands dollars, in a very remarkable manner. The diamonds were being taken by an agent to the New Orleans Exposition to be exhibited. When the agent arrived in New Orleans his diamonds were missing. Pinkerton's detectives were sent out to hunt them up, but their efforts were unavailing. About ten days ago the agent says he had a dream in which he thought he had lost the gems in the car, and they were swept out by the porter. The next morning he hunted up the porter, and induced him to show him the dirt heap where he usually dumped the contents of his dust-pans. After a prolonged search in the dirt the diamonds were found intact. It could not have been an agreeable task to search through the dirt heap, but the agent felt himself repaid when he discovered his employers' property. It is so with Christian workers who descend into moral filth to discover and rescue lost souls which are their Master's jewels (Mal. 3: 17).

Earthquakes are Predicted by a European scientist who has devoted his attention for several years to these phenomena. A London paper announces that Herr Rudolph Kalb, whose theory of earthquakes has been much discussed in scientific circles, and whose predictions have frequently been substantiated by events, has just promulgated a new theory with reference to the choke damp in mines. He says that explosions coincide for the most part with earthquakes, and he predicts a very critical state of things shortly, when, he says, the greatest caution should be observed in mines. The next days when he anticipates danger are the 12th of June and the 12th of July. Several months before the recent destructive earthquakes in Spain he issued warnings that such events would take place, but was unable to specify the locality. It is doubtful whether any precautions will be taken as a result of Herr Kalb's warning, as people do not believe that science has yet arrived at such a stage as to justify any one in predicting an earthquake with absolute confidence. No such excuse, however, can justify doubters who scoff at another prediction of a coming earthquake. The sure word of prophecy will certainly be fulfilled (Rev. 16: 18).

Girls Guarded by Dogs are Living in an isolated house in Wisconsin, if the statements made on oath by a witness in a Chicago Police Court are true. On March 31st a man appeared before the judge and begged his interference on behalf of his daughter, who, he said, had been decoyed into the house for immoral purposes. "In Marinette, Wis.," said he, "there is, three miles from town, a disreputable house kept by two Chicago men," whom he named. "Nearly all the inmates are no better than slaves, and belong in Chicago. They are picked up on Washington Street and induced, by promises of being employed at high wages, to go to Wisconsin. They receive a railroad ticket, and are sent to this house, where their clothes are taken from them, and they are put in short dresses.

All letters which leave the place are examined by a manager and destroyed. About the yard and near the building are stationed twenty-two bloodhounds, so that none of the girls can escape except by the front entrance, and that is well guarded. The girls who once get into that place never get out, unless their friends accidentally learn of their whereabouts. When they die they are buried in the woods in the rear of the den of infamy." It may be hoped that this revelation will stop this horrible iniquity and lead to the deliverance of the prisoners. Their fate is a most doleful one, cut off from escape and unable to appeal for help. A perfect hell, say the newspapers, describing it; but that's a mistake. Dreadful as it must be, it is not a perfect type of the abode of the lost. The poor girls had always the hope that the officers of the law would discover their prison and liberate them, while hell is described as a place absolutely without hope (Rev. 14: 10, 11).

A Mistake about the Law Probably Involved the loss of a life recently in a farm in New York State. A farmer, at Hornesville, Steuben County, was suffering from mental depression, and on March 26th he went into his barn and, hanged himself. A few minutes afterward, and it is believed, before life was extinct, some members of the family followed him and saw him suspended from a beam. The whole family, the bereaved wife and eleven children, soon assembled in the barn, and cried in the most heart-rending manner. They did not cut him down, nor did any of the neighbors attempt to do so. They thought they had no right to touch the body until the coroner saw it, and so they stayed around the hanging body for some hours waiting for the coroner. But for the grief of the widow and her family it might have been thought that the inactivity was the result of satisfaction at the course the farmer had taken, but their tears proved that it was caused by a mistaken notion of the law. The same mistake should be avoided by Christian people. When they see their neighbors committing spiritual suicide they should not wait for the interference of a clergyman or evangelist, but should themselves do their utmost to save a soul from death. The duty is imperative, and the reward is sure (James 5: 20).

The Exciting Pursuit of a Fox by a Dog interested the passengers of a train on the Rochester and Pittsburg Railroad on March 30th. The train was on the viaduct which carries the road over Cattaraugus Creek, when those passengers who sat on the right-hand side of the cars saw a fox, closely followed by a hound, dash over the snow directly toward the very highest part of the precipice on that side of the creek. The hound was not more than ten feet behind it as the brink of the chasm was reached, and, as neither fox nor dog slackened its pace, the excited passengers expected to see them both tumble headlong in the ravine. The fox leaped to the very edge of the rocks, and the dog was but one jump behind it, when, like a flash, the fox turned abruptly out of its course and ran along the edge of the ravine. The dog was unable to imitate the agility of the fox, and the more jumps brought its fore feet within a foot of the brink. It saw its peril, and tried to throw itself back, but its momentum was too great, and the next second it went whirling down into the ravine, and was dashed to death on the ice at the bottom. The fox stopped on the edge of the rocks as the dog went over and turned and looked down at it for a moment as it lay dead on the ice. The fox then turned and trotted leisurely back across country and disappeared in the woods. The cunning of the fox saved its life, and if it was capable of feeling satisfaction it must have done so when it saw its enemy lie dead. The crafty enemy of mankind is thus luring men to their destruction. When they start on the race for wealth or fame or power they think they can stop when they will, but many have found that the end of their course is death (1 Tim. 6: 9).

ELIJAH'S PLEA.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Let it be known that I have done all these things at thy word."—1 KINGS 18 : 36.

Elijah's Course of Action—Putting God's Honor to the Test—His Justification—Acting under God's Direction—I. The Plea a Firm Ground for Prayer—By Preachers and Teachers—Expecting a Blessing—By a Whole Church—How to Insure Prosperity—By Individual Believers—By Seeking Sinners—II. A Test for Self-Examination—As to Preaching—Should be Plain—Backed by Example—Fig-Headed People—Separation Required—Complete Obedience.

THE acts of Elijah were very singular. It had not been known from the foundations of the earth that a man should shut up the doors of the rain for the space of three years. Yet Elijah suddenly leaped upon the scene, announced the judgment of the Lord, and then disappeared for a time. When he reappears, at the bidding of God, he orders Ahab to gather the priests of Baal; and to put to the test the question as to whether Baal or Jehovah was indeed God. Bulls, rocks shall be slain and laid upon the wood without fire; and the God who shall answer by fire shall be determined to be the one living and true God, the God of Israel. We might question within ourselves what right the prophet had to restrain the clouds, or to put

GOD'S HONOR UNDER TEST.

Suppose the Lord had not willed to answer him by fire; had he any right to make the glory of God hang upon such terms as he proposed? The answer is that he had done all these things according to God's word. It was no whim of his to chastise the nation with a drought. It was no scheme of his, concocted in his own brain, that he should put the Godhead of Jehovah or of Baal to the test by a sacrifice to be consumed by miraculous fire. Oh, no! If you read the life of Elijah through, you will see that whenever he takes a step it is preceded by "the word of the Lord came unto Elijah the Tishbite." He moves acts of himself; God is at his back. He moves according to the divine will, and he speaks according to the divine teaching; and he pleads this with the Most High: "I have done all these things at thy word; now let it be known that it is so." It makes the character of Elijah stand out, not as an example of reckless daring, but as the example of a man of sound mind. If a man acts as your agent and does your bidding, the responsibility of his acts lies with you, and you must back him up. It were, indeed, an atrocious thing to send a servant on an errand, and, when he faithfully performed it to the letter, to repudiate your sending him. It is not so with God. If we will only so trust Him as to do as He bids us, He will never fail us; but He will see us through, though earth and hell should stand in the way. It may not be to-day, nor to-morrow, but as surely as the Lord liveth, the time shall come when he that trusted Him shall have joy of his confidence.

It seems to me that Elijah's plea is to obedient saints a firm ground for prayer, and to those who cannot say that they have acted according to God's Word, it is a solemn matter for question.

I. To begin with, this is

A FIRM GROUND FOR PRAYER.

You are a minister of God, or a worker in the cause of Christ, and you go forth and preach the Gospel with many tears and prayers, and you continue to use all means, such as Christ has ordained; do you say to yourself, "May I expect to have fruit of all this?" Of course you may. You are not sent on a frivolous errand; you are not bidden to sow dead seed that will never spring up. But when that anxiety weighs heavily upon your heart, go you to the mercy-seat with this as one of your arguments, "Lord, I have done according to thy Word. Now let it be seen that it is even so. I have preached thy Word, and Thou hast said, 'It shall not return unto me void.' I have prayed for these people, and Thou hast said, 'The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much;' let it be seen that this is according to thy Word."

Or, if you are a teacher, you can say, "I brought my children in supplication before Thee, and I have gone forth, after studying thy Word, to teach them, to the best of my ability, the way of salvation. Now, Lord, I claim it of thy truth that Thou shouldst and my expectation, by giving me to see the souls of my children saved by Thee, through Jesus Christ, thy Son." Do you not see that you have a good argument, if the Lord has set you to do this work? He has, as it were, bound Himself by that very fact to support you in the doing of it; and if you, with holy diligence and carefulness, do all these things according to His Word, then you may come with certainty to the throne of grace, and say unto Him, "Do as Thou hast said." You may plead in this fashion with the same boldness which made Elias say in the presence of all the people, "Let it be known this day that Thou art God in Israel, and that I have done all these things at thy word."

Next, I would apply this teaching to a whole church. I am afraid many churches of Christ are not prospering. The congregations are thin, the church is diminishing, the prayer-meeting scantily attended, spiritual life low. If I can conceive of a church in such a condition which, nevertheless, can say to God, "We have done all these things at thy word," I should expect to see that church soon revived in answer to prayer. The reason why some churches do not prosper is, because they have not done according to God's Word. They have not even cared to know what God's Word says. Another book is their standard. A man is their leader and legislator, instead of the inspired Word of God. Some churches are doing little or nothing for the conversion of sinners. But any man, in any church, who can go before God, and say, "Lord, we have had among us the preaching of the Gospel; and we have earnestly prayed for the blessing; we have gathered about thy minister, and we have held him up in the arms of prayer and faith; we have, as individual Christians, sought out each one his particular service, we have gone forth each one to bring in souls to Thee, and we have lived in godliness of life by the help of thy grace, now, therefore prosper thy cause," shall find it a good plea. Real to any church that walks according to Christ's rules, obeys Christ's teaching, and is filled with Christ's Spirit. I would exhort all members of churches that are in a poor way just now, to see to it that all things are done at God's word, and then hopefully wait in holy confidence. The fire from heaven must come; the blessing cannot be withheld.

The same principle may be applied also to any individual believers who are in trouble through having done right. It happens often that a man feels, "I could make money, but I must not; for the course proposed would be wrong. Such a situation is open, but it involves what my conscience does not approve. I will rather suffer than I will make gain by doing anything that is questionable." It may be that you are in great trouble distinctly through obedience to God. Then, you are the man above all others who may lay this case before the Most High: "Lord, I have done all these things at thy word, and Thou hast said, 'I will never leave thee nor forsake thee.' I beseech Thee interpose for me." Somehow or other God will provide for you. If He means you to be further tried, He will give you strength to bear it; but the probabilities are that now He has tested you, He will bring you forth from the fire as gold.

Once again. I would like to apply this principle to

THE SEEKING SINNER.

You are anxious to be saved. You are attentive to the Word, and your heart says, "Let me know what this salvation is, and how to come at it, for I will have it whatever stands in the way." Now, listen: thou canst not have heaven through thy doings, as a matter of merit. There is no merit possible to thee, for thou hast sinned, and art already condemned. But God has laid down certain lines upon which He has promised to meet thee, and to bless thee. Hast thou followed those lines? For if thou hast, He will not be false to thee. It is written, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved"—can you come before God, and say, "I have believed and have been baptized?" then you are on firm pleading ground. It is written again, "Whoso confesseth and forsaketh his sins shall have mercy." When you have confessed them, and forsaken them, you have upon the promise of God, and you can say to Him, "Lord, fulfil this word unto thy servant, upon which Thou hast caused me to hope. There is no merit in my faith, or my baptism, or my repentance, or my forsaking of sin; yet as Thou hast put thy promise side by side with these things, and I have been obedient to Thee therein, I now come to Thee, and say, 'Prove thine own truth, for I have done all these things at thy word.' " No sinner will come before God at last, and say, "I trusted as Thou didst bid me trust; and yet I am lost." It is impossible. Thy blood, if thou art lost, will be on thine own head; but thou shalt never be able to lay thy soul's damnation at the door of God. He is not false; it is thou that art false. You see, then, how the principle can be applied in prayer: "I have done these things at thy word; therefore, O Lord, do as Thou hast said."

If we shall go a little over the same ground while I ask you to put yourselves through your paces by way of

as to whether or not you have done all these things at God's Word. First, let every worker here who has not been successful answer this question—Have you done all these things at God's word? Come. Have you preached the Gospel? Was it the Gospel? Was it Christ you preached, or merely something about Christ? Come. Did you give the people bread, or did you give them plates to put the bread on, and knives to cut the bread with? Did you give them drink, or did you give them the cup that had been near the water? Some preaching is not Gospel; it is a knife that smells of the cheese, but it is not cheese. See to that matter.

If you preached the Gospel, did you preach it rightly? That is to say, did you state it affectionately, earnestly, clearly, plainly? If you preach the Gospel in Latinized language, the common people will not know what it means; and if you use great big academy words and dictionary words, the market people will be lost while they are trying to find out what you are at. You cannot expect God to bless you unless the Gospel is preached in a very simple way. Have you preached the truth lovingly, with all your heart, throwing your very self into it, as if beyond everything you desired the conversion of those you taught? Has prayer been mixed with it? Have you gone into the pulpit without prayer? Have you come out of it without prayer? Have you been to the Sabbath-school without prayer? Have you come away from it without prayer? If so, since you failed to ask for the blessing, you must not wonder if you do not get it.

And another question—Has there been an EXAMPLE TO BACK YOUR TEACHING?

Brethren, have we lived as we have preached? Sisters, have you lived as you have taught in your classes? These are questions we ought to answer, because perhaps God can reply to us, "No, you have not done according to my word. It was not my Gospel you preached; you were a thinker, and you thought out your own thoughts, and I never promised to bless your thoughts, but only my revealed truth. You spoke without affection; you tried to glorify yourself by your oratory; you did not care whether souls were saved or not." Or suppose that God can point to you, and say, "Your example was contrary to your teaching. You looked one way, but you pulled another way." Then there is no place in prayer: is there?

And now let me turn to a church, and put questions to that church. A certain church does not prosper. I wish that every church would let this question go through all its membership; do we as a church acknowledge the headship of Christ? Do we acknowledge the Statute-Book of Christ—the one Book which alone and by itself is the religion of a Christian man? Do we as a church seek the glory of God? Is that our main and only object? Are we traveling in birth for the souls of the people that live near us? Are we using every Scriptural means to enlighten them with the Gospel? Are we a holy people? Is our example such as our neighbors may follow? Do we endeavor, even in meat and drink, to do all to the glory of God?

ARE WE PRAYERFUL?

Oh, the many churches that give up their prayer-meetings, because prayer is not in them! How can they expect a blessing? Are we united? Oh, brothers, it is a horrible thing when church members talk against one another, and even slander one another, as though they were enemies rather than friends. Can God bless such a church as that?

Next I speak to Christian people who have fallen into trouble through serving God. I put it to them, but I want to ask them a few questions. Are you quite sure that you did serve God in it? You know there are men who indulge crochets, and whims, and fancies. God has not promised to support you in your whims. Certain people are obstinate, and will not submit to what everybody must bear who has to earn his bread in a world like this. If you are a mere mule, and get the stick, I must leave you to your reward; but I speak to men of understanding. Be as stern as a Puritan against everything that is wrong, but be supple and yieldable to everything that involves self-denial on your part. God will bear us through if the quarrel be His quarrel; but if it is our own quarrel, why then we may help ourselves. There is a deal of difference between and being steadfast. To be steadfast, as a matter of principle in truth which is taught by God's Word is one thing; but to get a queer idea into your heads is quite another.

Besides, some men are conscientious about certain things, but they have not an all-round conscience. Some are conscientious about not taking less, but they are not conscientious about giving less. Certain folks are conscientious about resting on the Sabbath; but the other half of the command is, "Six days shalt thou labor," and they do not remember that portion of the law. I like a conscience which works fairly and impartially; but if your conscience gives way for the sake of your own gain or pleasure, the world will think that it is a sham, and they will not be far from the mark. But if, through conscientiousness, you should be a sufferer, God will bear you through. Only examine and see that your conscience is enlightened by the Spirit of God.

And now to conclude. I want to address the seeking sinner. Some are longing to find peace, but they cannot reach it; and I want them to see whether they have not been negligent in some points so that they would not be able to say with Elijah, "I have done all these things at thy word." Do I need to say that you cannot be saved by your works? Do I need to repeat it over and over again that nothing you do can deserve mercy? Salvation must be the free gift of God. But this is the point. God will give pardon to a sinner, and peace to a troubled heart, on certain lines. Are you on those lines wholly? If so, you will have peace; and if you have not that peace, something or other has been omitted. To begin with, the first thing is faith. Dost thou believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God? Dost thou believe that He has risen from the dead? Dost thou trust thyself wholly, simply, heartily, once for all, with Him? Then it is written, "He that believeth in Him hath everlasting life."

GO AND PLEAD THAT.

"I have no peace," says one. Hast thou unfeignedly repented of sin? Is thy mind totally changed about sin, so that what thou didst once love thou dost now hate, and that which thou didst once hate thou dost now love? Is there a hearty loathing, and giving up, and forsaking of sin? Do not deceive yourself. You cannot be saved in your sins; you are to be saved from your sins. You and your sins must part, or else Christ and you will never be joined. See to this. Labor to give up every sin, and turn from every false way, else your faith is but a dead faith, and will never save you. It may be that you have wronged a person, and have never made restitution. Mr. Moody did great good when he preached restitution. If we have wronged another we ought to make it up to him. We ought to return what we have stolen, if that be our sin. A man cannot expect peace of conscience till, as far as in him lies, he has made amends for any wrong he has done to his fellow-men. See to that, or else perhaps this stone may lie at your door, and because it is not rolled away you may never enter into peace.

Possibly, however, you may be a believer in Christ, and you may have no peace because you are associated with ungodly people, and go with them to their follies, and mix with them in their amusements. You see you cannot serve God and Mammon. Thus saith the Lord, "Come out from among them;"

BE YE SEPARATE;

touch not the unclean thing, and I will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty." I know a man who sits in this place; he is probably here now; and concerning him I am persuaded that the only thing that keeps him from Christ is the company with which he mingles. I will not say that his company is bad in itself, but it is bad to him; and if there be anything that is right in itself, yet if to me it becomes ruinous, I must give it up. We are not commanded to cut off warts and excrescences, but Jesus bids us cut off right arms, and pluck out right eyes—good things in themselves—if they are stumbling-blocks in our way so that we cannot get at Christ. What is there in the world that is worth the keeping if it involves me in the loss of my soul? Away with it.

Perhaps, however, you say, "Well, as far as I know, I do keep out of all ill associations, and I am trying to follow the Lord." Let me press you with a home-question—will you be obedient to Jesus in everything?

"For know—nor of the terms complain—"

Where Jesus comes He comes to reign."

If you would have Christ for a Saviour, you must also take Him for a King. Remember, if Christ gives you the command—if you accept Him as a King—you are

BOUND TO OBEY

Him. The less there seems to be of importance about a command, often the more hinges upon it. Say, "Lord, what wouldst Thou have me to do? Be it what it may, I will do it, for I am thy servant." I want you, if you would be Christ's, to be just like the brave men that rode at Balacava.

"Yours not to reason why;

Yours but to do and die!"—

if it need be, if Jesus calls you thereto. Be this your song:

"Through floods and flames if Jesus lead, I'll follow where He goes."

That kind of faith which at the very outset cries, "I shall not do that, it is not essential;" and then goes on to say, "I do not agree with that, and I do not agree with the other;" is no faith at all. In that case it is you that is master, and not Christ. In His own house you are beginning to alter His commands. We all ought to do what He bids us, as He bids us, when He bids us, in the order in which He bids us. It is ours simply to be obedient, and when we are so, we may remember that to believe Christ and to obey Christ is the same thing, and often in Scripture the same word that might be read "believe," might be read "obey." He is the Author of eternal salvation to all them that obey Him, and that is to all them that believe on Him. Trust Him then right heartily, and obey Him right gladly. You can then go to Him in the dying hour, and say, "Lord, I have done all these things at thy word. I claim no merit, but I do claim that Thou keep thy gracious promise to me, for Thou cannot run back from one word which Thou hast spoken." God bless you, beloved, for Christ's sake.

NEW BOOKS.

PHYSICAL GEOGRAPHY

for grammar and high schools and colleges, by James Monteith, is a work of the high class for which its author has become famous. It conveys information respecting its subject in the form in which it is most likely to be remembered, concisely and with remarkable lucidity. It commences with a simple exposition of the earth's position and relations in space, and passes on to describe its crust and interior stratification, its physical superficial geography, the elemental forces which operate on and around it, ocean tides, atmosphere, storms, winds, the phenomena of climate, the distribution of minerals and of life, and all the elementary points of its physical history, geography and structure. Its most astonishing feature is the large quantity of information compressed into the space. A decided improvement on all previous books of the kind published in this country very welcome here is the Bird's-eye Relief maps showing in relief the physical features of the continents. The chapters on Ocean Currents, Volcanoes, Rivers and Drainage and Winds are based on the newest discoveries, and the chart of the Arctic regions is endorsed by Lieutenant A. W. Greely, and shows the point reached by Lockwood, the furthest ever yet trodden by man. Price, $1.25. Published by A. S. Barnes & Co., New York and Chicago.

GOSPEL PARALLELISMS,

illustrated in the healing of body and soul, by the Rev. R. L. Stanton, D.D., covers the whole ground of faith-healing in an exhaustive manner. A summary of its contents will show, perhaps better than any description, the course of Dr. Stanton's argument. These are some of the headings of the chapters: The Two-fold Design of Christ's Death; Analogy between Spiritual and Physical Healing; Why all are not Healed Immediately; Why Healing is not always Permanent; Sickness always Treated as an Evil; Mental Trials Removed through Christ; Special Gifts and Unrestricted Privileges; Bodily Healing Supernatural Rather than Miraculous; God calls His People to their Work; Faith the Essential Demand; Consecration also Essential; Christ's Power Limited by Unbelief; Healing in Christ's Ministry sometimes Gradual; Ancient and Modern Proofs of Healing; Laws of Health for Body and Soul; Physical and Spiritual Nursing; Physical and Spiritual Tests of Healing.

As will be seen from the foregoing list of subjects, Dr. Stanton's primary object is to set forth the strict parallel which exists between the blessings which the Gospel offers to the soul on the one hand, and to the body on the other. Also that the difficulties which prevent people believing in the possibility of receiving healing for the body are in their essence precisely identical with those which keep inquirers back from accepting salvation for their souls. This theory he keeps clearly before his readers throughout the book, pressing with irresistible force upon those who have been born again the argument that they ought consistently to believe that they may have physical healing in the same way and by the same means. Dr. Stanton is exceedingly temperate and candid in the statement of his views, and we believe that his work, if read in the same fair spirit in which it is written, will convince many Christians of its possibility who have hitherto looked upon faith-healing with doubt. There is no better method open to an advocate than to show those whom he desires to convince that the principles on which his argument is based are those on which they act in other matters.

Another very important feature of his book is in the way he deals with failures in faith-healing. Here again he relies on analogy. Of the anxious inquirers after salvation not all enter into peace and rest in Christ, and those who fail are generally of the same type of character as those who are not healed of their diseases. Those who have a relapse, too, are generally of the same category as those who are seen among backsliders in our churches. These facts, presented with much affectionate kindness, will have two good effects. They will operate as a warning to those who seek physical healing, and they will silence Christian scoffers. Men who know the efficacy and reality of Christ's salvation by experience sometimes dwell with unkind vehemence on some case in which a sufferer has failed to obtain relief through faith, and argue from it that those who have been healed were either the victims of imaginary disease or were healed by ecstatic emotion. Such sceptics should read this book, from which they will see that by the same line of argument the efficacy of faith in Christ for salvation, of which they are confident, may be proved baseless. We trust Dr. Stanton's book will have a wide circulation; it will do good. Pp. 174. Price, in paper covers, 40 cents; in cloth, 75 cents. Published by Miss Carrie Fudd, 260 Connecticut Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

WILLIAM SMITH, THE CONDUCTOR OF THE IRISH MAIL.

ON the 20th of August, 1868, William Smith, the much-esteemed and trusty conductor of the Irish-Mail train, stood on the steps of his car, which was one of some ten or twelve drawn up at the London terminus ready to start on its journey with the mail to America, which is conveyed to Holyhead in Wales, and thence by swift steamer to Ireland, where it is put on board the great transatlantic steamers for transportation to New York. Smith looked carefully along the platform, and then sounded his whistle and gave the signal "All right!" He little supposed then that it was for the last time.

When, on the last Sabbath on which he was "off duty," and he was in his usual seat in the church, little did he suppose that it was the last earthly Sabbath service in which he would be privileged to join. Yet so it was. On that fatal 20th of August the terrible collision took place near Abergele, the carriages were set on fire by petroleum, and poor Smith was one of the first of the thirty-two victims who fell a prey to the devouring flames.

It is unnecessary to recapitulate details which, for appalling horror, are happily rare in the annals of railway misadventure. One's heart turns sick as we think of that terrible story of the carriages being literally one burning mass—of the liquid fire running over the surface of the ground, charring and blackening everything with which it came in contact, and blazing for an hour until all was consumed.

"Be ye also ready" was the solemn admonition which the clergyman gave to those who assembled in Abergele church the Sunday after the accident.

THE PROTECTION OF THE FLAGS.

THE incident depicted in the illustration occurred during one of the many disturbances in Cuba. It is well authenticated by the records in the State Departments of the two countries.

After the rising had been suppressed a man remained in prison charged with having aided in the insurrection. He was tried by court-martial, and condemned to be shot. He was a seaman of American birth, but the son of British parents, and he appealed to the consuls of both countries. The English Consul, Mr. Ramsden, and the American Vice-consul, having satisfied themselves of the man's innocence, protested in the name of England and of America, and demanded his immediate release. But the authorities would not yield.

On the morning appointed for his death the prisoner was marched out to the place of execution, in solemn military procession, and a company of soldiers were drawn up to execute the sentence. But the consuls were there also, having determined to make one more effort to save his life. An eye-witness describes what followed:

"It was the work of an instant, and Mr. Consul Ramsden and the American Consul, rushing forward with the flags of their respective nations and in front of the unfortunate man, shouted, 'Hold!' Throwing the flags around the condemned man, and addressing the officer in charge of the firing party, Mr. Ramsden said: 'Gentlemen, as a Consul of her Britannic Majesty, I cannot stand by and see this foul murder of an innocent man. It is my duty to protect his life, and if you are to take that life you must take it through these'—pointing to the flags—'and your officers know the consequences of firing on the national flags.' The determined attitude of the two officials and the sight of the national symbols produced the desired effect. A consultation was held by the Spanish officers, the execution was stopped, and that day the sailor was set at liberty."

The incident has been often used as an illustration of the safety of the sinner saved by Christ. Has He not taken every believer under the protection of His own righteousness, and is He not ready now to wrap around every sinner the blood-stained banner of the Cross? Wrapped in this banner, who can take away his life? As the Apostle Paul cried triumphantly, "It is God that justifieth; who is he that condemneth" (Rom. 8: 34)?

IN THE SOUDAN NEAR SUAKIN.

The scene depicted in the illustration on this page was drawn by the correspondent of one of the British journals, who is with General Graham in the Soudan. Osman Digna, the lieutenant of the Mahdi, has for a long time been threatening Suakin, the great seaport of the Red Sea. General Graham was accordingly sent to protect the city from capture and the massacre which always ensues when the Mahdi's followers take any place. On the arrival of the British, Osman Digna withdrew a short distance into the desert, whence he sent a message of defiance to General Graham. The scene represented in the picture was that of the setting out of a British reconnaissance preparatory to a battle.

The ground it was intended to occupy resembles in shape a half-opened fan, the centre of which is Suakin. From Suakin to Handub is the northern limb of the fan; from Suakin to Tamai the southern. Handub and Tamai are nearly equi-distant from Suakin (Tamai being about sixteen miles). On the outer rim, or circumference, of the fan, and four miles to the south of Handub, is Hasheen, the point toward which a reconnaissance was directed March 19th. According to the information collected by the intelligence department, Osman had about seven thousand men. The march was very brief. The enemy evacuated the village of Hasheen and retired to the mountains—to Tamai, according to some accounts. General Graham did not pursue them, but marched back, and reached the Suakin camp shortly after midday.

On the following day, March 20th, the British returned to Hasheen in force. What followed is thus vividly described by the special correspondent of the London Daily Telegraph: "General Graham lost no time in utilizing the information which he had obtained in the course of yesterday's reconnaissance. All the troops, except one battalion, which was left to guard the camp, marched out in a direction due west at four o'clock this morning, March 20th. The advance took place in hollow-square formation, the Guards being on the right, the British infantry in front, the Indian contingent on the left, while the Cavalry Brigade scouted along the front and on the flanks. In this order we arrived, unopposed, at the first spurs of the outlying hills, when the outposts of the Arabs were seen slowly falling back.

"Thereupon the Surrey Brigade were sent up to seize and hold Baker's old zereba. This accomplished, the sappers immediately began the work of constructing redoubts on two of the overhanging hills, and also additional small zerebas in the intervening hollows for the protection of the water supply, the camels, and baggage.

"Continuing its progress, the column advanced through a pass, debouching upon a wide plain encircled on all sides by craggy hills of volcanic formation, having crater-like tops. After traversing this African strath, we found the Arabs lodged in a position of great strength on a spur to the left of our front. Our men quickly climbed and lined the crest, and smart firing immediately commenced, very soon increasing to a rolling thunder of musketry, which woke up a furious echo among the surrounding hills.

"Volley succeeded volley, on both sides, and bullets began to fall unpleasantly thick around us, the sand puffing up in spirits between the horses' legs. Where I stood with the Sikhs the leaden hail was by this time whistling all around. The Mahdists appeared thoroughly plucky, but after a time our disciplined fire became too hot for them, and they cleared off.

"Some retired to the right, but the largest body moved off to the left of our front, the obvious intention of the latter manœuvre being to turn the hill; so, in order to checkmate the attempt, the Bengal Cavalry was slipped at them. The Indian horsemen met the Mahdists on the ridge, and a determined fight here took place. After their charge the cavalry fell back, and the enemy rounded the hill, and there—all at once—came upon the Guards' Brigade drawn up in a square. With a yell the Arabs went straight at it without hesitation, but in the face of the withering fire which met them they never succeeded in getting nearer than fifteen or twenty yards of the line of bayonets.

"Meanwhile the cavalry having re-formed, were again ready for the enemy, who, after their futile assault on the Guards' phalanx, scattered between the hills.

They had retreated into the hills."

THE JEW'S WARD.

A SERIAL STORY.

Cast Out.

It was in the silence of her room that Carola realized her situation. She had been silent about her past life as her friend the clergyman advised; she had been so busy with her school and so happy, that all that filth, moral and material, in which her childhood had been spent, was to her as if it had never been. But the mention of George Bassett's name had called it all back to her memory.

Carola writhed at the recollection; and the sorest anguish of repugnance took possession of her soul.

She hid her face even from the pale moonlight. It was as if the years that had passed over her since she was that ignorant and shameful creature were blotted out, and she was again, at this moment, what she had been then. And yet there was an awful feeling of those happy years haunting her. She had been born again; she had been a new creature; she had been a child of the light, and had been walking in the light. But night was come again, with a thick darkness of degradation.

Yet why could she not keep her secret, and bury this dead past in the depths of her own heart? Why should she sacrifice the fair and sweet and peaceful life that was before her? No one knew anything about it; these new friends, so dear to her, had no suspicion of it. Matthias Levi, her old friend, had no clue to her present home; and he had made no effort to find her. There was nothing to link her with that disgraceful time. Why should not she let the dead past bury its dead, and herself act in the living present only? Must she thrust a sharp poignard into the heart of this useful life?

She tried to imagine herself hushing the persistent outcries of her awakened memory, and becoming Philip Arnold's wife. He, so honored, and so honorable, with his long line of worthy forefathers behind him, not one of whom but had been of good report and fair fame. And what of her parentage? The thought of her old grandmother drinking day after day, on her miserable bed in her miserable garret, came

"At this time, however, another body of Mahdists coming round on our right re-enforced them. Their courage was admirable, but their tactics seemed, at this juncture, somewhat bewildered. Evidently, however, they were full of fight. Our troops quickly followed them up as they circled round the crests, pouring in a very hot fire at every point, and never letting them stop to concentrate. But they were not to be cowed, even by such constant punishment."

"By 11.30 A.M. all the adjoining hills had been cleared of the Arabs, and our outposts held all the points originally occupied by these brave fellows."

vividly to her mind. She had never known any other relation.

If only Philip had never loved her, or never asked her to be his wife, she might have kept her secret. How happy she had been in her little cottage; and how quickly had the days gone by! She knew all the people and their affairs at Hazelmout, and had become as one of them. It would not have been necessary to tell them of her former life. This country village might have continued her home, her garden of Eden. But she was to be driven out of it, for now her eyes were open she knew there was no one there that would not shrink away from her.

Yet if she told all and went away what good would come of it? She must come forward as a witness against George Bassett; probably the one that would seal his fate, and send him to an awful doom. This was a matter to be pondered over, and weighed carefully in the balance, before she opened her lips in confession. She would be the cause of his death, perhaps unrepentant and unforgiven. There was no doubt in her mind that the struggle she had seen and thought so little of was the silent death-struggle between him and his victim. If she told who she was, there would be for her the shame and agony of bearing evidence against him, and for him the last awful penalty. What good could there be in that? It would not bring the murdered man to life again. No; she would keep her secret, and save herself and him.

She lifted herself up, stiff and aching as with some long and laborious task, and bathed her face and made her roughened hair smooth. She looked into the glass to see how tranquil she could make her eyes, and how sweet a smile she could call to her lips; but there was some expression far back in the depths of her dark eyes which frightened her, as if some spirit not her own had taken possession of her. She gazed at herself with the fascination of terror, till all the color faded out of her face, and her mouth quivered instead of smiling. Yet she could not turn away from it.

What was this that was coming upon her? What agony of loss and desertion? She felt as if she was losing her utmost strength; the waters, the proud waters, were too deep for her, they were overwhelming her soul. Was God hiding His face from her?

The little, old, well-worn Testament, in which she first read the life of Christ, lay on the table close to her hand. How well she remembered the night when she first opened it! She took it up in her cold hands. With an unconscious touch of superstition she left it to chance to open the pages for her. Was it then chance that the yellow leaves opened where they did? Her eyes, dim and heavy with sorrow, fell upon these verses: "And when he was at the place, He said unto them, Pray that ye enter not into temptation. And He was withdrawn from them about a stone's cast, and kneeled down, and prayed, saying, Father, if Thou be willing, remove this cup from me; nevertheless, not my will, but Thine be done."

She sank down on her knees and hid her face again. Oh, to do what was right! to do what God willed! The cup had not been taken away from her Lord; the shame and the spitting, the smiting on the face, the crown of thorns, the mockery and the jeering. His soul had been exceeding sorrowful, even unto death, and His Father had not delivered Him out of His afflictions. He endured the cross, despising the shame. And the servant could not be above her Master, nor the disciple above her Lord.

There was a plain path open to her, a path leading down into a valley darker than the valley of the shadow of death, but it must be trodden. She rose up to do it at once, and made haste to go down, for the hour was come when she must do the Lord's will, though her whole nature shrank from it. That it should be done quickly was all her desire.

Yet Carola paused for a minute or two at the door of the oak parlor. It was a half-glass door, covered by a curtain of crimson silk; but the curtain had been drawn a little aside, and she could see all the pleasant room within. The thick curtains had been drawn across the windows, but the lamp-light and the fire-light fell upon the wainscoted walls, and made her all at once feel how cold and dark it was to be standing there outside. The table was set for tea, and a little brass kettle, as glittering as gold, was singing on the hob of the old-fashioned grate. Mr. Arnold and Philip were reading, but Mrs. Arnold leaned back in her chair with her eyes closed, and a wistful expression on her face.

Carola opened the door so silently that none of them heard her or looked toward her. It seemed almost an impossibility to break this silence, to destroy all this tranquil happiness. The dread of it drew a sob from her so deep and sad that every one looked up at her at once. The girl's face was wan and pale, and her eyes gleamed feverishly. She was shivering visibly, and her lips moved, though no sound came from them. Philip sprang to his feet to hasten to her, but with a sorrowful gesture she forbade it. "No! I have come to tell you something," she cried; "perhaps I ought to have told you before, but indeed I never thought of it. I am the girl George Bassett used to call his sweet heart; and now I know I saw that murder done."

"Carola!" exclaimed Philip, "it is impossible! You are ill and dreaming, my darling." "No," she said, most mournfully; "it is like a dream. Oh, if it could only be a dream! But it's true. I was standing on the wharf, and I saw the two men in a boat wrestling together as clearly as I see you now. But I never thought the man was murdered. I never heard anything of it, and just then my grandmother died—that very night—and all my life was changed. I never thought of it again till now."

"My child, sit down and tell us all this quietly," said Mr. Arnold, and she let him place her on a chair by his own, while Philip stood opposite to her, and Mrs. Arnold, leaning forward eagerly, gazed intently upon her.

"Oh," she sobbed, in short sentences, "perhaps I ought to have told you before; but it seemed to have gone out of my mind. When I was a little girl I lived there, at the East End, in one of the wickedest parts. Oh, it is horrible! Here you don't know how wicked and miserable people can be. And George Bassett lived in the same street. I didn't know it was any sin to get drunk—that was almost the least wrong thing the people did. They were as ignorant and savage as heathens. No good persons could have lived among them."

"But how did you come to be there?" asked Mrs. Arnold, for neither her husband nor son could utter a word.

"I was born there," she answered, in a steadier voice, yet in a voice of despair; "my grandmother lived in a garret overlooking the river, and drank gin from morning to night. It is no wonder I took to drink it too. She was bed-ridden; and I was eighteen when she died. Then the rector of St. Chad's sent me to school, and told me not to talk about my former life; and everything was so different, and so good and beautiful, especially here, where I've been so happy, that it seemed as if I had forgotten it all."

"Carola," cried Philip, "is it true?"

"Oh, it's true!" she said. "I would give all my life to have it untrue. It all came back to me when I heard George Bassett's name. And now it seems as if I should bring shame and disgrace upon you; and I must forget you, and you must forget me. I know I can never be your wife."

There was a deathlike silence in the room. Mrs. Arnold rose and laid her hand tenderly on Philip's arm; she was sore at heart for the pain her boy was suffering, yet there was a secret satisfaction in knowing that he must come back to her for consolation and love. Outside the frosty air was wailling round the closed window, like the cry of some lost creature shut out from the warmth and comfort of the pleasant hearth. Carola lifted up her sad eyes to Philip's face, but he was not looking at her. He stood like a man in blank amazement, gazing intently on the floor. It was impossible that this story could be true, yet it was impossible for it not to be true. There was a despairing positiveness in Carola's tones and words which forbade him to think she did not know what she was saying. The shock of it paralyzed him. O Carola! his little Christmas Carol, who had made this Christmas Day the happiest day of his life, was it possible that she had been steeped in all this baseness and villenous? Could she have wormed herself into his inmost heart if she had not always been the sweet, innocent, winsome girl she had seemed to him?

"Tell me what I ought to do," said Carola, at last turning to Mr. Arnold, who sat beside her. He took her icily-cold hand into his own as he answered her.

"My dear," he said, kindly, "you spoke wisely when you said Philip and you must forget one another. But I'm grieved for you both from my very heart. You had better leave us at once—to-morrow morning. Is there no old friend you could go to?"

"Yes," she replied, "I remember him now, and oh! I ought not to have forgotten him so! There was an old Jew who was very kind to me, and taught me the ten commandments, and made me keep them. I will go to him."

"Is it near your old home?" inquired Mr. Arnold.

"It is my old home," she answered, shuddering; "but I must go to him, for he will know the exact time when I saw George Bassett on the river. It was the night my grandmother died, only I do not know the date. I was so ignorant then. But Matthias will know; and if it was that night the man was drowned, then I saw it."

"You must let the police know," said Mr. Arnold; "they will want your evidence on the trial."

"Yes," she continued, with a deep sob, "there will be a trial, and I shall have to tell all, and everybody will know. I can never come back here again."

"No, my dear," he replied, "it would be better not to come back again. But there are other village schools, and other places, and you've ways that will always win hearts to you. By, and by you will get over this."

"But oh! I shall never love any people again as I have loved you all," she moaned; "and what good would it be if they cast me off when they knew all about me? If I only had died when I was so near dying! Why did God let me live any longer?"

But none of them could answer that question. Philip Arnold looked at her white and pitiful face for a moment, and went away, and they heard his footsteps passing hurriedly through the hall and out into the moonlit night. Then his mother wrung her hands, and turned angrily toward Carola.

"Why did you not tell us all this at once?" she asked. "Why did you come among us as an impostor? You have broken my boy's heart."

"I had almost forgotten it myself," repeated Carola, wearily. "The rector forbade me to talk about it. If anybody had asked me any questions, I should have told the truth. It seemed as if my Lord Himself had taken me quite away from my old life and made me altogether a new creature. But I shall have the worst to bear; and oh! if I could bear all Philip's trouble, how willing I should be!"

"I don't know how I can ever forgive you!" cried Mrs. Arnold.

Carola rose up silently, though the room was growing dusky to her eyes, and their forms were becoming indistinct. If she could only be alone again, out of the reach of their voices, alone with her great sorrow! She heard the clanging of the great fold-yard gate as it swung to and fro after Philip had passed through it, and she clasped her hands together with a gesture of profound grief. She could not bear his burden; her own was more than she could bear. Before she could reach the door she fell senseless to the ground.

Early the next day, before the late rising sun was up, Carola was driven down to the nearest railway station by Mr. Arnold himself. It was a day's journey to London, and she could reach it only by starting with the earliest train. It was her earnest wish to leave Hazelmount before it was light; for all was quite over now. This home of hers, her first real home, was casting her out as unworthy to remain in it. She could not even see the little homesteads lying amid their gardens, and the pleasant lanes and fields which were as dear to her as if this had been her birthplace. They were shrouded in a darkness as black as her own future.

"I thought," she said, speaking half aloud to herself, "that Christian people would never turn against me." Poor girl! she was unused to the ways of Christians, or she would have known that comparatively few of them follow their Lord's example in associating with the poor and those who are meanly born. She was finding out that some of those who claim to be followers of the Carpenter of Nazareth would consider it an insult if a Christian brother who had to work as a carpenter for his living spoke to them, and would shrink from the acquaintanceship of people poorly dressed, or who had lived among the poor and degraded. It was a surprise to her to find Christians blending their religion with the doctrines of the world, and making so poor a mixture of it.

"My dear," answered Mr. Arnold, "you may be always sure of finding a friend in me. But this is different. We think more of character [he meant caste and class distinction, not character, which is a different thing altogether, and in which Carola was unobjectionable] than anything else. We were a little grieved when Philip fell in love with you, though we loved you ourselves. But now you know yourself the thing is impossible. The Arnolds of Hazelmount have never had to be ashamed."

"Yes, but you don't understand it all," she said. "May I write to you some day and tell you all about my young days? I want you to think—not badly of me."

"Ay, do," he replied, heartily, "and may God bless and comfort you. Shall I telegraph to your old friend, and tell him you are on your way to him?"

"No," she said, "I can find my way; but I do not know exactly how to send to him. I know that part of London well."

PAUL AT ROME.

S. S. Lesson for April 26, Acts 28 : 16-31. Golden Text, ver. 24. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

A Prisoner of Distinction—His Heart's Desire—His Explanation to his Countrymen in Rome—A Sect Spoken against—The Christian's Credentials—The Meeting in Paul's House—His Testimony—The Power to Accept or Reject—A Solemn Responsibility—The Great Reasoning—Two Years of Fruitful Labor.

PAUL was still a prisoner, although treated with such courtesy and consideration. On the arrival of the party at Rome a distinction was made between him and all the other prisoners. While they were delivered to the captain of the guard, he was permitted to dwell by himself with a soldier that kept him. The man of God saw the Lord's hand in this, and making use of the liberty thus granted to him, he lost no time in calling together the chief of the Jews, that he might make known among them that theme of apostolic times, "Jesus and the resurrection." Ever since his own conversion

HIS HEART'S DESIRE and prayer to God for Israel [was] that they might be saved" (Rom. 10 : 1); and he was always ready at the call of the Holy Ghost to preach Jesus to his own countrymen. In all his journeys Paul had first sought out the Jews, and only when Jesus was rejected by them had he turned to the Gentiles. Although he had accepted from God his commission as "the apostle of the Gentiles" (Rom. 11 : 13), and as such considered that he magnified his office, yet his own people did not cease to be his first care; therefore he let only three days elapse after coming to Rome before he "called the chief of the Jews together." He first accounted for his presence in Rome by speaking in a summary way of how, without having committed anything against "the customs of our fathers," he was made prisoner and delivered into the hands of the Romans; how they, having examined him, were about to acquit him; but when the Jews appealed against their verdict, he, on his part, appealed to Cæsar. "Not," he said, "that I had ought to accuse my nation of. For this cause therefore have I called for you, to see you, and to speak with you: because that for the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain." The "hope of Israel," the promised Messiah, this was the touchstone. For more than two years Paul had known that God would send him to this very company of men who were now gathered before him. This was perhaps the first time that the claims of Jesus of Nazareth were represented to them by a living witness who was, at the very hour when he spoke with them, suffering persecution for His sake.

The Roman Jews asserted that they had neither by letter nor by word of mouth heard anything against Paul. His appeal to Cæsar had been made too recently to allow of the Jews at Jerusalem sending letters to Rome to prejudice their compatriots against Paul. But he had touched on a subject which was evidently known in Rome, and they added, "But we desire to hear of thee what thou thinkest: for as concerning this sect, we know that it is everywhere spoken against."

SPOKEN AGAINST!

How little knew these Jews of Rome that this very thing was one of the credentials of true Christians! "Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad: for great is your reward in heaven: for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you" (Matt. 5 : 11, 12). A child of God who has not accepted his heritage of persecution has not yet learned the Lord's lesson—"They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world" (John 17 : 14, 16). Self-justification belongs to the world, is part of its spirit, and one of its weapons of defence. The world's principles are self-assertion, self-help, self-defence, self-esteem, self everything. In the life of Jesus we seek self in vain; it is nowhere to be found. When Peter said "Pity thyself," Jesus spoke of it as savoring the things that be of men (Matt. 16 : 22, margin). Paul himself in writing to Timothy said: "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution" (1 Tim. 3 : 12); thus it was no unwonted thing for him to hear at the outset of his mission to the Roman Jews that the sect which he represented was everywhere spoken against, and it could not act upon him in the way of discouragement.

This first meeting of

resulted in the appointment of a day when they should meet at his lodging, and there together search the Scriptures and discuss, as their subject, the Hope of Israel. When the day arrived the meeting was very numerous; "there came many unto him into his lodging; to whom he expounded and testified the kingdom of God, persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the law of Moses, and out of the prophets, from morning till evening." It was

and one of absorbing interest. Paul's position with his nation in Rome, and their position in regard to Christ, hung upon it. All Paul's arguments were drawn from the written Word, and filled as he was with the Holy Ghost, he expounded and testified. Scripture sustained

Scripture, and then the personal testimony followed, his own wonderful conversion, the glorious fruits of his ministry, and the fulfilment of Christ's own Word that signs should follow them that believe.

Much went on in that house of which there is no record on earth: hearts were melted, consciences were touched, reason was convinced. But then the cost! Should these proud, rich Jews take a position which would make them the scorn of their nation, and put them on a level with the despised Gentiles? Should they risk wealth, position, ease, comfort—everything but their own souls? Could this Jesus fill so great a void? The shining faces of Paul and Luke and Aristarchus were the sufficient answer; yes, and fully. What was the result? "Some believed the things which were spoken, and some believed not." This is always the way, and the will of man must decide. No man can save himself, or contribute in the smallest degree to his own soul's salvation. But at every step of the way—first for pardon and separation from the world, then for sanctification, for the anointing of the Spirit for service, for healing of the body, for deliverance from temptation—there always comes the point where Jesus says, "Will you let me save you? Will you yield yourself up absolutely and trust me?" The I will of each one must answer. They "agreed not among themselves," and God sent them one solemn message through Paul: "Well spake the Holy Ghost by Esaias the prophet unto our fathers, saying, Go unto this people, and say, Hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and not perceive: for the heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed; lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them. Be it known therefore unto you that the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and that they will hear it." This was and no wonder it caused the Jews great reasoning among themselves. Alas! in that day, as in this, men tried to find out by reason the truth of God—"The world by wisdom know not God" (1 Cor. 1 : 21). Revelation is above reason. Reason was created only as the servant and not the master of revelation. Oh, if men would only learn that spiritual things are "spiritually discerned" they would come to be taught, and would be in a position to learn!

Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired house (probably working for his living as usual), "and received all that came in unto him, preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him." In this precious time of service for the Master, Paul had to trust the Holy Ghost to bring inquirers to him. The work which God did by him caused a great stir in Rome, at that time the mistress of the world. He wrote at this date to his beloved Philippian converts: "My bonds in Christ are manifest in all the palace, and in all other places." God had the care of extending His own truth; Paul had none of the responsibility; he knew how to cast all his care on God, who cared for him. He saw God overruling evil as well as working good, and he rejoiced and praised Him. We may well believe that the radiant face of Paul, and his joyous spirit in this time of trial, must have gone far to prove the blessed truths he taught. "We glory in tribulations also" (Rom. 5 : 4) was something more than mere words to him. "Always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal flesh" (1 Cor. 4 : 11); this was his daily life.

Paul's life as a prisoner was perhaps as fruitful as any other part of his ministry. Rome was leavened with Christianity, the Christian Church all over Asia and Europe was influenced, and all generations of Christians since have been blessed by the letters Paul wrote from Rome.

PUBLIC attention being at this time directed to Afghanistan by the threatened war between England and Russia, the career of General Mackenzie, a Christian officer whose military laurels were won in that strange country may interest our readers.

Colin Mackenzie, whose portrait, with several scenes in his eventful life, we give this week, was born in London, on March 25th, 1806, and died in Edinburgh, on October 22d, 1881, at the age of seventy-five.

His was not a happy childhood, owing to the injudicious severity of his father; and when he was twelve years old he was sent with his elder brothers, James and Kenneth, to a school in Cumberland, of which he used to speak with horror, from the "brutal severity of the punishment." He was subsequently transferred to the Academy, at Dollar, among the heather-clad hills of Scotland, completing his education at the Rev. Dr. Donne's at Oswestry. His father's circumstances not allowing him to go to the University, he procured a cadetship for him, in 1825, in the Madras army. He sailed in the East Indiaman, on November 15th, and reached in May, 1826.

At this time he was a lad of nineteen, slender, agile, and very strong. The adjutant of his regiment declared he was the "most beautiful boy he ever beheld." He speedily became quite a favorite with the Commander-in-chief, Sir George Walker, Lady Walker, and two handsome daughters, one of whom made a great impression on the young subaltern. One of his first adventures was on a march from Madras, when, in endeavoring to cross the Godavari River, at Rajamundri, the strength of the current carried his horse off his feet. He disengaged himself and swam, accoutred as he was, to the opposite bank, landing with his whip in his hand. His horse found his way to shore lower down. (The scene is illustrated in front picture, No. 1.)

Being quartered at Aska, a place in the Northern Sirkars, he made a trip to Jagannath in December, 1825, when he passed through Ganjam, then totally deserted in consequence of a virulent fever, which swept away almost every inhabitant. The houses and gardens were infested by snakes, and the woods by ravenous wild animals; carriages were rotting in the stables, and the native town and public buildings were alike abandoned. On his way back from the scene of desolation, and while crossing the Chilika Lake, he read Pope's "Essay on Man," a book to which he traced his first religious impression, and which he ever after took pleasure in quoting.

A TIGER HUNT.

The extensive jungles near Nagpur abound in tigers and other wild monsters. Mackenzie used to go after them in company with Major Sheriff, commonly called "Tiger Sheriff," from his love of the dangerous sport, and success in it. Once, about seven o'clock on a fine spring evening in 1827, they went to a tree which had been fixed on in the heart of the forest, and in which a platform of branches, covered by a thin mattress, and fenced round with boughs, had been made for them. Here they waited in silence for their game, an unhappy bullock being tethered to the tree beneath. It was a moonlight night. The jungle opposite had caught fire, and the flames were darting up the mountain side. The night bird broke the deep silence of the woods with its melancholy note, and occasionally a bear was seen passing with its loose, shambling gait, or a pack of wolves went stealthily by, their tails between their legs, and their cunning eyes peering hither and thither, and ever and anon the unearthly, ghost-like laugh of the hyena was heard. All the sights and sounds were of a nature to fascinate and enthrall the imagination.

At last they heard the roar of a tiger in the distance, and then the dull, heavy plunge he made in leaping the stream. He soon drew near the tree in which Mackenzie and Major Sheriff were, and began gliding round and round the bullock, his destined victim. The poor creature, waving itself to and fro, so as almost to touch the ground with its body, turned and faced the tiger wherever he went, and at last broke its rope, and the tiger bounded away. The Major desired his Brahman attendant to go down and tie the bullock, but the terrified animal, suspicious of men and beasts in general, rushed at the poor Brahman, tossed him in the air (see front picture, No. 2), made off into the jungle, and was seen no more.

In March, 1830, Colin Mackenzie obtained leave of absence and embarked for England. In the following year his father died, and shortly afterward, in May, 1832, Mr. Mackenzie married Adeline Pattle, a young French lady. He and his wife then set sail for Madras, where they arrived in October, 1832. Two years later we find him gazetted as Adjutant at Bangalore. In 1834 also he first saw active service, though on a somewhat limited scale. By this time to trust to the providence of God, and to feel gratitude for His protection. On a march to Merkara he wrote to his wife thus: "This (March 28th) is Good Friday, and fervently do I implore Almighty God, for the sake of Him who died for us on this day, to bless you and our darling child, and to protect you from all evils, especially those which may affect your immortal souls. Would that my practice were conformable to my feelings, for I dare not call those sensations principles which yield to almost every bad impulse of my unworthy nature."

Mackenzie's regiment was ordered to the Straits of Malacca in July, 1836, where a period of trying inaction gave him the opportunity of learning by bitter experience that the purest natural pleasures are but husks so long as the soul is far from God. He had a sincere desire to serve God, with no knowledge of how to do so. He knew God, in fact, only as an earnest Jew or even Mohammedan might do; as his Creator and Preserver, not yet as His God and Saviour. He knew Him only afar off as "Jehovah, Jove, or Lord," not yet as "the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world."

Mrs. Mackenzie, having undertaken a voyage to England to recruit her shattered health, her husband spent some months in searching for Malay pirates in the Straits of Malacca. While engaged in their suppression, on October 11th, 1836, the news arrived that on May 28th, on the fourth anniversary of her wedding-day, at the age of twenty-four, his wife had breathed her last, and was buried at sea. At this juncture Mr. and Mrs. Dyer, the good missionaries at Malacca, were very helpful to the bereaved husband, and this was the time to which he always referred his conversion. Henceforth, he threw himself wholly on the grace of Christ as his Redeemer, and from this time took his stand on the Lord's side.

Mr. Mackenzie was induced to spend a short time in England, but in March, 1840, we find him once more in Calcutta, where he was selected by Lord Auckland for political service in AFGHANISTAN.

During his journey thither, he was invited by the Raja of Bhartpur to join him in the excitement of the chase. This is how the event is recorded in Colin Mackenzie's journal: "We mounted an elephant and proceeded by a circuitous route through the forest with four very handsome hunting leopards, called cheetahs, who, as they stood erect in their carts, waving their long tails, and making a sort of complaining noise from time to time, looked very noble and graceful. Meanwhile the cheetahs were kept with their eyes hooded; at last, the requisite distance being reached, one was unhooded and unbound. Glancing round with an eye of fire, he slipped down from the cart, and singling out his victim, in an instant he dashed after it. In less than a couple of hundred yards the last fatal bound was made, the death-stroke fell, and at the same time the cheetah's fangs were sunk deep in the jugular of the unhappy deer. This kind of leopard is only met with in the deserts of Rajputana." (See frontispiece picture, No. 3.)

During his residence at Cabul, in Afghanistan, Mackenzie formed a friendship with Lieutenant Michael Dawes, a brave young officer, and who was a most loving and consistent Christian. He had met Mackenzie for the first time at Sir William Macnaghten's, at Jellalabad, and was very much struck with him. Some months after, at Cabul, Dawes was on a committee for purchasing horses, when Captain Mackenzie came into the tent exclaiming, "I've lost it! I've lost it!" Somebody asked, "What have you lost?" and he explained that he had wished to purchase a Persian and a Pushtu Testament at a sale, but someone had already bought them. Dawes said, "If you will allow me I shall be very happy to give you one of each." The offer was accepted, and thus the intimacy was commenced.

NOT LONG AFTER HIS ARRIVAL

AT CABUL, Mackenzie experienced another of those remarkable deliverances from death which marked his career. Strolling early one morning into the garden of the Yabu Khana, a mulberry grove attached to the fort in which he lived, he recognized a bull-dog belonging to his friend Captain Troup, and called to it, "Nettle, Nettle!" but it took no notice. A moment after it was clinging like a leech to his right arm with all a bulldog's tenacity. He saw at a glance that it had gone mad, and squeezed its throat with his left hand until it let go its hold, and then at arm's length (see front picture, No. 4), he succeeded at last in throttling it. It was a struggle for life, the creature snapping alternately at each hand, and he was almost exhausted when, to his relief, its head dropped, and it swung lifeless in his desperate grasp. Many natives were present, but were too startled to give any assistance.

In October, 1841, Afghanistan broke out into open and armed rebellion against its rulers, and it being the English policy to support the Ameer or king of the country, a British force was sent to assist him in suppressing the revolt. Mackenzie was one of those upon whom devolved the re-opening of the Cabul Pass, which was in the hands of the rebels. Mackenzie and Dawes entered the gorge to carry a sangar, or barrier, from behind which the rebels were firing with deadly aim, picking off officers in particular. As they did so, the rebels poured in such a tremendous storm of bullets that a number of the Sappers were knocked over, and the rest, demoralized by the novelty of the thing—never having been fairly under fire before—halted, and then gave ground. Mackenzie was left alone, but standing firm, the mark for the Afghan sharpshooters, and at last rushing to the front, waving his sword and cheering, he succeeded in rallying the corps, and they then won the Pass. Dawes and his guns were in some danger, when Mackenzie, with the Sappers, rushed to his rescue. Michael Dawes met his grasp with a cordial smile, the only man, Mackenzie said, except one other, whom he ever saw wear a natural smile in battle. On October 15th, Mackenzie was summarily recalled to his political duties at Cabul, having in his enthusiasm gone out without "leave or license."

In the following November, however, insurrection broke out in the city of Cabul itself, and the rebels actually besieged the fort of Nishan Khan, in which Mackenzie had his quarters, and in which there was a considerable number women and children, the families of the tive Sappers. Matters were looking so serious in a day or two that is determined upon. Writing of the incident, Mackenzie says: "We were to avoid the town, follow the course of the small canal near the rt, and afterward to strike off by lanes and lds in the direction of the military cantonments, a mile and a half distant. A night retreat is generally disastrous, and this proved no exception to the rule, for, notwithstanding my strict order that all baggage should be left behind, it being very dark, many of the poor women contrived to slip out with loads of their property on their shoulders, making their children walk, whose cries added to the danger of discovery.

"Going among the women to see that my orders for leaving everything were obeyed, a young Ghoorah girl of sixteen or eighteen, who I d girded up her loins and stuck a sword into her kameband, came to me, and throwing all she possessed at my feet, said, 'Sahib, you are right: life is better than property.' She was a beautiful creature, with fair complexion and large dark eyes, and as she stood there with her arms swathed around her, leaving her limbs bare, she was a picture of life, spirit, and energy. I never saw her again, and fear she was either killed or taken prisoner on the night march.

"Before we had proceeded half a mile the enemy had begun to fire. All my regulars crept ahead with the Jezailchis, or Afghan men, and I found myself alone in the midst of a helpless and wailing crowd of women and children. One of these women, not being able to carry both her child and her pots and pans, I put down the former, who was crying at the top of its lungs. I made her take up her child, was attacked immediately afterward (see illustration, No. 5).

"Riding on alone along a narrow lane to try and pick out the road I found myself suddenly surrounded by Afghans.

From at first I took to be my own Jezailchis, I spoke to them as such. They quickly un-answered me, however, by crying out, 'Feringhi ast' ('Here is a European'), attacking me with swords and knives. Spurring my horse violently, I wheeled round, cutting from right to left. My blows, by God's mercy, parried the greater part of theirs, and I was lucky enough to cut off the hand of my most formidable assailant.

"My sword went clean through the man's arm, but just after, I received such a tremendous blow on the back of the head that, although he sabre turned in my enemy's hand, it knocked me almost off my horse. The idea passed through my mind—'Well, this is the end of my career, and a miserable end it is, in a night skirmish with Afghans.' But then came the thought that all was right. I commended my soul to God, and became insensible, hanging on the saddle by only one foot, but I did not let go the bridle. How I was rescued from that fearful peril I know not, but the next thing I remember is finding myself upright in the saddle in advance of the rebels, the whole picket firing after me. I passed unhurt through two volleys of musketry. After wandering about for some time, and passing unchallenged by a sleepy host of the Afghans, we reached the cantonments. During the night many stragglers of my party, principally followers, dropped in. From first to last I had about a dozen killed and half as many wounded."

Passing over a large number of incidents and experiences, for which we have no space, we may mention that in November, 1843, Colin Mackenzie married his second wife, the eldest daughter of Admiral Douglas, and after a pleasant furlough spent among their friends in Europe, it was again necessary for Mackenzie to return to India, and his wife accompanied him. He was commissioned by Lord Harding to raise a regiment of Sikhs.

While living at Lodiana, Mrs. Mackenzie speaks of the grief she and her husband experienced on account of the their servant, Jacob. The kind captain read many sweet and helpful passages of Scripture to him, the dying man meanwhile keeping tight hold of his master's hand, and when asked if his faith were strong in Christ, squeezed it and nodded. He strove to say something to a Hindu-tani horsekeeper, who had been with him in Afghanistan, pointing to his heart and then to heaven, as if he wished to exhort him to believe in the Lord. Mackenzie asked the man if he knew what Jacob meant. "Oh, yes," he replied, "this is what he has been saying to me for many days." (See illustration, No. 6.) He had been unwearied in speaking of the Gospel to all the servants and everyone within his reach, and all were attached to him from his kindness and helpfulness. By his last letters he evidently thought his time might be short. He wrote, "I myself looking to Jesus, where is my resting-place—that is to say my sweet grave."

After thirty-five years' service, Colin Mackenzie became a lieutenant-colonel in 1861, and in 1866, upon the representations of Lord Dalhousie and Sir Charles Napier, he was gazetted as C.B. (Commander of the Bath). In July, 1871, he became a Major-General, and on March 22d, 1873, he quitted India forever. He spent the last eight years of his life in England and Scotland, in an active, peaceful, and useful manner. He and his old friend, General Robert Alexander, always worshipped in the Presbyterian Church.

CLOSING YEARS AND DEATH.

While upon the Continent with his wife in the autumn of 1880, General Mackenzie's health showed signs of completely breaking down. On his way home he more than once said to a friend, "I long to see the Lord face to face." Having reached England in June, 1881, he at once attended the committees of the various societies in which he was interested. He also conducted family worship every morning, and said frequently: "I can say with Spurgeon—when you see my name in the Times I shall be glorified." He was evidently fast ripening for heaven. In July he journeyed to Edinburgh, and spent a happy fortnight with a large party of dear cousins at Grangemuir. Almost every morning, when asked how he was, he used to say,

"I FEEL VERY NEAR THE OTHER SHORE."

During the closing weeks of his earthly life he read with difficulty; and latterly hardly anything but Spurgeon's "Morning by Morning," and "Evening by Evening." His wife and sister read the Bible to him daily, which he greatly enjoyed. On Thursday, October 20th, he had a very restless night with shooting pains in his left leg. The next morning he said at the breakfast-table that he thought he was dying. At 10 P.M. he said to Mrs. Mackenzie, "Let's go to bed," I'm so tired." On Saturday, the 22d, the doctor found him in a state of unconsciousness, and about nine o'clock the same evening, after a loving, happy look upon the face of his wife, he closed his eyes and "fell asleep in Jesus."

"Is that a deathbed where the Christian lies?"

Yes; but not his: 'tis death itself there dies."

THE CRESCENT AND THE CROSS.

In the course of a deeply interesting article on Africa in a geographical magazine, the methods adopted in the dark continent by Dr. David Livingstone and the founder of Mohammedanism are vividly contrasted by Mr. H. M. Stanley, the explorer of Africa. In the course of the article the following striking passage occurs:

"Africa—that dark, forgotten continent, rimmed around by mountain ranges of an altitude from one thousand to nine thousand feet high, divided into fair and fertile basins, and watered by mighty rivers, and peopled by countless millions! A fleet of Arab vessels sails across the Red Sea; an army of these fanatics debark; they climb the steep passes of Abyssinia, and surmount the lofty plateau. They are mounted on fleet dromedaries, with coverings of velvet, adorned with gold and silver filigree, on coursers of Yemen and white asses of Arabia. They unfurl their standards, and, with banners streaming, they advance against Paganism, with the fierce cry of 'Death to the Unbeliever—there is no God but God, and Mohammed is his prophet.' Terror precedes them, death accompanies them, desolation follows them. The apostle of Islam knows no mercy.

"Ages elapse, and this creed overruns North Africa; from Guardafui to Cape Juby the Crescent is triumphant. The Libyan Desert and the Sahara are traversed; and, invincible and dauntless, the proud riders advance toward the Equator, when suddenly the camels are stricken down as by a pestilence, the high-spirited steeds become nerveless and die, and the white asses shrink under this mysterious change of nature. Baffled, they return, to resume their conquests over the dry deserts and rocky plateaus of Northern Africa, leaving the southern half of Africa to other influences, and to higher nations. That is one picture.

"The other is of a more modern period. From the Cape of Good Hope advances a Christian missionary, with a meek and humble following of Hottentot servants, a wagon, and a few teams of oxen. He advances northward toward the untravelled wilds of Southern Africa. He seeks the heathen in his home. To his astonishment he hails him as a brother. He soothes the benighted man with the vision of a heaven, comforts him with the assurance of a Redeemer, and infuses into him the hope of salvation. And ever as he advances northward he repeats the song of the angels, which they sang over Bethlehem: 'Peace on earth, goodwill toward men.'

"This same Christian arrives finally on the banks of the Zambesi, and thence directs his paths westward to the Atlantic Ocean. Back again, whence he came, he retraces his wearied steps; and he halts not until he has viewed the waters of the Indian Ocean, and along all that vast route he has dropped the sweet words of peace and love. After a short pause among his own kind, he returns to Africa, and for fifteen years more he continues to move among the lost nations, loving and loved, blessing and being blessed, and at last surrenders his life in their midst on the shore on Bangweo; and as we turn to the map of Africa, to regard the traces of his footsteps, we behold the outlines of the Cross of the Redeemer drawn by Livingstone during his thirty-two years of travel in the southern half of Africa.

"There was pomp and majesty in the proud advance of Mohammed into Abyssinia, but the picture of the lone Christian wandering in those untrodden wilds of South Africa, with charity and good-will for his motto, is almost divine. It is grand to think of the brave, undaunted Arabs, so invincible in war, carrying the Crescent flag from the Red Sea to the Atlantic! but it is still grander to think of the large conquests achieved by this meek and patient follower of Christ by the simple power of Christian love. Give due meed to this Arabs for the valor and matchless courage with which they carried their faith over many a thousand leagues in Northern Africa; but the undying constancy, the persistent resolution, the patient fortitude of this lone soldier of the Cross, during his long and blameless crusade in the strongholds of Paganism, is sublime.

"Well, then, since this Christian, with all his unrivalled goodness and piety, has declared that the end of the geographical feat is the beginning of commercial (the missionary) enterprise, do you wonder that I, the last of his race and color who talked with him, should take up his work with the view of redeeming Africa from its forlornness and squalid poverty by initiating legitimate commercial enterprise?"

SOCIAL DISSIPATION.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, April 19, 1885.

"When Herod's birthday was kept, the daughter of Herodias danced before them, and pleased Herod."—MATT. 14: 6.

It is the anniversary of Herod's birthday. The palace is lighted. The highways leading thereto are all ablaze with the pomp of invited guests. Lords, captains, merchant princes, the mighty men of the land, are coming to mingle in the festivities. The table is spread with all the luxuries that royal purveyors can gather. The guests, white-robed and anointed and perfumed, come in and sit.

AT THE TABLE.
Music! The jests evoke roars of laughter. Riddles are propounded. Repartee is indulged. Toasts are drunk. The brain is befogged. The wit rolls on into uproar and blasphemy. They are not satisfied yet. Turn on more light. Pour out more wine. Music! Sound all the trumpets. Clear the floor for a dance. Bring in Salomi, the beautiful and accomplished princess. The door opens, and in bounds the dancer. The lords are enchanted. Stand back and make room for the brilliant gyrations. These men never saw such

POETRY OF MOTION.
Their soul whirled in the reel and bounds with the bounding feet. Herod forgets crown and throne and everything but the fascinations of Salomi. All the magnificence of his realm is as nothing now compared with the splendor that whirled on tiptoe before him. His body sways from side to side, corresponding with the motions of the enchantress. His soul is thrilled with the pulsations of the feet and bewitched with the taking postures and attitudes more and more amazing. After a while he sits in enchanted silence, looking at the flashing, leaping, bounding beauty, and as the dance closes and the tinkling cymbals cease to clap and the thunders of applause that shook the palace begin to abate.

THE ENCHANTED MONARCH
swears to the princely performer: "Whatsoever thou shalt ask of me I will give it thee, to the half of my kingdom." Now, there was in prison at that time a minister of the Gospel by the name of John the Baptist, and he had been making a great deal of trouble by preaching some very plain and honest sermons. He had denounced the sins of the king and brought down upon him the wrath of the females of the royal household. At the instigation of her mother, Salomi takes advantage of the extravagant promise of the king and says, "Bring me the head of

JOHN THE BAPTIST
on a dinner plate." Hark to the sound of feet outside the door and the clatter of swords. The executioners are returning from their awful errand. Open the door. They enter, and they present the platter to Salomi. What is on this platter? A new glass of wine to continue the uproarious merriment? No. Something redder and costlier—the ghastly, bleeding head of John the Baptist, the death glare still in the eye, the locks dabbled with the gore, the features still distressed with the last agony.

'Tis woman, who had whirled so gracefully in the dance, bends over the awful burden without a shudder. She gloats over the blood, and with as much indifference as a waiting-maid might take a tray of empty glassware out of the room after an entertainment, Salomi carries the disheveled head of John the Baptist, while all the banqueters shout with laughter, and think it a good joke that in so easy and quick a way they have got rid of an earnest and outspoken minister of the Gospel.

Well, there is no harm in a birthday festival. All the kings from Pharaoh's time had celebrated such occasions, and why not Herod? No harm in kindling the lights. No harm in spreading the banquet. No harm in arousing music. But from the riot and wassail that closed the scene of that day every pure nature revolts. I am not this morning to discuss the old question, Is dancing right or wrong? but I am to discuss the question, Does dancing take too much place and occupy too much time in modern society? and in my remarks I hope to carry with me the earnest conviction of all thoughtful persons, and I believe I will.

You will all admit, whatever you think of that style of amusement and exercise, that from many circles it has crowded out all intelligent conversation. You will also admit that it has made the condition of those who do not dance, either because they do not know how, or because they have not the health to endure it, or because through conscientious scruples they must decline the exercise, very uncomfortable. You will also admit, all of you, that it has passed in many cases from an amusement to a dissipation, and you are easily able to understand the bewilderment of the educated Chinaman who, standing in the brilliant circle where there was dancing going on four or five hours, and the guests seemed exhausted, turned to the proprietor of the house and said, "Why don't you allow your servants to do this for you?"

You are also willing to admit, whatever be your idea in regard to the amusements I am speaking of, and whatever be your idea of the old-fashioned square dance and of many of the professional romps in which I can see no evil, is administrative of evil and ought to be driven out of all respectable circles. I am by natural temperament and religious theory opposed to the position taken by all those who are horrified at playfulness on the part of the young, and who think that all questions are decided—questions of decency and morals—by the position of the feet, while, on the other hand, I can see nothing but ruin, temporal and eternal, for those who go into the dissipations of social life, dissipations which have already despoiled thousands of young men and young women of all that is noble in character and useful in life.

UNIVERSALLY POPULAR
Dancing is the graceful motion of the body adjusted by art to the sound and measures of musical instrument or of the human voice. All nations have danced. The ancients thought that Castor and Pollux taught the art to the Lacedaemonians. But whoever started it, all climates have adopted it. In ancient times they had the festival dance, the military dance, the mediatorial dance, the bacchanalian dance, and queens and lords swayed to and fro in the gardens, and the rough backwoodsman with this exercise awakened the echo of the forest. There is something in the sound of lively music to evoke the movement of the hand and foot, whether cultured or uncultured. Passing down the street we unconsciously keep step to the sound of the brass band, while the Christian in church with his foot beats time while his soul rises upon some great harmony. While this is so in civilized lands, the red men of the forest have their scalp dances, their green-corn dances, their war dances.

IN ANCIENT TIMES
the exercise was so utterly and completely deprecated that the church anathematized it. The old Christian fathers expressed themselves most vehemently against it. St. Chrysostom says: "The feet were not given for dancing but to walk modestly, not to leap impudently like camels." One of the dogmas of the ancient church reads: "A dance is the devil's possession, and he that entereth into a dance entereth into his possession. As many paces as a man makes in dancing, so many paces does he make to hell." Elsewhere the old dogmas declared this: "The woman that singeth in the dance is the princess of the devil, and those that answer are her clerks, and the beholders are his friends, and the music are his bellows, and the fiddlers are the ministers of the devil. For as when hogs are strayed, if the hogherd call one all assemble together, so when the devil calleth one woman to sing in the dance, or to play on some musical instrument, presently all the dancers gather together." This indiscriminate and universal denunciation of the exercise came from the fact that it was utterly and completely depraved.

But we are not to discuss the customs of the olden times, but customs now. We are not to take the evidence of the ancient fathers, but our own conscience, enlightened by the Word of God, is to be the standard. Oh, bring upon the young. I would not drive out from their soul all the hilarities of life. I do not believe that the inhabitants of ancient Wales, when they stepped to the sound of the rustic harp, went down to ruin. I believe God intended the young people to laugh and romp and play. I do not believe God would have put exuberance in the soul and exuberance in the body if He had not intended they should in some wise exercise it and demonstrate it. If a mother join hands with her children and cross the floor to the sound of music, I see no harm. If a group of friends cross and recross the room to the sound of piano well played, I see no harm. If a company, all of whom are known to host and hostess as reputable, cross and recross the room to the sound of musical instrument, I see no harm. I tried for a long while to see harm in it. I could not see any harm in it. I never shall see any harm in that. Our men need to be kept young, young for many years longer than they are kept young. Never since my boyhood days have I had more sympathy with the innocent hilarities of life than I have now. What though we have felt heavy burdens! What though we have had to endure hard knocks! Is that any reason why we should stand in the way of those who, unstung of life's misfortunes, are full of exhilaration and full of glee?

GOD BLESS THE YOUNG!
They will have to wait many a long year before they hear me say anything that would depress their ardor or clip their wings or make them believe that life is hard and cold and repulsive. It is not. I tell them, judging from my own experience, that they will be treated a great deal better than they deserve. We have no right to grudge the innocent hilarities to the young.

As we go on in years let us remember that we had our gleeful times; let us be able to say, "We had our good times, let others have their good times." Let us willingly resign our place to those who are coming after us. I will cheerfully give them everything—my house, my books, my position in society, my heritage. After twenty, forty, fifty years we have been drinking out of the cup of this life, do not let us begrudge the passing of it that others may take a drink. But while all this is so, we can have no sympathy with sinful indulgences, and I am going to speak in regard to some of them, though I should tread on the long trail of some popular vanities. What are the dissipations of social life to-day, and what are the

DISSIPATIONS OF THE BALL-ROOM?
In some cities and in some places reaching all the year round, in other places only in the summer time and at the watering-places. There are dissipations of social life that are cutting a very wide swathe with the sickle of death, and hundreds and thousands are going down under these influences, and my subject in application is as wide as the continent and as wide as Christendom. The whirlpool of social dissipation is drawing down some of the brightest craft that ever sailed the sea—thousands and tens of thousands of the bodies and souls annually consumed in the conflagration of ribbons.

Social dissipation is the abettor of pride, it is the instigator of jealousy, it is the sacrificial altar of health, it is the defiler of the soul, it is the avenue of lust and it is the curse of every town in America. Social dissipation. It may be hard to draw the line and say that this is right on the one side, and that is wrong on the other side. It is not necessary that we do that, for God has put a throne in every man's soul, and I appeal to that throne to-day. When a man does wrong he knows he does wrong, and when he does right he knows he does right, and to that throne that Almighty God lifted in the heart of every man and woman I appeal.

As to the

wrought by the dissipations of social life there can be no doubt. What may we expect of people who work all day and dance all night? After awhile they will be thrown on society nervous, exhausted imbeciles. These people who indulge in the suppers and the midnight revels and then go home in the cold unwrapped in limbs, will after a while be found to have been written down in God's eternal records as suicides, as much suicides as if they had taken their life with a pistol, or a knife, or strychnine.

How many people in America have stepped from the ball-room into the graveyard! Consumptions and swift neuralgias are close on their track. Amid many of the glittering scenes of social life in America diseases stand right and left and balance and chain. The breath of the sepulchre floats up through the perfume, and the froth of Death's lip bubbles up in the champagne. I am told that in some parts of this country, in some of the cities, there are parents who have actually given up housekeeping and gone to boarding that they may give their time illicitly to social dissipations. I have known such cases. I have known family after family blasted in that way in one of the other cities where I preached. Father and mother turning their back upon all quiet culture and all the amenities of home, leading forth their entire family in the wrong direction. Annihilated, —for there are some things worse than annihilation. I give you the history of more than one family in America when I say they went on in the dissipations of social life until the father dropped into a lower style of dissipation, and after awhile the son was tossed out into society a nonentity, and after awhile the daughter eloped with a French dancing-master, and after awhile the mother, getting on further and further in years, tries to hide the wrinkles but fails in the attempt, trying all the arts of the belle, an old flirt, a poor miserable butterfly without any wings.

WORSE THAN ANNIHILATED

If there is anything on earth beautiful to me her white locks flowing back over the wrinkled brow—locks not white with frost, the poets say, but white with the blossoms of the tree of life, in her voice the tenderness of gracious memories, her face a benediction. As grandmother passes through the room the grandchildren pull at her dress, and she almost falls in her weakness; but she has nothing but candy or cake or a kind word for the little darlings. When she gets out of the wagon in front of the house the whole family rush out and cry: "Grandma's come!" and when she goes away from us never to return, there is a shadow on the table, and a shadow on the hearth, and a shadow on the heart. There is no more touching scene on earth than when grandmother sleeps the last slumber and the little child is lifted up to the casket to give the last kiss, and she says: "Good-by, grandma!"

Oh, there is a beauty in old age. God says so. "The hoary head is a crown of glory." Why should people decline to get old? The best things, the greatest things I know of are aged. Old mountains, old seas, old stars and the old eternity. But if there is anything distressful, it is to see an old woman ashamed of the fact that she is old. What with all the artificial appliances, she is too much for my gravity. I laugh even in church, when I see her coming. The worst-looking bird on earth is a peacock when it has lost its feathers. I would not give one lock of my old mother's gray hair for fifty thousand such caricatures of humanity. And if the life of a worldling, if the life of a dissipation-given to the world is sad, the close of such a life is simply a tragedy.

Let me tell you that the dissipations of American life, of social life in America, are of a vast multitude of people. What do those people care about the fact that there are whole nations in sorrow and suffering and agony, when they have for consideration the more important question about the size of a glove or the tie of a cravat? Which one of them ever bound up the wounds of the hospital? Which one of them ever went out to care for the poor? Which of them do you find in the haunts of sin distributing tracts? They live on themselves, and it is very poor pasture.

Sybaris was a great city, and it once sent out three hundred horsemen in battle. They had a minstrel who had taught the horses of the army a great trick, and when the old minstrel played a certain tune the horses would rear and with their front feet seem to beat time to the music. Well, the old minstrel was offended with his country, and he went over to the enemy, and he said to the enemy: "You give me the mastership of the army and I will destroy their troops when those horsemen come from Sybaris. So they gave the old minstrel the management, and he taught all the other minstrels a certain tune. Then when the cavalry troop came up the old minstrel and all the other minstrels played a certain tune, and at the most critical moment in the battle when the horsemen wanted to rush to the conflict, the horses reared and beat time to the music with their forefeet, and in disgrace and rout the enemy fled." Ah! my friends, I have seen it again and again—the minstrels of pleasure, the minstrels of dissipation, the minstrels of godless association have defeated people in the hardest fight of life. Frivolity has lost the battle for ten thousand folk. Oh! what to the human mind this everlasting question about dress, this discussion of fashionable infinitesimals, this group looking askance at the glass, wondering with an infinity of earnestness how that last geranium leaf does look—this shrivelling of a man's moral dignity until it is not observable to the naked eye, this Spanish inquisition of a tight shoe, this binding up of an immortal soul in a ruffe, this pitching off of an immortal nature over the rocks when God intended it for great and everlasting uplifting.

You know as well as I do that the dissipations of social life in America to-day are destroying thousands and tens of thousands of people, and it is time that the pulpits lift their voice against them, for I now prophecy the eternal misfortune of all those who enter the rivalry. When did the white, glistening boards of a dissipated ball-room ever become the road to heaven? When was a torch for eternity ever lighted at the chandelier of a dissipated scene? From a table spread after such an excited and desecrated scene who ever went home to pray?

A BRILLIANT VICTIM.

In my parish of Philadelphia there was a young woman brilliant as a spring morning. She gave her life to the world. She would come to religious meetings and under conviction would for a little while begin to pray, and then would rush off again into the discipleship of the world. She had all the world could offer of brilliant social position. One day a flushed and excited messenger asked me to hasten to her house, for she was dying. I entered the room,

There were the physicians, there was the mother, there lay this disciple of the world. I asked her some questions in regard to the soul. She made no answer. I knelt down to pray. I rose again, and desiring to get some expression in regard to her eternal interests, I said: "Have you any hope?" and then for the first her lips moved in a whisper as she said: "No hope!" Then she died. The world, she served it, and the world helped her not in the last.

And I tell the hundreds and thousands of young people in this house this morning, the world will laugh with you when you laugh, and romp with you when you romp, but they will not weep with you when you die.

I would wish that this morning I could marshal all the young people in this audience to an appreciation of the fact that you have in life, and your amusements and recreations are only to help you along in that work. At the time of a religious awakening a Christian young woman spoke to a man in regard to his soul's salvation. He floated out into the world. After awhile she became worldly in her Christian profession. The man said one day, "Well, I am as safe as she is. I was a Christian, she said she was a Christian. She talked with me about my soul; if she is safe I am safe." Then a sudden accident took him off without an opportunity to utter one word of prayer.

Do you not realize, have you not noticed, young men and old—have you not noticed that the dissipations of social life are blasting and destroying a vast multitude? With many life is a masquerade ball, and as at such entertainments gentlemen and ladies put on the garb of kings and queens or mountebanks or clowns and at the close put off the disguise, so a great many pass their whole life in a mask, at death. While the masquerade ball of life goes on, they trip merrily over the floor, gemmed hand is stretched to gemmed hand, gleaming brow bends to bleaming brow. On with the dance! Flush and rustle and laughter of immeasurable merry-making. But after awhile the languor of death comes on the limbs and blurs the eyesight. Lights lower. Floor hollow with sepulchral echo. Music saddened into a wail. Lights lower. Now the maskers are only seen in the dim light. Now the fragrance of the flowers is like the sickening odor that comes from garlands that have lain long in the vaults of cemeteries. Lights lower. Mists gather in the room. Glasses shake as though quaked by sullen thunder. Sigh caught in the curtain. Scarf drops from the shoulder of beauty a shroud. Lights lower. Over the slippery boards in dance of death glide jealousies, envies, revenges, lust, despair and death. Stench of lamp-wicks almost extinguished. Torn garlands will not half cover the ulcerated feet. Choking damps. Chilliness. Feet still. Hands closed. Voices hushed. Eyes shut. Lights out.

Oh, I see some of my friends who floated far away from God through social dissipations, and it is time you turned. For I remember that there were two vessels on the sea, and in a storm, and in the sea. It was very, very dark, and the two vessels were going straight for each other, and the captains knew it not. But after awhile the man on the lookout saw the approaching ship, and he shouted, "Hard a-larboard!" and from the other vessel the cry went up, "Hard a-larboard!" and they turned just enough to glance by and passed in safety to their harbors. Some of you are in the storm of temptation and you are driving on and coming toward fearful collisions unless you change your course. Hard a-larboard! Turn ye, turn ye, for "why will ye die, oh, house of Israel?"

A LADY'S VISIT TO A THIEVES' HAUNT.

In the Sunday Magazine for December, Mr. G. S. Reaney writes a brilliant and petical paper on "Finding and Doing One's Own Work," and quotes the following realistic illustration:

"In a street, known for its open profligacy and sin, down which the police paraded toward dusk in couples, turning a deaf ear to many a cry from some wretchedly drunken woman or man, because it was impossible to deal with tens and twenties as they might with individual cases—at the far end of this street stood a house known to be the haunt of thieves. To the door of this house at dusk, one summer's evening, came a worker whose energy of love made her unmindful of the difficulties which must have driven back one less moved.

"What do you want here, I should like to know?" said a bloated, hard-faced woman, in answer to the visitor's knock. "I heard in the next street, but one," was the simple answer, "that your husband was dying, and I came to see him."

"Well, well, that's a joke, if ever there was one," said the woman, laughing boisterously, and swaying herself backward and forward in her hilarity. "Come to see my husband, have you? To talk religion to him, eh? Bless me! How would you like now if I took you at your word, and really let you see him? May be you wouldn't mind a black eye or two? Why, look at mine; I got one for doing a thing not half as crossing to his temper! Are you ready for that, I say, and abuse into 'ne bargain?"

"I'm ready for anything," is the quiet answer, spoken in firm tones, although the cheek has blanched somewhat. "I feel sure you need not fear. Your husband would not behave in less than a gentlemanly way to a lady who is a stranger to him!"

"What a way of putting it!" exclaimed the woman, with another burst of laughter. "Well, come along," she added; "I'll put you in the way of getting up-stairs, but mind, I don't ask you to go, and I wash my hands of consequences!"

"So saying she opened an inner door, passed through a low room, fairly furnished, but very dirty and untidy, and motioned to a staircase. "First door on the right," she whispered, as she pointed upward.

"With a beating heart but firm step the self-invited visitor ascended. Possibly her very footfall, so gentle when compared with the heavy steps of the wife, arrested the notice of the sick man pleasantly. As she crossed the threshold he was looking toward the door with an eager, wondering look. This look became, however, dark and almost fierce as his visitor approached the bed. Instinctively his hand felt for a stick which lay within easy reach, there doubtless to be used to knock on the floor did he require anything from below; but the action was a menacing one. Quite undaunted, the visitor said gently, not waiting for him to speak, nor moving from the spot by his pillow where she had paused:

"I am so sorry you are ill. It is hard for women to suffer, but far harder for men. I have come to sing to you something that will comfort you. Listen," and without a moment's hesitation she sang the hymn, beginning:

"I heard the voice of Jesus say,
Come unto me and rest;
Lay down, thou weary one, lay down
Thy head upon my breast.
I came to Jesus as I was,
Weary and worn and sad;
I found in Him a resting place,
And He has made me glad."

"The fevered and almost glaring look in the man's eyes gradually softened before the first verse ended, and toward the middle of the second, tears, large and full (as if the first flowing of some new spring suddenly started in this hitherto barren wilderness nature), rained down the furrowed cheeks. And the worker's work began. It came simply enough afterward to repeat various portions of Scripture, and to kneel in prayer, and on the sick man's part as naturally to plead, "You'll come again; please say you'll come again."

"This illustration touches only one class of work, and that reckoned perhaps the hardest work among the outwardly debased and profligate; but the same principle applies to all life, and therefore to all work. The energy of love creates its own opportunities."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Good Foothold.—The Rev. Mr. Duncan, speaking of faith in God, said at a recent meeting: "I spent several hours by the bedside of a dying boy last night. He was perfectly happy and without a fear. When I spoke to him of Jesus, I discovered that his feet were firmly planted on the Rock of Ages. He had entire faith and confidence in God to lead him through 'the dark valley of the shadow of death,' and when he died his last breath was used to give utterance to his triumphant joy in Christ. He has left a bright record behind him, and, as one result of my interview with him, my own faith in God is considerably strengthened, and my heart is nerved with a firmer courage."

An Artist's Eye.—A Minister Related: "A painter was looking with great delight at a beautiful picture, when a friend said to him, 'Why do you look so long and earnestly at that picture?' If you could see the picture as I see it you would know why I look so earnestly at it," replied the painter; "I see a great beauty in it which only the eye of an artist can discern. This is what the children of God see in Jesus, a great beauty, which those who are blinded by the world cannot see. To those who have graciously been enlightened by the life-imparting rays of the Sun of Righteousness, Jesus is 'the Chief among ten thousand, and the altogether lovely.'"

A Widow Comforted.—A Christian Minister related that a poor widow woman was sitting with her fatherless children, trying to look into the unknown future, and thinking that there was no hope, and no happiness for her, or them, when quite unexpectedly a friend called in to see her, and happened to repeat a passage from the Bible, which turned the widow's thoughts in quite a different direction. She was enabled to look through the clouds and the dreaded future right up to her beloved Master's face. She lifted her weak, weary heart to Jesus, staying herself on Him. She was soon strengthened and even cheered, and her children have now grown up about her to call her blessed. She has been the means of training them all for honorable and useful positions in life, and of leading them also to Christ as their Saviour.

The Envelope under the Door.—A Well-known minister said: "In the early part of my ministry I had the care of a young family, and was in great temporal need. There was one day in particular which I shall never forget. We had been without food for a whole day, and had to put our little ones to bed hungry. When we were alone my wife and I knelt down and earnestly besought the Lord for bread for ourselves and little ones, and we rose from our knees cheered, knowing that God who feeds the beasts of the field and the birds of the air would not let His own children starve. Passing the entry door on our way to bed, we saw put underneath it a white envelope, and when it was opened, we found that it contained a cheque for a considerable sum of money. We did not know when it had come or by whom it was brought, but this we did know, that the Lord had sent it in answer to our prayer."

A Well-Directed Arrow.—The Rev. Mr. Robertson, in counselling servants of the Lord not to lose courage in their work, said: "When I first began work for Christ I was very much discouraged because I did not see souls being saved. I could not recollect one instance of conversion under my preaching or teaching. One day I was wearily walking along a country road, very much disheartened when I thought of it, and was almost making up my mind to give up the work in which I was engaged, and go to some other field of labor. When I entered the man's I was told that there was some one waiting to see me. It was a young girl, who came to tell me that I was the means of her conversion. She was weeping bitterly, and it was with difficulty she told me the circumstances. I learned that it was a sentence in a prayer that had been the means of leading her to put her trust in Jesus. She said, 'Oh, sir! it was when you said "Lord, put thine arrow into thine enemies' hearts!" Just as you said these words the Lord heard your prayer, and put His arrow of conviction deep into my heart, and from that moment I trusted Him.' Some time ago I was standing at a dying woman's bedside, and she told me that it was this young girl who had led her to put her trust in the Saviour."

Happy Old Grannie.—A Devoted Evangelist related: "I went one night to see a friend of mine, over ninety years of age, who was dying. After some conversation with her, I said 'Grannie, are you happy?' 'Happy!' she rejoined, 'I should think I am happy,' and she repeated her favorite text, 'God is my salvation; I will trust and not be afraid,' and before leaving her I knelt down and prayed that the Lord would guide her through the dark valley which she was about to enter. After the prayer was finished she, with one of her withered hands in mine, and the other resting on my head, called down God's blessing upon me, and on all the work which I had undertaken for Him. She has been a great blessing to many of her friends, and to the district in which she lives, in leading them to Christ, and now on her death-bed she is giving a faithful testimony of the Lord's great love and goodness."

A Pleasure-Loving Schoolmaster.—The Rev. Mr. Gault said: "In the great revival of 1859 in Ireland, there were many who professed conversion, most of whom remained steadfast. There was one case in particular; it was that of a young man who was the principal of a day-school. After his day's work was over, he thought of nothing else but what shall I do to amuse myself. One night he was persuaded to attend a meeting, where he heard the text read 'How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?' The young man's conscience told him that he was neglecting salvation. He thought that he had done nothing really bad, but that he had done enough to secure damnation. He had neglected salvation, and thought of nothing but amusement. Before entering his home that night, he gave himself to the Lord, and is to this day one of the most earnest evangelists throughout the land, stirring up and showing people their great need of salvation, and successful in conducting many sinners to the cross of the Saviour."

A Slave Woman Finds Freedom.—A Christian worker said: "I read the other day of a poor Hottentot who was a slave in a farmer's family. The farmer went to a distant place to have a child baptized, and poor Jejena, who never had heard the sound of church bells, was permitted on this occasion to tread the courts of the Lord's house. When the minister rose, her eager eye was fixed upon him. His text was taken from Rev. 3:15—'I know thy works.' Jejena listened with deep attention to the minister as he described the sinner's evil-doings. She left the church with a very sorrowful heart. The minister invited the farmer and his wife to his house; and as Jejena stood behind her mistress' chair he fixed his eyes upon her, and said: 'Do you know that there is a God?' 'I have often used His name wickedly, but I know nothing of Him; oh, sir! tell me who He is and where He is to be found,' said the poor slave. 'He is everywhere; God is a Spirit,' replied the minister. 'Do you know you have a soul, and when you die you must be happy forever or sent to everlasting fire?' 'Oh, sir, what shall I do? I have never done anything but evil in my life.' Here the conversation was interrupted. By night and by day her heart overflowed with anxiety and sorrow. At length she obtained help from an aged Christian Hottentot. To her inquiry how she should pray, he told her to kneel down and say, "O God, teach me! O God, help me!" From that time this was her prayer, and God did help and teach her; she found balm in Gilead and a kind Physician there."

THE SCATTERED DRY BONES.

By the Rev. E. J. Hytche.

The Complete Scattering of Israel—Colonies in Strange Places—Always Distinct—Always Monotheists—Possess the Pentateuch—The Location of the Colonies—1. In Malabar—2. In Afghanistan—The Benjamites—3. Abyssinian Jews—4. Central China—5. In Cochín—White and Black Jews—6. In British India—7. In Madagascar—The Approaching Gathering of the Bones.

In sketching the present localization of some of the scattered Jews—especially of what are commonly known as the "lost ten tribes," or Israelites proper—I do not think it needful to discuss the theory of the Ephraimitish origin of the English nation. Suffice it to say, that no Ethnologist of any repute has sanctioned this novel theory, but they rather have shown that the British is eminently a mixed race, in which the Saxon element preponderates.

Both prophecy and geographical facts indicate that the expatriated Jews—more especially the ten tribes—were exiled to various countries contiguous to, or which had Assyria for a centre, and that they would there remain until the period when by Divine leadings they should again become one nationality. And then, in the Divine analogy of Ezekiel (37: 7), there will be a "noise and a shaking, and the bones shall come together, bone to his bone."

In connection with this prediction of the wide dispersion of the Jews, it is remarkable how many COLONIES OF SCATTERED ISRAELITES have been discovered by recent travellers, and that in far-off countries where even their existence was not formerly suspected. There are, in fact, few countries, either in Asia or Africa, where there are not colonies of Hebrews planted there from time immemorial. And, though surrounded by idolaters, or by the more philosophical Buddhists, they have not abandoned their creed, however much it has been distorted through the lapse of centuries since the time of their expatriation; and they almost invariably expect a Deliverer or Messiah to restore them to their GOD-GIVEN PATRIMONY.

From their non-possession of any of the sacred books save the Pentateuch, we are, I think, warranted in the inference that they are mainly remnants of those tribes who were transported beyond the river Euphrates by Shalmanezar. During the present century much has been done, not so much by missionaries as by travellers, to discover the Jewish colonies in such widely separated districts of the earth, as to fulfil to the letter the numerous prophecies of their being deported to "the ends of the earth." To some of these I would more especially refer, because the very fact of their discovery proves the truth of the prophecy (Ezekiel 36: 8), "O ye mountains of Israel, ye shall shoot forth your branches, and yield your fruit to my people of Israel; for they are nigh to come." It also indicates the nearness of the time of their restoration.

1. Early in this century Dr. Claudius Buchanan, in his "Christian Researches," discovered in the Hindoo province of a colony of Jews. From long residence there they had become totally black. Rarely marrying outside their own race, they had that facial expression by which the Hebrews, whatever their creed or country, are detected, and which is found indelibly traced on the war triumphs of Assyria everywhere. They were proud of their Abrahamic descent, though for the most part despised by the dominant races. And even those who had lost the hope of their fathers still regarded Palestine as their fatherland. A still more recent author, Mr. J. H. Stocqueler, in his "Oriental Interpreter," says "that the Jewish colony in Malabar consists of many thousands who have dwelt there from time immemorial."

IN AFGHANISTAN.

2. That most warlike race, the Afghans, are also of undoubted Jewish extraction. Mr. Stocqueler intimates that "the Afghans assert that they are descended from the Jews, and often style themselves Ben-Israel, or children of Israel, though they consider the term Yahooder or Jew as one of reproach." It is certain that they have in many points a strong resemblance to the Jews, and there appears reason to believe that the tradition of their origin is not unfounded." They CLAIM THEIR DESCENT FROM KING SAUL, and so are Benjamites, if their tradition is correct. Not only their literature, but many of their root words are Hebraic; and even the name of their capital, Cabul, recalls the phrase used by King Hiram (1 Kings 9: 13), to indicate his opinion of the worthless cities presented to him by Solomon.

3. There is also another large colony of Jews which has been many centuries settled known in the Bible records as Ethiopia. They answer to the name of Falashas. The celebrated Hindoo missionary, Dr. Wilson, in his "Lecture on Foreign Churches," published in 1845, while speaking of the Abyssinian Christians, says "that they practice circumcision, abstinence from unclean animals, the observance of the last day (or Sabbath), in addition to the Lord's Day, the wearing of a ribbon of blue as a symbol of their faith, abstinence from the sinew that shrunk, and from blood, the practice of confession on the day of atonement—these customs have evidently a Jewish origin. I think it probable that the Jews in some numbers extended themselves from Egypt and Yemen to the country, before the Christian era." Many of their descendants, estimated by Dr. Wolff at two hundred thousand, are still in Abyssinia, known by the name of Falashas."

4. All Europeans who have penetrated into have found many persons who boast of their Abrahamic extraction. They are, however, not so congregated together as a nationality as in the case of Afghanistan, but are scattered here and there throughout that vast empire. But this fact might have been anticipated from prophecy, which almost invariably speaks of the events of the last days as if they were actually present events. This led Isaiah, when referring to the return of his kinsmen to the land of their inheritance, to say (Isa. 49: 11, 12), "I will make all my mountains a road, and my highways shall be exalted. Behold, these shall come from far: and, lo, these from the north and from the west; and these from the land of Sinim." The great Hebrew scholar, Gesenius, has given every proof that by "the land of Sinim" China is intended. How these Hebrews in China or the land of Sinim migrated there, so distant is China from Palestine, as well as so apparently inaccessible, is a question of much interest. Probably the enigma may be solved by the light conveyed by the cuneiform inscriptions of Assyria. For many Assyrian scholars, who are also versed in the Chinese language, indicate that so many root-words of the Chinese correspond with the inscriptions of the Babylonish cylinders, that of their Assyrian origin there can be no doubt. If so, we may infer that the Chinese Jews are remnants of their ancestors, who were carried away from Palestine as captives by Shalmanezar and Nebuchadnezzar.

5. There is a small colony of Hebrews, who, more than most Asiatic Jews, are faithful to their creed amid the prevailing Buddhism. An American Jewish magazine gave the following account of this interesting remnant in 1880 from the pen of one of their co-religionists who had visited them. He says that there passed through the streets of Cochín men fairer of countenance than are the inhabitants of India, and with strongly marked Jewish features. These men were known as the Jerusalem or white Jews. They occupy a quarter of the city by themselves. The part of the city which they occupy is called Jews' town, and the houses are all built alike. They number between thirty or forty families. Their synagogue is situated at the upper end of the street they occupy.

IN COCHIN CHINA

There are, in Cochín, black as well as white Jews. These black Jews occupy the lower part of Jews' town. Little is known of the early history of these Jews, but they have in their possession, engraved on copper, a grant or license from the sovereign of Malabar, bearing a date corresponding to A.D. 308.

6. Dispersed throughout the length and breadth of and probably in independent Hindostan, there are large numbers who call themselves Beni-Israel, or sons of Israel. They are fairer than the aborigines, and have the Jewish cast of countenance. They are proud of their descent, and in their dialects many Hebrew words have survived their long exile from their Fatherland. They know little or nothing of their history. But amid the scorn of Moslems and idolaters they cling tenaciously to their Abrahamic descent, and expect their recall when Messiah comes to reign as King of the Jews, and to subdue the Gentiles.

7. But the most remarkable discovery of scattered Israel, is that of the remnant found in the far east kingdom of MADAGASCAR.

The Rev. Henry W. Little, an eminent Malagasy missionary, in his recently published work, entitled "Madagascar: Its History and People," says that there is another tribe in the South, who are called Malagasy "Tanaka Ibrahim (sons of Abraham)." Many of their words are Hebrew Malagasy; and they also use some of the Hebrew letters in their writings, and retain many Jewish traditions among them to this day. The fact, however, that they have retained their name unchanged is perhaps the most remarkable; and that evidently points to an origin neither Polynesian nor African, but most probably Arabian or Abyssinian. The sprinkling of blood upon the door-posts and lintel of the houses, and, in some cases, suspending a root or bunch of grass dipped in blood over the entrance—an observance now almost discontinued—has also a striking resemblance to the Great Act of the Jewish Passover."

All these facts prove the possibility of the fulfilment of the predictions respecting the restoration of the Jews in the latter days, for they exist as a distinct race

IN ALL PARTS OF THE WORLD

—even at the very "ends of the earth." From the largeness of their numbers, they also show the truth of the pre-vision of Ezekiel 36: 10, 11: "I will multiply men upon you, all the house of Israel [or the Twelve Tribes]—even all of it—and the cities shall be inhabited, and the wastes shall be builded: and I will multiply upon you man and beast, and they shall increase and bear fruit; and I will settle you after your old estate, and will do better unto you than at the beginning."

It is in connection with this and analogous prophecies that the recent disinterment of so many of the lost Ten Tribes becomes so striking. Such discovery we cannot err in inferring is the initial step in their national resuscitation and subsequent conversion [see Zech. 12: 10, 14] after an exile of about two thousand years. Well then might the pen of prophecy speak of this far-off episode in the marvellous history of Israel, and say (Ezek. 36: 8), "Behold ye, oh mountains of Israel: ye shall shoot forth your branches, and yield your fruit to my people of Israel, for they are nigh to come."

per annum, payable in advance.

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

General Grant's Condition Last Week was one of marked improvement. The bulletins issued on Tuesday described him as better than he had been in two weeks. The morphine injections administered to relieve the pain and give him sleep were reduced, and he was able to take more nourishment. By frequent syringing the throat was kept clear of mucus, in order to prevent coughing, which is liable to bring on the hemorrhage again. On Wednesday the improvement was continued, and on Thursday the General felt so much better that of his own accord he joined the family at lunch and ate a little solid food for the first time in three weeks. On Friday his strength was so far increased that he wished to go for a drive, but it was not deemed prudent for him to leave the house. On Saturday there was a halt in his progress, but he was still described as holding his own. The family, though rejoicing in his improved condition, are not encouraged by the physicians to hope for his recovery. They are still firm in their conviction that the disease is a cancer, from which not one sufferer in a thousand recovers, when, as in this case, it attacks the throat, where a surgical operation is necessarily almost impossible.

The President has Issued a Proclamation annulling the order of President Arthur which admitted settlers to the Crow Creek Indian reservation. President Cleveland declares the order inoperative and void, because the Indians hold the lands in question by treaty. For that reason President Arthur had no lawful power to take them from the Indians and restore them to the public domain. Unhappily, hundreds of settlers were led by President Arthur's order to go upon these lands, who now must vacate their claims. It is stated that President Arthur's order was issued by the advice of Secretary Teller, who is now Senator from Colorado, without consultation with the Indian Committees of Congress, which disapproved of the order. The Indians have suffered so seriously in past times, notably at the hands of President Hayes and his Secretary, Mr. Schurz, that it is gratifying to notice the promise made in the proclamation issued last week that the new administration will "maintain inviolate the solemn pledges and plighted faith of the government" found in treaties negotiated with the Indians. It may be hoped, for the sake of the national honor, that this promise will be kept.

The Decision of the Court-Martial on General Hazen has been made public. It is not precisely the vindication that officer was represented as expecting. The court, it appears, found him guilty on several counts, and recommended that he be censured by the President. The sentence was approved by President Cleveland, who, in administering the reprimand as directed by the court, said: "To an officer of fine sensibilities, the mere fact of being brought to trial before a court-martial must be in itself a mortification and punishment. In the foregoing case the accused, whose high rank and long experience in the service should have inspired him with a full realization of that respect for constituted authority which is essential to military discipline, has been adjudged guilty of indulging in unwarranted and captious criticism of his superior officer, the Secretary of War, thereby setting a pernicious example, subversive of discipline and the interests of the service."

The accused has brought upon himself the condemnation of his brother officers who examined the charges against him, and seriously impaired his own honorable record of previous conduct. It is to be hoped that the lesson will not be forgotten. General Hazen will be released from arrest and assume the duties of his office." It must be remembered that the charge against Hazen was limited to his relations to Secretary Lincoln, and did not include his responsibility for the Cape Sabine horror.

An Investigation of Labor Problems suggested by Mr. Carroll D. Wright, Commissioner of Labor, and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, if intelligently conducted ought to lead to the acquisition of valuable information of practical benefit to workmen. It is proposed to investigate the question of industrial depressions, involving a study of their character, their causes, and whether they are contemporaneous in the great producing countries of the world, and whether, as to duration, severity, and periodicity, they are alike in such countries. Such an investigation would involve the question of the influence of depressions on the cost of living, the influence of taxes on all matters relating to living, and as to industrial depressions; how far corners may be influential in such matters; what industrial, commercial, and financial conditions have preceded such depressions, and whether large importations or exportations or extensive railroad building, etc., have preceded them. It may be hoped that the Labor Bureau will be able to secure information on these topics which will throw light on the difficulties of the intricate labor problem.

The White Cross Movement for Promoting purity of life among young men is taking firm hold in New York, and its beneficial influence seems likely to be permanent and extensive. Clergymen in other cities desiring to organize a similar movement should send to Dr. B. F. De Costa, 33 West Twenty-fifth Street, New York, for sample copies of the White Cross books, inclosing four cents for postage. They may be purchased in quantities at a low price from the publishers, Messrs. E. P. Dutton & Co.

The Anglo-Russian Crisis Assumed a Slightly more peaceful phase last week, though at the end of the week there was still cause for apprehension. Mr. Gladstone is plainly anxious to avoid war if possible, and though he is jeered at and denounced by the press and in Parliament, there is a strong feeling throughout England, especially among thoughtful religious men, that he is right and is deserving of honor. A serious difficulty in the way of opposing Russia is that for a British army to take the field against her it will be necessary to march through Afghanistan. The last time a British army was in that country it was as an invading force, and it is not by any means certain that the Afghans would understand the changed circumstances.

This time the British would go as the allies of the Afghans against the Russians, but they would be in a critical situation if, in the face of the enemy, the Afghans attacked them, which, as recent advices show, is a very probable contingency. Both England and Russia continue making extensive war preparations, and it is obvious that but for Mr. Gladstone's conciliatory, forbearing attitude, war would have been declared before now. Russia has acted treacherously and in defiance of treaty obligations and the assurances of her government made by diplomats to the British. Her advance is clearly a menace to British supremacy in India, which, if avoided, may be construed in a dangerous way by the natives. That is the danger which the British Government is chiefly concerned about. The explanations of the Russian Government of the battle of March 30th are awaited with anxiety.

Riots Broke Out in Cork on the Occasion of the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales on April 15th. They were directly instigated by the Nationalists. During the festivities in Dublin the Lord Mayor, who had been conspicuous by his rudeness to the royal visitors, was seen driving through the city. He was hissed by the Loyalists, who were rejoicing over the visit of the Prince and Princess. The mayor was exasperated and angrily declared he would complain to Mr. Parnell and notify the Nationalists in Mallow and Cork of the insult to himself. It is supposed that he did so, for on the royal party arriving at Mallow three of Mr. Parnell's friends, who are members of Parliament, were at the station with a gang of roughs and a brass band. The band played the Nationalist air, and the roughs hooted and hissed the Prince and his party. After the train had left the station there was a fight on the platform between the police and the mob. At Cork there was a repetition of the Mallow scenes. One man in the crowd threw an onion at the Princess, which struck a footman who interposed. Stones were thrown at the royal carriages, and at night there was a riot, in which windows were smashed and the flags and decorations put up in honor of the Prince's arrival were torn down and burned. The insult to the Princess has caused much ill feeling against the Nationalists. It is regarded as an act of rudeness without justification.

The Expenses of the Sudan War will be a heavy item in the expenditure of Great Britain for the year, and the newspapers are discussing the best way of raising the money. The Christian, referring to a proposal that an extra tax should be levied upon tea, asks: "Would it not be a more commendable plan in every way to levy an additional tax on wines, spirits, beer, etc.? Tea represents the chief beverage of thousands of industrious working people, while alcoholic drinks are simply luxuries, and too often destructive ones. It is an age of luxury and extravagance. In the midst of an expensive war, we yet read of theatrical representations put upon the stage at fabulous cost, while the dresses alone in one recent ephemeral piece cost $25,000! The evil does not stop here, for that world which gets its fashions and fashions from the stage attires its votaries in similitude of habit, and the result is often bankruptcy and ruin. The married daughter of a Christian merchant recently gave sixty guineas for a dinner-dress made in exact copy of one worn by a popular but second-rate actress! Well may the bitter cry ascend, and the Lord's missionaries go begging."

Bethshan Tracts.—The Following Tracts, by Mrs. M. Baxter and others, on the subject of Faith-Healing and Holiness, have been received from England, and can be obtained at the following prices: Bethshan: A House for Healing, 3 cts. each; Pastor Blumhardt, 3 cts. each; Paul's Thorn, If it be Thy Will, Does Sickness Sanctify? Repeating Prayer, What about the Use of Means, The Apostolic Attitude, all at 12 cts. a dozen; The Law of Liberty, Simple Truths about Faith, God's Purpose in Sickness, The Great Physician, Job's Sickness, God's Side of Prayer, Pastor Rein, Redeemed from all Evil, Health by Grace, all at 20 cts. a dozen. Also the following books by Mrs. M. Baxter: S. S. Lessons, 1877-78, in cloth, 50 cts. each; Lessons from the Gospel of Matthew, 50 cts. cloth, 30 cts. paper; Daily Life, 30 cts. cloth, 20 cts. paper; Life Lessons, 25 cts. paper, 35 cts. cloth; Practical Lessons, 25 cts. cloth. Address: The Manager, CHRISTIAN HERALD OFFICE, 63 Bible House, New York.

In a Letter Recently Received from Virginia, the writer says: "We are truly grateful to the kind friends who sent us THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last year; we lent it around, and it was a blessing to many as well as to ourselves. I hoped that we should have been able to pay for it ourselves this year, but it is not to be. I am scarcely able to find bread for our little ones; so, unless it comes to us free, as it did last year, the dear little paper must stop." A great many poor people will miss it sadly. Many letters of similar purport are coming to hand which it is sad to read. We are very thankful to acknowledge receipt of $52 for this fund from various friends since the subject was mentioned three weeks ago. Fifty-two colored ministers will receive the paper for a year through their kindness. As in several cases the donors request that their names may not be published, we mention only the places and amounts: Seaward, Me., $4; Des Moines, Iowa, $10; Riverside, Iowa, $40; Washington, Pa., $1; Latimore, Pa., $10; Brooklyn, N. Y., $1; Batesville, Va., $1; Bronxville, N. Y., $2; Oswego Falls, N. Y., $5; Lockport, N. Y., $3.

The Revised Version of the Old Testament will be issued on May 21st. The original editions have been printed in England and will be imported for sale here. A cable dispatch states that several American publishers have made efforts to forestall the issue in England by attempting to secure advance proofs. American book-publishers have offered as high as $500 for single advance prints. It is not believed that any of these have succeeded in getting what they have sought. Their efforts becoming known have caused those having the work under control to adopt the strictest precautions to prevent advance publications. Investigation shows that the recent reports to the effect that the committee of revisers have found reason to believe their work will prove a popular failure have been entirely without foundation. The orders for the revised Old Testament already exceed those secured before publication for the revised edition of the New Testament.

Attendance at Morning Prayers is to Remain compulsory on the students at Harvard. On April 16th a committee of college overseers considered a petition presented by some of the undergraduates asking that attendance at morning prayers be made voluntary with students over the age of twenty-one years, and optional with the parents or guardians of others, and presented an adverse report. The committee recommends the continuance of the service under the present arrangement, on the following grounds: First, and least of all, is the reason that the college can ill afford the loss of reputation which would ensue on its being the first of all the literary institutions in New England to abandon religious observances. In the next place, there is an intrinsic fitness in devotional services in educational institutions. Next, the daily religious service is to a large extent a means of moral and religious benefit to the students. For all the students this daily service is a reminder of spiritual relations and of a higher than this earthly life. It is a matter for regret that the undergraduates desired to be "relieved" of attendance.

Gospel Work Among the Chinese is Making progress in New York. At a public meeting held in Dr. John Hall's church recently it was stated that there are now eighteen schools in New York and ten in Brooklyn, with an average attendance of seven hundred out of a total population of four thousand or five thousand. The speaker dwelt to some extent on the characteristics of the pupils, and spoke at length of their persistency to accomplish a desired end. In their converse with one another, it was stated they were kind and gentle. It is proposed to secure the Chinamen a club-house, with accommodations for social gatherings, reading, and study, where they may spend their spare hours. At the same meeting, Nam Sio Yang, the son of the Chinese Consul, read a chapter of the Bible in English with only a slight accent. A prayer was offered by Saum Song Bo, in which he asked God's blessing on "these great United States of America," and prayed that her rulers might "receive to their shores all nations of the earth, as their forefathers have done," blotting out the present exception in the case of the Chinese.

Hospitality to a Tramp was Rewarded in an unexpected way in North Carolina recently. Two ladies who live alone in a house near Wadesboro, N. C., were asked by a stalwart Irish tramp one cold night last month to give him shelter for the night. They were somewhat timid at acceding to his request, but eventually pity for the man's tired and poverty-stricken appearance partly overcame their fear, and they agreed that he might sleep in a large closet if he would consent to being locked in. The tramp was willing and was duly installed and the key turned upon him. The ladies retired to rest, but shortly after midnight they were waked by a negro who had come into the room. He demanded money and threatened to kill them if they made an outcry—one of the ladies was ordered by the negro to get the money and valuables for him. She went to the closet and unlocked the door, when the tramp, who had heard the whole conversation, sprang out and grappled with the burglar, who tried to escape. A desperate fight ensued, in which the negro was killed by the tramp. The ladies were extremely grateful; they were doubtless saved from robbery and violence by their obedience to the apostolic injunction (Heb. 13: 2).

A Campaign against Insects has been Conducted during the past few weeks in New York City by Mr. E. B. Southwick, the public entomologist. In his report of his work in protecting the trees in the parks from destructive insects, he states that he has found seven hundred and twenty-four distinct species on the trees, shrubs and plants. They include the cotton worm of the South, the wood borers of the West, the sugar-cane beetle, many species unknown to Mr. Southwick, and some entirely new species. The most destructive insects to the trees are the bag worm, the tent and web caterpillars, the scale insect, the coccus and the elm beetle. Of these insects nearly seven bushels of cocoons and eggs were removed from the Central, Washington Square, Battery, City Hall, Riverside, and Tompkins Square Parks alone. In the City Hall Park, as well as elsewhere, it was found that many trees were being destroyed by the scale insects, and in Washington Square the trees were found literally covered with larvæ. Mr. Southwick works on the right principle in removing the cocoons and the eggs before the mischief is done. Perhaps some day the authorities will adopt it. At present the main reliance of the State in the work of preserving society is on the police and the prisons (Cant. 2: 15).

A Perilous Ride on a Raft was Undertaken on April 16th by two citizens of Steuben County, N. Y. They were standing on the banks of Tuscarora Creek, at Woodhull, looking at the water which was rushing by in a torrent, when one of them challenged the other to make a voyage with him on a raft as far as Addison, fourteen miles away. The stream for that distance generally has a wild and rapid flow, but in time of flood it becomes a torrent, flowing between high, rocky banks and bordered by overhanging trees whose branches extend directly above the channel. The creek has a fall of four hundred feet in the fourteen miles, and no attempt had ever before been made to navigate it. But the challenge was accepted, and the two gentlemen at once set to work to construct the raft. A large number of their friends assembled to see them start, some on horses, intending to ride along the banks and watch the dangerous experiment. That, however, was impossible, for the raft shot by them like an arrow and was soon out of sight. It came into collision with several rocks, one of which stove it badly, but the men clung to it over a distance of six miles, but they went no further. A fallen tree lay across the stream which they were unable to avoid. The raft struck the tree with terrific force and then passed right under it. If the men had not rolled off they would have been crushed between the raft and the fallen tree. They were able to grasp some overhanging branches, by which they climbed into a tree, and late at night they were rescued with ropes, half dead with shocks and bruises. As they had no steering gear, and were, therefore, at the mercy of the rapids, it is surprising that they escaped with their lives. It was a hazardous enterprise, but not half so foolhardy as that thousands of young men are starting upon, who are beginning the voyage of life without committing themselves to God's guidance, which alone is able to avert disaster (Prov. 3: 21-26).

A Land of Fabulous Wealth is the Description given of the Territory of Wyoming by ex-Governor Hoyt, who lectured on the subject before the Geographical Society in New York, on April 11th. "It equals in area," he said, "the States of New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania together, and is half again larger than all New England." He gave a glowing account of its resources. In the course of the catalogue he mentioned the following items: "The larger portion of the 100,000 square miles it contains is a perfect garden, supporting at present over 1,500,000 head of cattle. In the mountains are gold, silver, tin and immense deposits of copper. There are two iron mountains, the one red hematite and the other magnetic ore, the smaller of which is 1000 feet high, and contains 1,300,000,000 tons of iron. Immediately below this are immense fields of lignite, a species of bituminous coal large enough to supply the world. There are also large soda lakes, one of which alone contains 4,000,000,000 tons of soda, which is worth $50 a ton. Then there are untold miles of petroleum fields, which contain 1,000,000,000 barrels to the square mile!" The Governor's statement seems to open up the prospect of boundless wealth to those who go to the Territory with capital and labor to develop its resources. If he also promised health, happiness and long life, and the people had faith in him, Wyoming itself would not hold the settlers who would flock thither. The title to a home there would not be spurned so often as is the offer of a far better one to which God invites men (Rev. 7: 16, 17).

A Discovery Affecting Railroad Companies has been made by the State geologist of Indiana. Some years ago his attention was directed to the fracture of certain iron bars and bolts in a bridge which were known to have been of the best quality when put into the structure. He was intent on finding the cause of the break, and commenced a series of experiments which have now satisfied his mind. He states that he has proved that the best of iron, when subjected to continuous vibration, would undergo changes in its structure which would, after a time, render its use dangerous, and that these structural changes were the explanation of many otherwise inexplicable accidents, particularly to railway bridges. Several car-axes which he tested were crystallized two thirds of their length by vibration. For another experiment he took from the Wabash dam at Delphi a number of bolts and spikes, which were, when the dam was constructed, of the best quality of malleable bar iron. Of these bolts and spikes he found that seventy per cent of the whole number were as weak as cast iron, while ninety per cent of those which were near the bottom of the dam were worthless; yet of those which were rotten the tips, which were inserted in immovable rocks, were fibrous and strong. The discovery is important and will doubtless lead to a more frequent examination of iron that is subject to continuous vibration. But iron inserted in the solid rock may be trusted to retain its strength. It is so with Christian character. The man whose soul is united with God through Christ is like the iron in the rock, strong to the last (Ps. 62: 2-7).

THE BLIND MAN'S EYES OPENED.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Jesus answered, Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents: but that the works of God should be made manifest in him. I must work the works of Him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work."—JOHN 9: 3, 4.

Christ's Wonderful Composure—Not Elated by Praise—His Heart Set on his Work—I. The Worker—Did not Ignore Sorrow—Does not Upbraid the Sufferer—The Dismal Science—How Christ Receives Wanderers—II. The Work-Room—Room for Jesus—Opportunity for Mercy Work—III. The Work-Bell—IV. The Work-Day—No Postscript to Life.

OBSERVE, dear friends, how little disconcerted our Lord Jesus Christ was by the most violent opposition of His enemies. The Jews took up stones to stone Him, and He hid Himself from them; but almost the moment after, when He had passed, perhaps, through a single court, and was sufficiently out of range to be unobserved of them, He stood still and fixed His eyes upon a blind beggar who had been sitting near the temple gate. I am afraid that the most of us would have had no heart to help even the most needy while ourselves escaping from a shower of stones; and if we had attempted the work, moved by supreme compassion, we should have gone about it blunderingly, in a great hurry, and certainly should not have talked calmly and wisely, as the Saviour did when He answered His disciples' question, and went on to discourse with them.

One reason, I take it, for His being so self-contained was that He was never elated by the praise of men. Take my word for it, for I know it, that if you ever allow yourself to be pleased by those who speak well of you, to that extent you will be capable of being grieved by those who speak ill of you. But if you have learned (and it is a long lesson for the most of us) that you are not the servant of men, but of God, and that therefore you will not live upon the breath of men's nostrils if they praise you, and you will not die if they denounce you—then you will be strong, and show that you have come to the stature of a man in Christ Jesus.

There was perhaps another reason for our Saviour's wonderful composure when He was attacked with stones—namely, that His heart was so that He could not be turned away from it whatever the unbelieving Jews might do. The ruling passion bore Him on through danger and suffering, and made Him calmly defy all opposition. He had come into the world to bless men, and He must bless men. The Jews might oppose Him for this reason and for that, but they could not turn the current of His soul from the riverbed of mercy along which it rushed like a torrent.

Let that stand for an introduction. The Saviour in His worst and lowest estate, when near to death, thinks of nothing but the good of men. When cruel eyes are spying Him out that they may slay Him He has an eye for the poor blind; there is no stone in His heart toward the sorrowful even when stones are flying past His ears.

I. So I introduce you to-night to the first topic of the present discourse, which is

THE WORKER.

I give that as a well-earned title to the Lord Jesus Christ. There are many in this world who ignore sorrow, who pass by grief, who are deaf to lamentation and blind to distress. "Where ignorance is bliss it is folly to be wise," so said some easy-going ignoramus of old time. If beggars are importunate, then passers-by must be deaf. If sinners are profane, it is a simple matter to stop your ears, and hurry on. If this blind man must needs sit and beg at the gate of the temple, then those who frequent the temple must slip by as if they were as blind as he. Crowds pass by and take no notice of him. Is not that the way with the multitude to-day? If you are in trouble—if you are suffering heartbreak, do they not ignore you, and go their way to their farm and to their merchandise, though you lie down and starve? Dives finds it convenient to remain ignorant of the sores of Lazarus. It is not so with Jesus. He has a quick eye to see the blind beggar if He sees nothing else.

There are others who, though they see misery do not diminish it by warm sympathy, but increase it by their cold logical conclusions. "Poverty," they say—"yes; well, that of course is brought on by drunkenness and by laziness and by all sorts of vice." I do not say that it is not so in many case; but I do say that the observation will not help a poor man to become either better or happier; such a hard remark will rather exasperate the hardened than assist the struggling. "Sickness," say some—"oh, no doubt, a great deal of sickness is caused by wicked habits, neglect of sanitary laws," and so on. This also may be sadly true, but it grates on a sufferer's ear. A very kind and pleasing doctrine to teach in the wards of our hospitals! I would recommend you not to teach it till you are ill yourself, and then perhaps the doctrine may not seem quite so instructive.

Even Christ's disciples, when they saw this blind man, thought that there must be something particularly wicked about his father and mother, or something specially vicious about the man himself, which God foresaw, and on account of which He punished him with blindness.

A CRUEL DOCTRINE,

a vile doctrine, fit for savages, but not to be mentioned by Christians, who know that whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and even His best beloved have been taken away on a sudden. Yet I do see a good deal of this cruel notion about, and if men are in trouble, I hear it muttered, "Well, of course they brought it on themselves." Is this your way of cheering them? Cheap moral observations steeped in vinegar make a poor dish for an invalid. Such censures are a sorry way of helping a lame dog over a stile—nay, it is putting up another stile for him so that he cannot get over it at all. Now I mark this of my Lord—that it is written of Him that He "giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not."

It is beautiful to me to see how the Master breaks up the fine speculation which the disciples are setting forth. He says somewhat shortly, "Neither hath this man sinned, nor His parents," and then He spits on the ground, and makes clay, and opens the blind man's eyes. This was work, the other was mere worry. "Father," said a boy, "the cows are in the corn. How ever did they get in?" "Boy," said the father, "never mind how they got in, let us hurry up and get them out." There is common sense about that practical proceeding. Here are these people sunken in vice, and steeped in poverty. Postpone the inquiries—How did they get into this condition? What is the origin of moral evil? How is it transmitted from parent to child? Answer those questions after the day of judgment, when you will have more light; but just now the great thing is to see how you and I can get evil out of the world, and how we can lift up the fallen and restore those who have gone astray.

I say that the Master was no speculator; He was no spinner of theories; He was no mere doctrinalist; but He went to work and healed those that had need of healing. Now, in this, He is the great example for us all in this year of grace. "I heard the other day," says one, "a very favorable and interesting lecture upon and I felt that it was a very weighty science, and accounted for much of the poverty you mention." Perhaps so; but political economy in itself is about as hard as brass; it has no bowels, or heart, or conscience, neither can it make allowance for such things. The political economist is a man of iron, who would be rusted by a tear, and therefore never tolerates the mood of compassion. His science is a rock which will wreck a navy, and remain unmoved by the cries of drowning men and women. It is as the simoom of the desert which withers all it blows upon. It seems to dry up men's souls when they get to be masters of it, or rather are mastered by it. It is a science of stubborn facts, which would not be facts if we were not so brutish. Political economy or no political economy, I come back to my point—What have you done for others? Do let us think of that, and if any of us have been dreaming day after day what we would do "if," let us see what we can do now, and, like the Saviour, get to work.

Yet that is not the point which I am driving at. It is this. If Jes' be such a worker, and no theorizer, then what a hope there is to-night for some of us who need His care! Have we fallen? Are we poor? Have we brought ourselves into sorrow and misery? Do not let us look to men or to ourselves. Men will let us starve, and then they will hold a coroner's inquest over our body to find why we dared to die, and so necessitated the paying for a grave and a coffin. They will be sure to make an inquiry after it is all over with us; but if we come to Jesus Christ, but receive us and give rest unto our souls. That is a blessed text, "He giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not."

HE WILL MAKE NO INQUIRY,

Is there a street-walker here? Come, poor woman, as you are, to your dear Lord and Master, who will cleanse you of your grievous sin. "All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven." Is there one here who has transgressed against the rules of society, and is pointed at as especially sinful? Yet, come, and welcome, to the Lord Jesus of whom it is written, "This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them." The physician never thinks it scorn to go among the sick; and Christ never felt it shame that He looks after the guilty and the lost. Nay, write this about His diadem—"The Saviour of sinners, even of the very chief;" He counts this His glory. So much concerning the worker.

II. Now, the second thing is

THE WORK-ROOM.

Every worker needs a place to work in. Every artist must have a studio. Did Christ have a studio? Yes, He came to do very wonderful works—the works of Him that sent Him; but what a strange, strange place, the Lord found to do His work in! and yet I do not know that He could have found any other. He resolved to work the works of God, and He selected the fittest place for so doing. In the blind beggar of the temple to produce that which was lacking in the cur'us mechanism of the eye; the blind eye was, therefore, His workshop. If there were eyeballs, they were completely sightless, and had been so from the man's birth; and this gave the occasion for Jehovah Jesus to say, "Let there be light!" That is a blessed thought if you will think it over! Apply it to yourself. If there is anything wanting in you there is room for Christ to work in you. If you are naturally perfect, and there is no fault in you, then there is no room for the Saviour to do anything for you; for He will not gild refined gold, nor lay enamel on the lily. But if you suffer from some great deficiency, some awful lack that makes your soul sit in darkness, your necessity is Christ's opportunity, your need of grace supplies His need of objects for His pity. Here is room for the Saviour to come and display His pity toward you, and you may be sure He will soon be with you. Even so, come, Lord Jesus.

THERE WAS ROOM FOR JESUS

Then, again, it was not only this man's deficiency of sight, but it was this man's ignorance which required Almighty aid. It is a work of God not only to create, but to illuminate. The same power which calls into existence also calls into light, whether that light be natural or spiritual. It is a divine work to enlighten and regenerate the heart. This man was as dark in mind as he was in body—what a grand thing to enlighten him in a double sense!

I may venture to say to-night that all affliction may be regarded in the same manner as affording of God. Whenever you see a man in sorrow and trouble, the way to look at it is, not to blame him and inquire how he came there, but to say, "Here is an opening for God's almighty love. Here is an occasion for the display of the grace and goodness of the Lord." This man being blind gave the Lord Jesus opportunity for the good work of giving him his sight, and that work was so great a wonder that all around were obliged to remark it and admire it. The neighbors began to inquire about it; the Pharisees had to hold a conclave over it; and though nearly nineteen centuries have slipped away, here are we at this hour meditating upon it. That man's opened eyes are enlightening our eyes at this hour.

I leave that thought of the workshop when I have added that I do believe that sin itself has somewhat of the same aspect as affliction, for it makes room for the mercy of God. I hardly dare say what Augustine said: when speaking of the fall and of the sin of Adam, and looking to all the splendor of grace that followed after it, he said "Beata culpa"—happy fault—as if he thought that sin had furnished such opportunities for the unveiling of the grace of God, and so displayed the character of Christ, that He even dared to call it a happy fault. I will not venture upon such an expression, I scarcely dare do more than repeat what that great master in Israel once said; but I do say, that I cannot imagine an occasion for glorifying God equal to the fact that man has sinned, since God has given Christ to die for sinners.

III. You will bear with me now if I pass on, in the third place, briefly to notice

THE WORK-BELL.

You hear early in the morning a bell which arouses the workers from their beds. See how they troop into the streets, swarming like bees hastening to or from the hive. You see them going forth to labor, for the bell is ringing. There was a work-bell for Christ, and He heard it. Then He said, "I must work; I must work; I must work." What made him say that? Why, the sight of that blind man. He no sooner saw him than he said, "I must work." The man had not asked anything, nor uttered a sound; but those sightless orbs spake eloquently to the heart of the Lord Jesus, and rang aloud the summons which Jesus heard and obeyed, for He Himself said, "I must work."

And why must He work? Why, He had come all the way from heaven on purpose to do so. He had come from His Father's throne to be a man on purpose to bless men, and He would not cause His long descent to go for nothing. He must work; why else was He here where work was to be done?

Besides, there were impulses in His heart which we need not stop now to explain, which forced Him to work. His mind, His soul, His heart, were all full of a force which produced perpetual activity. Sometimes He selected a route when He was travelling because "He must needs go through Samaria." Sometimes He went after men because He said, "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold: them also I must bring." There was a sort of instinct in Christ to save men, and that instinct craved gratification, and could not be denied.

Now learn this lesson, all ye followers of Christ. Whenever you see suffering, I hope you will each one feel "I must work, I must help." Whenever you witness poverty, whenever you behold vice, say to yourself, "I must work, I must work." If you are worthy of the Christ whom you call leader, let all the necessities of men impel you, compel you, constrain you to be blessing them. Let the world which lieth in the wicked one arouse you; let the cries of men of Macedonia awaken you, as they say "Come over and help us!" Men are dying, dying in the dark. The cemetery is filling, and hell is filling too. Men are dying without hope; and are passing into the eternal night. "I must work."

Well, that is a grand lesson; but I do not mean it to be the chief one, for I am looking out for those who long to find mercy and salvation. What a blessing it is for you, dear friend, if you want to be saved, that

CHRIST MUST SAVE!

There is an impulse upon Him that He must save. I know you say, "I cannot pray. I cannot feel as I wish to do." Never mind about that; the matter is in abler hands. You see, this man did not say a word; the sight of Him was enough to move the heart of the Lord Jesus. As soon as Jesus had seen him He said, "I must work." To-night, when you reach home, kneel at your bedside, and say, "Lord Jesus, I cannot pray; but here I am. I am perishing, and I put myself within sight of Thee. I tell you, the bell will ring, and the great worker will feel that the time has come for Him to labor; He will say in the words of my text, "I must work," and in you the works of God shall be made manifest. You shall be the workshop of Christ.

IV. One more head, and that is

THE WORK-DAY.

Our divine Master said, "I must work the works of Him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work." Now, listen. This is not meant about Christ the risen Saviour, but this refers to the Lord Jesus Christ as He was a man here on earth. There was a certain day in which He could bless men, and when that day was over He would be gone; there would be no Jesus Christ on earth to open blind men's eyes, or to heal the sick; He would be gone from among men, and be no more approachable as the healer of bodily disease. Brothers, some of us have had thirty years of work, but we have done very little, I am afraid; and what if we have only three years more? Let us feel the impulses of the coming eternity! Within a little while I shall no more look into the faces of the throng, they will remember me but as a name; therefore, I will preach as best I can while my powers remain, and my life is prolonged. Within a little while, my brother, you will not be able to go from door to door winning souls; the street will miss you and your tracts; the district will miss you and your regular visits. Do your work well, for your sun will set.

If you and I shall omit any part of our life-work, we can never make up the omission. When we have written a letter we add a postscript; when we have made a book we can write an appendix or insert something that we have left out. But to this life of yours and mine there can be

NO POSTSCRIPT.

We must do our work now or never; and, if we do not now, even now, while our opportunity serves us, perform our service to our God, we can never do it. If you omitted anything yesterday, you cannot alter the fact of imperfect service on that day. If you are more zealous now it will be the work of to-day; but yesterday will still remain as incomplete as you left it. We must therefore be on the alert to do the work of Him that sent us while it is called to-day.

To this conclusion I come, and here draw to a close—if our Lord Jesus Christ was so diligent to bless men when He was here, I feel certain that He is not less diligent to hear and heal them now in that spiritual sense in which He still works upon men. Oh, come to Him—come even now. "I do not know what it is to come," says one. Well, to come to Christ is simply to trust Him. You are guilty; trust Him to pardon you. "If I do that," says one, "may I then live as I did before?" No, that you cannot, for if a ship needed to be brought into harbor, and they took a pilot on board, he would say to the captain, "Captain, if you trust me, I will get you into harbor all right. There, let that sail be taken down." And they do not reef it. "Come," says he, "attend to the tiller, and steer as I bid you." But they refuse. "Well," says the pilot, "you said you trusted me." "Yes," says the captain, "and you said that if we trusted you, you would get us into port; but we have not got into port at all." "No," says the pilot, "you do not trust me, for if you trusted me you would do as I bid you." A true trust is obedient to the Lord's commands, and these forbid sin. If you trust Jesus, you must leave your sins, and take up your cross and follow Him. Such trust shall surely have its reward; you shall be saved now and saved forever. God bless you, dear friends, for Christ's sake.

NEW BOOKS.

RAYS OF LIGHT,

a daily text-book for divine guidance, is an exquisitely illustrated little book of texts for morning and evening reading. The texts are compiled by E. Keary, and the illustrations are designed by W. H. L. Thompson. Each page has one text surrounded by a colored picture beautifully executed. There are sixty-two of these—one for every morning and evening in the month. The hope of the compiler is that the texts "may be messengers bringing joy and help to the reader through busy days, and suggesting peaceful thoughts for the hours of rest."

The diminutive pages (they measure only three inches by three and a quarter) are a marvel of tasteful design, with their delicately colored flowers and grasses and their tiny vignettes of sea and landscape. A companion volume of the same size, also with morning and evening texts for a month by the same compiler and designer, is also issued under the title of "A Casket of Pearls." As a present to a Christian lady in her teens either volume is very suitable. Its elegance would render it acceptable, and if the texts were taken as mottoes for the day, many a life would be purer and brighter. The price of either volume, in cloth, is 35 cents; French morocco, 75 cents; calf, 81. Published by Frederick Warne & Co.

THE RUSSIANS AT THE GATES OF HERAT,

by Charles Marvin, is a work that will be read with intense interest at the present time when the cable is occupied with rumors of an impending conflict between England and Russia. How it is that Russia comes to be at the gates of Herat, and why England is so exasperated by her approach, is fully explained in this volume. Mr. Marvin possesses peculiar qualifications for writing a narrative as impartial as any Englishman can give it. He is intimately acquainted with Russia, her people and her political life, having spent many years in that country. Knowing well her gigantic resources and her weakness, her ambition and her insatiable earth-hunger, he understands better than most Englishmen the danger of her advance and what is its ultimate design. The plan of the work is partly historical and partly descriptive, principally the former. Commencing with the first step taken by Russia on this line, toward India, which was the descent upon Keshnovodsk in 1866, after the abandonment of the other line of advance by way of Cabul, he describes the operations for the capture of Merv. They were completed last year and then for the first time England became really alarmed. From that time Mr. Marvin's narrative of events is minute, and shows how Russia has shrewdly, stealthily, but persistently pressed forward to the gates of Herat where she now is, and is waiting to see whether she can proceed farther without provoking England to war. The remaining chapters are devoted to the question of the boundaries, the strategical value of Herat, the plans of Skobelev for the invasion of India, and the probable future of the struggle. The book contains two maps and several portraits, among which are those of Kamaroff, who fought the battle of March 30th, Sir Peter Lumsden who is representing Great Britain in Afghanistan, and General Roberts, who, if war is declared will have command of the British forces. Pp. 185. Paper covers, 50 cents. Published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

TEACHING OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES, edited, with a translation, introduction, and notes, by Professors Roswell D. Hitchcock and Francis Brown. Our readers are already acquainted with the circumstances under which this ancient manuscript was found by Bishop Bryennios. A year has passed since the American translation was first published, and during that time the learned have had an opportunity to consider the question whether it is genuine or not. Of course there is a difference of opinion, but the weight of authority is in favor of its acceptance. The two editors have now issued a new edition of the Teaching, in Greek and English, prefixing to it a general summary of the opinions advanced by scholars for and against it, and a statement of the reasons on which they base their conviction that it is a genuine and true document, disclosing the belief of the early church on various matters of doctrine and practice. Price, $2. Published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

TALKS WITH YOUNG MEN,

by J. Thain Davidson, D.D. Young men will appreciate this book. The author lays aside the sermonic style, and talks with his readers in a shrewd, common-sense, practical manner of the difficulties and temptations of every-day life. The volume contains, in fact, a series of actual talks or lectures to young men, and the colloquial style is preserved. It is impossible to read the advice here given without feeling that one is in council with a man who has a vivid recollection of his young days, and desires to use his own experience for the benefit of others. Dr. Davidson knows what are the temptations that especially beset young men, and in a kindly, friendly way he shows them that those who yield must suffer, and, in fact, that sin is folly. His talks are often humorous, though his readers always see that he is in earnest, even when they must smile at his quaint observations. The chapters entitled An Artisan, yet a Gentleman; Putting away Childish Things; Master over One's Self; and The Way to Get on in the World should be read by every young man who desires to make the best of his life. Pp. 286. Price, $2.25. Published by Messrs. A. C. Armstrong & Son, New York.

AN INFIDEL BLACKSMITH OVERCOME.

THE story has often been repeated which was first told in a Christian meeting by a converted blacksmith, who explained how he was led to Christ. Before his conversion Rogers was a noted blasphemer, and his powers of argument often gave him the victory over Christian people, whose religion was of the heart, not of the head. It is not difficult, as we have seen recently in New York and Brooklyn, for a man of strong, incisive wit to turn the Bible into ridicule.

Rogers would argue with any one, and as it is far easier to attack than to defend, he generally succeeded in holding his ground. Many Christian men had been puzzled by his arguments, and had been driven to seek light in prayer. Rogers, at last, believed himself to be impregnable.

A good elder, who had listened to one of these debates—if he had not himself taken part in it—was much moved about this atheistical blacksmith, and, as was usual with him, he carried his trouble to his closet. Through the long hours of the night he wrestled for that man's soul. The morning dawned, and the elder looked out. It had been snowing fast, and the ground was thickly covered. It did not matter; he must make one more effort for the blacksmith's salvation. Mounting his pony, he rode through the snow over the two miles between his house and the blacksmith's shop. He did not know what he should say, and had not decided when he arrived. But he dismounted and entered. Seizing the blacksmith's hand, his eyes wet with tears, he said, "I am deeply concerned for your salvation." Tears choked his utterance, and he turned, mounted his horse, and without saying another audible word, rode sorrowfully homeward.

"That," said the blacksmith, when he told the story, "was an argument I could not answer." The spectacle of a good man anxious about his soul, while he himself was careless, affected him so no argument had done, and the Holy Spirit used it to his salvation.

THE LATE EARL CAIRNS.

THE cable on April 3d announced the sudden death, at his residence, in England, of Hugh McCalmont, Earl Cairns, the ex-Lord Chancellor. He was the son of a private Irish gentleman, the late William Cairns, of Cultra, County Down, and was born on December 6th, 1817. He received his education at Trinity College, Dublin, and was graduated with high honors. He chose the law as his profession, and in January, 1844, he became a member of the English Bar. His learning, logical powers, and rhetorical abilities soon won him a position of eminence. As the way to the highest prizes of the profession lies through politics, the young Irish barrister got himself elected to Parliament by the town of Belfast in Ireland, in 1852.

He took his seat among the Conservatives, and was able to render important service to that party in several debates. The Liberals were then in power, but in 1858 they were defeated, and the late Lord Derby became Prime Minister, and offered the office of Solicitor-General to Mr. Cairns, who was then made Sir Hugh Cairns. In a year and a half Lord Derby and his cabinet resigned, so the first term of official life enjoyed by the Irish barrister was brief. He still continued to practise law, and retained his seat in Parliament. In 1866 the Conservatives were again in power, and this time Sir Hugh Cairns received a higher office than before, being made Attorney-General. Three months afterward a high judicial appointment fell vacant, and Sir Hugh Cairns finally left the House of Commons to take his seat on the Bench. The Premier died in 1868, and Mr. Disraeli succeeded him. He recollected the valuable services rendered him in the House of Commons by Sir Hugh Cairns, and desiring to strengthen his party in the House of Lords, he removed him from the Bench and gave him the office of Lord High Chancellor, which includes the duty of presiding in the House of Lords. Sir Hugh Cairns then became a Peer of the realm by the title of Baron Cairns. He held the post until the resignation of Disraeli's Ministry, in 1868. After that, however, he continued to take part actively in the legislative and judicial business of the House of Lords. When the Conservative party once more returned to power in February, 1874, he was again appointed Lord High Chancellor. In September, 1878, he was created an Earl of the United Kingdom, with the title of Earl Cairns.

In 1880 he went out of office with his party, but, as before, continued to speak and vote in the House of Lords. He was a deeply religious man and actively sympathized in Christian work. He was frequently seen at the Moody and Sankey meetings, and was one of the most earnest and indefatigable supporters of the American Evangelists had.

The title and estates of Earl Cairns and his seat in the House of Lords are inherited by his eldest son, Viscount Garmoyne, who was in New York when his father died. If our readers wish to realize the absurdity of the English constitution, they should consider this particular case. A better man for the responsible duty of legislating for the realm than the late Earl Cairns could not have been found under any system. He was an eminently pious, conscientious man, an able jurist, and a wise statesman. Such men are needed in the House of Lords, which answers to the Senate in our constitution. But he dies, and his place is to be filled. It is not to be filled by a man selected on account of his possessing the brilliant qualities which distinguished the late Earl, but by his eldest son, in spite of the scriptural warning (Eccles. 2:18, 19). This successor to the distinguished statesman, is that Lord Garmoyne who engaged himself to Miss Fortescue, the actress, and was liberated from his engagement by his father paying her fifty thousand dollars. The half imbecile nincompoop has now the right to assist in guiding the destinies of the nation. Happily for suitors a judge is not succeeded by his son; but it is strange that a constitution which puts a son into his father's place in the Legislature does not also put a son into his father's place on the Bench.

THE KING'S TRUMPETER.

The picture of the King's Trumpeter appearing here is one of the plates which embellish Barnard's edition of Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," published by Messrs. Anson D. F. Randolph & Co., of New York, a handsomely bound quarto book of two hundred and seventy-seven pages, which measure eleven inches by eight and one quarter inches. The book contains one hundred illustrations, and is printed on heavy toned paper, with gilt edges. Price, $4; by mail, $4.25. This picture of the King's Trumpeter is reduced in size; in the book it is larger than here. It will be seen that the artist, Mr. J. D. Linton, has carefully followed, in the matter of costume, the period in which Bunyan wrote. The renowned dreamer, it will be remembered, fought in Cromwell's army for the deliverance of his country from the yoke of the despicable Stuarts. That was a period of which many pictures survive, chiefly portraits, so that there has been no difficulty in finding out how people dressed in those times. There is no doubt that when Bunyan wrote about the King's Trumpeter the image he had in his mind was just that the artist has here drawn, just such a man as Bunyan might have seen any day at the gates of King Charles' palace.

The duties to which the King's Trumpeter was assigned by Bunyan were of a different kind from those the miserable Stuarts' trumpeters had to perform. In Bunyan's allegory the trumpeter's notes of joy were heard when a penitent sinner was seen seeking Christ, a sight which Charles and his trumpeters would have seen without emotion, unless it was that of contempt.

Bunyan describes how Christiana and her children and her friend Mercy approached the wicket gate, and were affrighted because Christiana's rap set certain dogs within barking at them, from which we learn that the seeking penitents of Bunyan's time were in danger of being driven back into the world by causes with which we are still unhappily familiar. But Christiana continued to knock until the keeper of the gate said, "Who is there?" when "the dog left off to bark, and he opened unto them." Then Christiana told who she was and whence she came, and begged that she and her children might be "graciously admitted by this gate into the way that leads to the Celestial City. With that the keeper of the gate did marvel, saying, 'What, is she now become a pilgrim, that, but a while ago, abhorred that life?' Then she bowed her head, and said, 'Yes; and so are these, my sweet babes, also.' Then he took her by the hand, and let her in, and said also, 'Suffer the little children to come unto me;' and with that he shut up the gate. This done, he called to a trumpeter that was above, over the gate, to entertain Christiana with shouting and sound of trumpet for joy. So he obeyed, and sounded, and filled the air with his melodious notes." Christiana then, as those do who have found peace and pardon for themselves, began to plead for others, and at her intercession her companion, Mercy, who was also knocking on her own account, was admitted.

THE JEW'S WARD.

The Jew Recovers his Ward.

CAROLA's journey was long, and it was quite dark when she reached the last station. It was the day after Christmas Day, and the streets were thronged with rough men and squalid women, who made a dreary pretence at pleasure, gathering most thickly round the spirit-vaults, where they were treating one another. The scene was terribly familiar, yet terribly strange to Carola. Once she paused and stood still for a minute, asking herself why she was returning voluntarily to this life of degradation and misery. Nobody could compel her to come back. The world was all before her, and she could choose her own dwelling-place.

But there was an instinctive return of her heart to her first, and now her only, friend. Christian people were casting her out, and turning their backs upon her; and to whom could she go but to the old Jew, who had so faithfully taught her God's commandments, and had done his utmost to keep her in the path of them?

The Sabbath was just over for Matthias, for the Jewish Sabbath commences at sunset on Friday and ends at sunset on Saturday, and now it was Saturday night. He was about to take down his shutters and light the twinkling lamp he worked by on his bench. He might well have forgotten Carola; it was so long since he had lost sight of her. But though the bitterness of his disappointment that she was a Christian in spite of all he had done to save her had passed away, the memory of her remained fresh and green in his heart. He missed her most keenly on the Sabbath-day, when some Christian woman from the outcast herd of Gentiles came in to do his work in the place of the pretty, sweet-voiced little maid, whom he had watched growing up. He had tried to do without fire and light through the twenty-four hours of the Sabbath; but he was too old to bear that. Many a Sabbath day the tears had stolen slowly down his wrinkled face as he sat, solitary and sad, brooding over the fate of the child gone out from safety into the wild and wretched life of those who called themselves followers of the crucified Nazarene. He had given up the hope of ever seeing her again. "Neither in this world, nor in the world to come," he often muttered to himself, shaking his head sorrowfully over the shoes he was patching.

Matthias had been grieving thus over Carola this evening; and the sun had gone down, bringing his Sabbath to a close an hour ago without his perceiving it. Now he came down his spiral staircase into the small shop and lit his lamp; but he felt loath to take down his shutters, though Saturday night brought his best hours of business. This Saturday night was a season of special and more odious revelry than usual; and all the villenous of the Christian rabble whom Carola had chosen as her people would force itself upon his notice. But as he hesitated, puckering his heavy eyebrows together, there came a low but steady knock at the closed door. Three or four voices were talking loudly on the other side of it; but before he could take down the heavy bar, the knock was repeated with more urgency.

"Matthias, let me in!" cried a voice which made his old hands tremble. He would have known it among ten thousand: his little Carola's voice, which had so often recited the ten commandments to him. He could hardly open the door for very eagerness; and there, standing on the step and pressing forward as if seeking refuge from a little knot of his Christian neighbors, stood Carola herself!

"I will see you to-morrow," she said to them, eagerly, "not to-night. Go away now. I promise to see you to-morrow."

"Carol!" exclaimed Matthias, hardly able to trust his senses. "Is it Carol?"

"Yes," she answered, closing the door and fastening it in the face of her old comrades, "it is Carol come back again, if you'll have me, Matthias."

"The God of Israel be praised for this; the God of my fathers be praised!" he said, fervently. "But is it really you, and no vision of the night?"

"Take hold of my hand," she replied, "and tell me if I can stay here a little while. I've no other home, and no other friend in all the world."

"No other friend, and no other home!" he repeated, as he followed her up-stairs; and trimming the lamp there, which had burned low, he gazed eagerly into her face. What a beautiful and graceful woman his little Carol had grown! How different from the wild, rough girl she was when she went away! "Our daughters are as corner-stones, polished after the similitude of a palace," he said to himself; but then, alas! she was not one of the daughters of Israel. She had sunk down as one utterly worn out in his antique, high-backed chair, and was looking up at him with a little glimmer of a smile in her dark eyes; but even his sight, dim with age, could not help seeing the wantonness of her dear face and the sadness of her smile. She looked as if she had neither home nor friend,

"Has it been well with you, Carol?" he asked, anxiously.

"Oh, it has been well," she answered; "but I have lost it all. I'm too tired to tell you to-night. Can you let me stay in the old garret for a time?"

"Ay! it's been kept as you left it, my dear," he said. "I couldn't let any body else live in the place. Only let me give you some food to eat; you'll feel better, my child, when you have eaten. Sit you still there while I wait on you."

But when he tried to stir up the smouldering fire, his hands shook too much for him to use the heavy poker. Carola roused herself and made him sit down, while she, to satisfy him, boiled the kettle and prepared supper as in the olden times. They ate together almost in silence; the old man was too overjoyed and Carola too sad and heart-troubled to talk much.

When the meal was over, she went up into the garret overhead. Yes, it was just as she left it; but how little there had been to leave! There was the low pallet-bed, with its dingy counterpane, where she had been used to sleep the untroubled sleep of childhood beside her drunken grandmother. The broken chair and the little table standing in front of the few bars of rusty iron which formed the grate were there. The low broad window, with its broken panes covered with brown paper, or stuffed with rags, was unchanged, and through it the moon was shining—that moon which had shone down upon her in the pleasant chamber at the Grange only last night. Was it possible it could be only last night?

She knelt beside the window as she had knelt in the moonlight the night before. The bitter cup which last night pressed to her lips she was drinking now; and it was tenfold more bitter than she had foreseen. For had she not been rejected and cast out and forsaken altogether? What had she been guilty of? From this familiar standpoint she looked back on her two lives, so distinct and separate. And as her childhood passed before her she saw for the first time what the old Jew had been to her, and what evils he had saved her from. He could not keep her from the knowledge of evil; but he had kept her from plunging into it. She had played on the brink of an abyss, but his hand had held her back from falling into it. A rush of tender gratitude for a minute or two swept away the sadder thoughts of her heart. She would never leave him again; he should be to her as a father stricken with age, to be honored and cherished and loved till death parted them.

It was not that she did not feel that her early life had been full of faults; but then she had known no better. As soon as she knew Christ she followed Him as truly as did the disciples who saw His form and heard His voice. He had forgiven her sins, and what did Christian people want more than that? If her Lord accepted her, why should they turn away from her? Did the disciples of old reject Mary Magdalene, out of whom Christ had cast seven devils? Poor Carola! It would have been impossible for her to understand the reasons which justified their conduct to Mr. and Mrs. Arnold.

She could not have been Philip's wife, she said to herself, if he was ashamed of her. She knew how they prided themselves on their unstained name. But why should that have made them banish her from her little home, to which she would have gone back; and when he married some happier girl she would have seen their happiness from afar, and never grudging it. Did they look upon her as so contaminated that she was unfit to teach even the village children? Ah! that must be it. They could not believe that her early sins were not only forgiven but taken away.

She threw herself, dressed as she was, on the low bed, and fell into a deep, unbroken slumber; for her heart was heavy with sorrow. For a few minutes the hideous noises in the street below haunted her like bad dreams, though her ear was soon deaf to them. It was a long sleep, for she was worn-out with fatigue, excitement, and grief; but when she awoke in the morning, her first thought, before trouble could thrust itself in upon her, was, "Christ loved me, and gave Himself for me."

It was with a smile, then, that Carola awoke to a new day. It was to be a day of humiliation and suffering. Hitherto her experience of Christian life had led her only among green pastures, and beside still waters; and by and by it might be that her cup would again run over; but between now and then the valley of the shadow of death must be passed through. For now she began to see more clearly the terrible task that lay before her, which she must perform unaided and alone. There was no escape from that dark and rough road. By making her confession, and coming back here, she had bound herself to bear fatal witness against the unhappy man accused of murder.

She sat on the side of the bed pondering over it. The open court; the eyes of the people staring at her; the crowd of familiar yet terrible faces of those who had known her and George Bassett in bygone days, and who would flock to hear the trial. And George Bassett's face turned to her, intent upon every word she spoke; and what she had to say would seal his doom. Oh, if she could have been spared this torture and disgrace!

She could hear presently through the badly made floor that Matthias was getting breakfast, and she made haste to go down. He had been out and spent his last shilling to buy some salted fish as a dainty to set before Carola; and as she came down the steep ladder, he met her with a smile on his withered face, full of happiness.

"It's like seeing the sun rise again to look on your dear face," he said.

"Have you missed me so much?" she asked. "Sitting down and rising up, waking and sleeping, eating and fasting, I've missed you," he answered, in a tone of mingled sadness and rejoicing; "but you've come back to me in the end of my days, and I've a hope you'll never leave me again."

"Never!" she said, fervently, laying her hand on his arm, and looking at him with tearful eyes. "I will take care of you as if I were your daughter."

His daughter! For a moment the old Jew's memory went back to his young wife and their infant child, whom he had laid, nearly fifty years ago, in the Jewish burial-ground, and buried all his joy and gladness with them. But the memory fitted past like a fading vision; for here was Carola herself, with her warm hand upon his arm, and her living face close to his. Perhaps she might marry a Jewish husband yet. She had been out among Christians and found neither home nor friends with them.

"The Lord bless thee with a full blessing," he said, solemnly, "for thou hast sought refuge under the shadow of His wing."

The shop was closed, for it was Sunday, and long ago the neighbors had made the old Jew understand that he was not free to open it on their Sabbath, if he shut it on his own. There was still a hope lurking in Carola's heart that the night she saw George Bassett was not the night of the murder; then a part of her trouble would be spared her. With a sickening alternation of hope and dread she told Matthias what had brought her back to London.

"Ah!" he said, without surprise, "the police have been here asking after you, Carol; and I told them where you'd gone to school. For the rascal said he'd spent the night with you; and I could swear against him; for it was the very night your poor old grandmother died, and you were here at home all but one half hour. We must go to the police, my dear. But he's committed for trial, and you'll not have to go before the magistrates; it comes on in two or three days, for I'm to bear witness he was not with you that night."

This then explained the commotion that had arisen in the street last night, when one of her old acquaintances had recognized her. It had startled and even frightened her, so much greater was it than she could account for. So she could not have kept her secret, if she would; the policemen from Market Upton might even now be seeking her, and would find her gone. There was a gleam of relief on the darkness of her sorrow that she had had courage to take up her cross, and had not waited for it to be laid upon her reluctant shoulders.

All day long the street was filled with crowds of curious people; for the whole neighborhood was seething with excitement about this murder, perpetrated four years and a half ago. George Bassett had been a well-known personage amid the rough population; and Carola herself was no less well known. There had been a mystery about her sudden disappearance, which had tended to keep her in their memory; and Matthias Levi's obstinate silence about her had increased the mystery, and increased greatly his own unpopularity among his Christian neighbors. Now Carola was come back as suddenly as she went, no doubt to save her old lover from a terrible fate. They could not think otherwise; for who would give evidence against a former friend for a murder committed so long ago, that this evidence could only be given in cold blood? No; she was come to save him.

S. S. Lesson for May 3, Eph. 6:1-7. Golden Text, ver. 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Difficulty of Obedience—Children who do not know its Joy—The Springs of Obedience—The Work of the Holy Spirit—Difficulties in Circumstances—Parental Duties—Employers and Employes—Hindrances to the Gospel—Not fit for a Missionary.

PERHAPS there is nothing more difficult to the natural heart than to obey, unless it be to believe. The very fact of being told to do a thing raises up a disinclination to it in our natural hearts. "John, it's time to get up," says his mother. John feels more inclined to lie in bed than before his mother called him; and although he knows the breakfast will be cold, and he will be late, and perhaps get into trouble when he reaches his office, yet he will assert his independence by taking another quarter of an hour in bed. He is uncomfortable, knows he has made his mother so, goes off to business in a bad temper, but he thinks he has made his mother feel he is not to be dictated to; he does not know the joy of obedience. "Mary, I want that letter posted at once; run and take it without delay," Mary is reading an interesting book; she puts on her bonnet, book in hand, draws on her boots with the book on her knee, and at last takes up the letter, thinking or saying, "I wonder why Emily could not take it. I don't see why I should always be sent on errands." Going unwillingly, she reaches the post just after it is closed for the night—the letter is about an important engagement. Her mother is grieved, and speaks hard words; the daughter retaliates, and the whole evening there is wounded feeling on both sides. Mary does not know the joy of obedience.

"Children, obey your parents in the Lord: for this is right. Honor thy father and mother; which is the first commandment with promise; that it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth."

springs from a renounced will and from a well-grounded confidence. We never really obey God until we know and love Him. Fear may restrain us from some flagrant transgression, but true obedience comes when we understand His love, and joyously accept His right to command us, so that His will is our delight. It is just so between parent and child: where there is real love on both sides obedience is not irksome to a child, it is his joy; he has learned to have confidence, and he says in his heart, "Father knows best," or "Mother knows best." Wherever there is disobedience on the part of a child, he has, lurking somewhere in his heart, a contempt of his parents and a confidence in his own superiority, either of strength or wisdom.

The Apostle exhorts, "Obey your parents

IN THE LORD.

This is no strained obedience, the result of restrain which we put upon ourselves by force of will. There is immense purport in those words of Peter, "Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience" (1 Pet. 1, 2). True obedience in the Lord, whether to God or to man, is the work of the Holy Ghost. He worketh in us "both to will and to do of His good pleasure" (Phil. 2:13). Obedience by effort, stirred up by a strong sense of duty, may last for time, but it will break down in the end; it is not the real thing; it has to be kept up by force from without. But when the law of God is written by the finger of God upon "fleshy tables of the heart," then the obedience comes from within. The Holy Spirit so reveals to us the unutterable love of Jesus that we see in it an appeal to us that we should present our bodies a living sacrifice to God as our only reasonable service. And it is as thus presented to God, as laid upon the altar, as yielded up to and accepted by Him as His own, that we can "prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God" (Rom. 12:1, 2). Once persuaded that the will of God is "good," where is the difficulty in obeying? Once finding it "acceptable," how can we but obey? Finding it "perfect," how can our own imperfect will but yield before it, or coincide with it?

A converted daughter may say, "Well, I have no difficulty in obeying the will of God when I know it is His will; but how can I obey my unconverted mother, who tries to force me into the world, stops my going to meetings where I get blessing, or where I can work for God, makes me spend my money in dress, which is instead of doing good with it, and tries in every way to hinder the life of my soul—can I obey God in doing these things?" Well, dear child, it does seem difficult, but who permits this state of things? Is it not God? He knows the way out of this tangle; you belong to Him, and you cannot be put in a position in which He will not make it possible for you to glorify Him. Can you fully trust Him, and hand over yourself, your mother, your soul and body to His keeping? and then, without making up your mind at all what you will do, wait till the moment comes for any decision? If so, you will find that God has been on before, opening the way for you. As long as you are fighting your own battles and maintaining your own cause with your mother, she feels you are resisting her authority; and this will not commend your faith to her. But if she finds you willing in every way to yield to her, then, whenever a point of conscience comes up, you can trust the Lord to make your way to do what is right; He desires it far more than you do. And while you are thus dealing with Him, He can deal with your mother, and bring her to Himself. All your difficulties come from your seeing the matter as one between yourself and your mother, instead of seeing it as between God and you; and thus in your heart you are judging your mother instead of obeying her "in the Lord."

"And ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath, but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." Parents are perhaps more mortified in seeing their children's faults than in any other way, and unless they know how to deal with their children in the Lord, and to bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, they are apt to visit on their children their own

WOUNDED PRIDE.

"I could not do a mean or underhand thing," a parent will say, "and I am sure not one of my children would either." But it comes to light that one in whom he has placed the greatest confidence does the very thing which the father has boasted he never would do. He is disappointed, his pride is wounded, he shows his vexation to his child, and kindles bitterness in his heart. Thus he loses the opportunity which God has given him of showing his son that in him dwelleth no good thing, and that far from being disappointed in him, he never expected anything from him, but only from the grace of God. So he might have loved his son to the cross of Jesus, and the fall would have turned out to be God's opportunity for blessing.

But can the same rule of obedience in the Lord, apply to servants? What says Paul through the Spirit, "Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters, according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of your heart as unto Christ." It is an old saying, "A good master makes a good man," or "A good mistress makes a good servant." We would rather say, "Christ makes a good master or mistress, and Christ makes a good servant." That which fits us for any position in life whatever is this glorious fact—God knows I am here, He has put me here, and Christ in me is equal to this position." Then be it master or servant, parent or child, teacher or scholar, the very singleness of heart which sees Christ and counts on Him conquers.

OBEEDIENCE FROM LOVE,

"Not with eye service, as men-pleasers"—i.e., not doing a duty only when some one is looking on, or when it is liberty to be noticed—"but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart." "I don't like cleaning grates and sweeping rooms," said a young housemaid; "I would rather be a missionary." She had the chance of being a missionary, but she did not use it. An unconverted servant in the same house, who was very particular about her work, was watching the young girl to see how much of Christ there really was in her. The carelessness with which she did her work prejudiced the unsaved fellow-servant against the gospel. How could such an one succeed as a missionary? Had this girl possessed a true missionary spirit, she would have trusted the Lord to keep her from anything which would hinder others, and the presence of Christ in her would have made her see the will of God in every little common thing in her life of service, until He should make the way for her to enter into direct missionary work. The mission field is not for those who fail in other paths of life. The better a man is in his trade or profession, the better adapted he is to be a missionary. "With as to the Lord, and not to men: knowing that whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free." "I'm sure I shan't dust down the stairs every day; what's the use?" my mistress is so fussy! "With good will doing service, as to the Lord." Would you clean down the stairs for Jesus once a day? "With good will" does not mean to do everything with a heavy, dissatisfied face, or with a face like a martyr, but bright with the joy of serving God.

"And ye masters, do the same things unto them." God has not commanded that servants shall serve "with good will," while masters and mistresses may grumble as they like; the good will is to be on both sides. "Forbearing threatening: knowing that your Master also is in heaven; neither is there respect of persons with Him." God would have neither servants nor children discouraged; Jesus Himself dwelling in us is ready to enter into all these relationships, and so bring out in us divine obedience.

"THE LORD KNOWETH HOW."

2 PETER, II. 9.

"I will trust, and not be afraid"—Isa. xli. 21.

The storm-clouds are rolling across the horizon, And peal upon peal of the thunder is heard: The flashes of lightning vivid and fearful: Yet never a light in this bosom is stirred, For 'tis it not written, and everywhere shown, "The Lord knoweth how to deliver His own!"

"The gleam of the sword can be seen in the distance, The moans of the wounded and dying we hear, And the face and the bloodied are growing more rampant: The Lord knoweth how to deliver His own!"

The foe we contend with is artful and cunning, A deadly enemy, indeed, the snare he has laid: We are not unmindful of Satan's devices, Though of his temptations we are not afraid; For is it not written, and everywhere shown, "The Lord knoweth how to deliver His own!"

"The Lord knoweth how," though we often are puzzled, And to our conceptions no pathway is clear; But since we are guided by infallible Word, The word He hath spoken forbids every fear: For is it not written, and everywhere shown, "The Lord knoweth how to deliver His own!"

"The Lord knoweth how," is our strength in our weakness, The promise of sunshine, though storm-clouds appear;

A peaceful assurance amid every battle, The way of escape from each trial and fear: For is it not written, and everywhere shown, "The Lord knoweth how to deliver His own!"

TALKS WITH YOUNG MEN.

By J. THAIN DAVIDSON. 12mo, handsome cloth binding, illuminated cover. Price, $1.25.

"These talks are direct, practical and pungent, such as young men like to hear. They are crowded with points of counsel and direction; they will be invaluable to any young man, and all so plainly and forcibly told, and so fully illustrated, that one can but pursue the reading of them to the end. The graphic descriptions of human nature, and sharp laying out of motive in worldly and selfish living, show an unusually keen sense of observation and understanding of the human heart. It should have a wide circulation."—N. Y. Evangelist.

Rev. Mr. SPURGEON says: "The author gives young men fine advice—full of grace and thought—enriched by story and proverb, fresh with sympathy, and on fire with zeal. These short talks are just what they should be, and all that they further need is to be largely distributed among the crowds of our advancing mankind. TO BEGIN TO READ IS TO BE BOUND TO CONTINUE. THE TALKS ARE SO SENSIBLE THAT NO ONE WISHES TO SILENCE THE TALKER—BY LAYING ASIDE THE BOOK."

N. Y. Christian Advocate and Journal says: "This vol. will find readers wherever it is known. The talks are fervent and DIRECT APPEALS TO THE HEART. THE STYLE IS ANIMATED AND PICTURESQUE, AND THE BOOK WILL BE READ BY ALL WHO BUY IT."

SEVEN NEWLY APPOINTED UNITED STATES MINISTERS.

SEVEN NEWLY APPOINTED UNITED STATES MINISTERS.

ONE of the most important duties of a new President is that of filling the missions abroad. In these times of cable communication the duties of ministers are not so responsible as in pre-telegraph days. They can now always communicate quickly with the Secretary of State and the President, and receive definite instructions, while a few years ago they were necessarily left much to their own discretion. Nevertheless, it is important that men of intelligence, sagacity, courage, and energy should represent this country at the European courts. They can, if they are able men, supply the home government with much valuable information, and are able to protect the interests of our citizens travelling abroad. The position of a minister is one of dignity and honor, and we are glad to see that in the majority of cases Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Bayard have made their selections with wisdom and discretion.

HON. EDWARD J. PHELPS,
U. S. Minister to England.

It occasioned some surprise when it was announced that the most coveted place in the diplomatic service would go to New England. Mr. Phelps himself has not been a conspicuous man in politics, and though a thorough, and in some respects an extreme, Democrat, his reputation is rather that of a scholar and a lawyer than of a politician. The appointment, however, is generally approved, and even the Republican press admits that Mr. Cleveland has selected a worthy man to succeed Mr. Lowell. Mr. Phelps is Professor of Law in Yale College, and is sixty-three years of age. He has spent nearly all his life at Burlington, Vt., where he has Senator Edmunds for a near neighbor. Though radically opposed in politics, it is stated that an intimate friendship exists between the two men, and it is certain that the great Republican statesman has often spoken of Professor Phelps with profound respect.

Mr. Phelps is the son of Samuel S. Phelps, who represented Vermont in the United States Senate and was for a long time Justice of the State Supreme Court. The new minister is said to have been noted as a studious lad, and at the age of twenty-three was graduated at Middlebury College, a small but excellent institution. The young man, following the custom of those times, studied law in his father's office, and soon established himself in Burlington, then the largest town in the State. He was admitted to the bar of Chittenden County about the time that George F. Edmunds brought his first case into the same court. It was in the office of Mr. Phelps's father that Mr. Edmunds began the study of law. Young Phelps's ability was quickly recognized, and he was not long in obtaining an excellent practice. For two successive terms he was President of the American Bar Association, which position he held until, in 1882, he accepted the position of lecturer on international law in Yale College.

In his early days Mr. Phelps was a Whig, and under President Fillmore held the office of Second Comptroller of the Treasury. In the quarrel between Fillmore and Seward he was an enthusiastic supporter of the President, and at the next election he came out for Franklin Pierce as a regular Democrat. His ardor grew in the subsequent years, so that, in 1872, he found himself unable to support Horace Greely, though the regular candidate of the party, and cast his vote and used his influence on behalf of the candidate of the ultra-Democrats, Charles O'Connor. In the campaigns of 1876 and 1880 he worked for the Democratic candidates, and in the Garfield-Hancock campaign he received the nomination of his party for Governor of the State. It was, of course, a forlorn hope in Vermont, but Mr. Phelps worked sturdily for his party, and made several remarkable speeches. He polled probably the largest vote ever cast for a Democrat in the Green Mountain State. He was strongly urged to change his political faith by friends, who pointed out to him that in a State so strongly Republican as Vermont his Democracy would be a bar to his progress. That, however, he always refused to do, his opinions being strongly in favor of slavery, and it is stated that even now he cannot forgive the Republicans for its abolition.

For the last two years he has been delivering a course of lectures on special branches of the law before the students of the Yale Law School, and has frequently lectured before the theological students upon legal topics of interest to the ministry and to the academic students upon international and municipal law, and has made his instructions popular and successful. He was given the degree of LL.D. at his Alma Mater in 1870, and the degree of A.M. at Yale when he was appointed Kent Professor of Law in the academical department. He is one of the most popular instructors in the college, and all, both students and professors, express their gratification at the appointment, but regret his leaving the college. Probably no instructor is better liked in the class-room, and his courses to the Seniors in municipal and international law were attended by more students than any others. He is exceedingly courteous, fond of society, and will no doubt be greatly liked in London. Mr. Phelps is an able lawyer, and has a reputation among those who know him for his sarcasm and wit.

HON. SAMUEL S. COX,
U. S. Minister to Turkey.

THE appointment of Mr. Cox surprised all the friends of that genial and cultured gentleman. It was thought that nothing would ever tempt him to voluntarily quit the scenes of his triumphs in the House and the society of his many friends in Washington. To a personal friend he explained his motives by saying that the advent of new men and his long career of service had combined to make a period of rest and relaxation welcome to him. Besides he said he had a strong desire to pass a few years in the land in which he feels a strong interest, and about which he has written much.

Samuel Sullivan Cox was born in Zanesville, Ohio, on September 30th, 1824. His father, Ezekiel Taylor Cox, was a leading Democrat of Ohio, who held several State offices. His grandfather, General James Cox, of Monmouth, N. J., fought in the Revolution, and later was a personal friend of Thomas Jefferson. Mr. Cox was educated at Ohio University and was graduated from Brown University in 1846. He was at school at the last-mentioned place during the Door rebellion. He was one of a family of twelve children. His father being poor, young Cox had to use his own exertions to get money to carry himself through college. Board in those days was only $2 a week. He earned nearly enough to keep himself by writing. His first efforts were printed in the Knickerbocker Magazine of New York. At the close of his educational course he studied law and practised for two or three years, and then made an extended European tour. He published a book, on his return entitled "The Buckeye Abroad," giving a description of his travels. In 1853 he became owner and editor of the (Columbus) Ohio Statesman, then the Democratic organ of the State. In 1855 he was offered by President Pierce the position of Secretary of Legation at London, which he declined, but later he accepted a similar position at Lima, Peru. Returning home in 1856, he was elected to Congress from his district, and was three times re-elected, serving throughout the whole of Buchanan's and Lincoln's administrations. He was the Democratic nominee for Speaker of the House in 1863 against Schuyler Colfax.

In 1865 Mr. Cox published "Eight Years in Congress," and in that year he moved to New York. In 1868 he was again elected to Congress. He travelled through England, France, Spain, and other parts of Southern Europe and Northern Africa, the winter following his election, and as a result of this trip published "A Search for Winter Sunbeams." He was re-elected in 1870, and in 1872 he was nominated for Congressman-at-Large, but the entire State ticket was defeated. James Brooks died before Congress met, and Mr. Cox was elected to fill the vacancy. Since then he has been continuously re-elected. In 1877 he wrote his best known book, "Why We Laugh," an analytical description of American humor. In the summer of 1882 Mr. Cox visited Sweden, Norway, Russia, Turkey, and Greece. The volume describing this trip he called "Arctic Sunbeams, or from Broadway to the Bosphorus by way of the North Cape."

HON. GEORGE H. PENDLETON,
U. S. Minister to Germany.

THE appointment of ex-Senator Pendleton to this important mission was especially gratifying to the best elements of both the political parties. The important part Mr. Pendleton took in the much-needed work of reforming the civil service, and the punishment he suffered at the hands of his party for doing that work, won for him the regard and sympathy of the advanced members of the Democratic and Republican parties, who are abandoning the old spoils system.

Mr. Pendleton was born at Cincinnati, Ohio, July 19th, 1825, and is thus about to complete his sixtieth year. "Gentleman George," as the new minister has long been familiarly called, received his education at the Woodward High School and Cincinnati College, and in 1844 went to Europe, where, after some time spent in study at Heidelberg, he travelled for three years, and became acquainted with languages, manners, and men in all the chief capitals. Returning home, he began the practice of the law. At the same time he allied himself with the Democratic party, and made himself a factor in Ohio politics. In 1853 he was elected to the State Senate. In 1854 he ran for Congress, and was beaten, but two years later was elected, and three times thereafter was returned, serving until 1865. In the campaign of 1860 he supported Douglas for President.

During the war he was a member of the House Military Committee, and in Congress he served as chairman of a special committee on the subject of admitting Cabinet officers to the floor of the House and giving them the right to explain measures of legislation affecting their departments, a plan which he zealously advocated. In 1864 he was candidate for Vice-President, with McClellan, on the Democratic ticket, but carried only the States of New Jersey, Delaware, and Kentucky. But in 1868 he was at first far ahead of all other candidates for the Democratic Presidential nomination, and came within two and a half votes of getting that honor, which finally was granted to Horatio Seymour. Next year he ran for Governor of Ohio, and was beaten by Rutherford B. Hayes. In 1872 he made a second visit to Europe, and in 1878 he was elected to the United States Senate, his term in that body expiring on the 4th of March last. The most notable feature of his Senatorial career has been his advocacy of Civil Service reform. He was the author of the bill under which the executive departments of the government are now conducted, and urged its passage in a notable speech in the Senate on December 13th, 1881.

Mr. Pendleton is a graceful speaker, a versatile scholar, and a polished gentleman. He was married, in 1846, to Miss Alice Key, daughter of the author of "The Star Spangled Banner" and niece of ex-Chief-Justice Roger B. Taney. They have a son and two daughters. They have a handsome mansion in Cincinnati, a "cottage" at Newport, and a fine house in Washington, where they rank among the most exclusive and aristocratic of families.

HON. ROBERT M. McLANE, Minister to France.

MR. LEVI P. MORTON's successor at the Paris Mission is the Governor of Maryland, Mr. Robert Milligan McLane. This is the third time that this gentleman has represented his country

oad. In 1853 President Pierce appointed him Minister to China, and in 1859 President Buchanan sent him to Mexico. He is nearly ninety years old, having been born at Wilmington, Del., on June 23d, 1815. His appearance, however, and his active, vivacious manner are those of a much younger man. His hair is still black, and is scarcely tinged with gray. He is of medium height, with a slim, slightly rounded figure. He has intensely black eyes, a straight, aquiline nose, and a sharp, smooth, angular face. He comes of an old Delaware family, and speaks the French language as well as English. He is still in strong, vigorous health.

Mr. McLane's father was a man of considerable distinction. He was a midshipman in the navy when he was twelve years of age. He was appointed to the bar in 1807, and served in the House of Representatives from 1812 to 1827, and then was elected a Senator. In 1829 he was appointed Minister to Spain. Upon his return home, two years afterward, he was made Secretary of the Treasury. He was soon afterward transferred to the position of Minister to France. During the administration of President Polk he was our Minister to Spain, pending the Oregon negotiations. He died in 1857.

His son Robert, the newly-appointed Minister from France, commenced his education at a public school of his native city, and was for a time a student in St. Mary's College at Baltimore. When fourteen years of age he went abroad with his father, studying under a tutor in Paris for two years. Upon returning he received a cadetship from General Andrew Jackson, and entered the West Point Military Academy, from which he graduated in 1837. The same year he was appointed second lieutenant in the First Artillery, and served with General Jessup in the Florida campaign. He also served with General Scott in the Cherokee country of Georgia, and soon afterward was transferred to the corps of topographical engineers. He was sent to Europe in 1841 to examine the system of dykes and drainage in Holland, and before he returned he married the daughter of a Louisiana merchant in Paris. Having been admitted to the bar, he resigned his engineering duties in 1843, and began the practice of law in Maryland. In 1845 he was elected to the Maryland House of Delegates, and two years later became a member of Congress in the Twelfth Congressional District of Maryland, which position he occupied for two consecutive terms. He won the confidence of the State Department by his ability while acting as Commissioner to China, and during his short mission to the Republic of Mexico he negotiated treaties for the protection of the lives and property of citizens of the United States.

Upon returning to Baltimore he again resumed the practice of the law, and took no active part in public affairs until 1877, when he was elected State Senator. The following year he was elected to Congress, and in 1880 re-elected to the Forty-seventh Congress as a Democrat by a vote of 15,702 against 13,540 for his Republican opponent. Mr. McLane was a delegate to the National Convention which nominated Samuel Tilden for President, in 1876, and a Commissioner for Maryland at the last Paris Exposition. In 1883 he was nominated by the Democrats for Governor of Maryland, and elected by a good majority. His term as governor began on January 1st, 1884, and would have been completed, had he continued to serve, on January 1st, 1888.

HON. WILLIAM R. ROBERTS, U. S. Minister to Chili.

THIS appointment is a recognition of the influence of the Irish element in the campaign. A long effort was made by the Tribune and other journals in the Blaine interest to win the Irish vote for the Democratic party by suggestions that Mr. Blaine could and would do so on behalf of Irish plotters, who, in spite of their American citizenship, are in English prisons. Doubtless a large number of Irishmen were induced to vote for Mr. Blaine, but the result of the election in New York showed that many of them must have voted the Democratic ticket, as they usually do. Colonel Roberts was credited with having been influential in checking the stampede of the Irishmen to the Republican party, and this mission appears to be his reward. His antecedents would, in any other country, bar his way to responsible office, but the principle of reward for service rendered is too deeply rooted among us to be easily or quickly eradicated.

Mr. Roberts has lived in New York forty years. He is of Irish birth, and in early life was in the dry-goods business in the Bowery. When he retired, in 1876, he carried with him a large fortune, much of which he afterward lost in the real estate business. He was connected with the Fenian movement which had for its object the invasion of Canada, and for his participation in the affair was arrested by the officers of the Federal Government. Subsequently he was released on bail, and the charges against him were never pressed. In 1870 Mr. Roberts, who is popularly known as "Colonel," was elected to the Forty-second Congress. He was re-elected, and at the expiration of his second term might have had a re-nomination, but declined it. In 1877 Mr. Roberts joined the Tammany Hall organization, and remained with it until the quarrel between Kelly and Mayor Grace, when he followed the latter, and was expelled from Tammany Hall. He served two terms as Alderman-at-Large, in one of which he was President of the board.

HON. THOMAS J. JARVIS, U. S. Minister to Brazil.

GOVERNOR JARVIS, of North Carolina, is the son of a Methodist minister, and was born in Currituck County, N. C., January 18th, 1836. He is therefore now in his fiftieth year. He graduated from Randolph Macon College (Virginia) in 1860, and in the spring of 1861 he entered the Confederate Army as a private. In August of the same year he was made a first lieutenant in the Eighth North Carolina Regiment, and in 1863 he became a captain. He served actively until May 14th, 1864, when his right arm was shattered at the engagement near Denny's Bluff, and he was unfitted for further military duty. He was delegate to the North Carolina Constitutional Convention in 1865, and from 1866 to 1868 he was engaged in mercantile business. He began the practice of law in 1868, and in the same year he was elected to the Legislature from Tyrrell County and was also an elector on the Democratic Presidential ticket. He was re-elected to the Legislature in 1870, and was chosen Speaker of the House. In 1872 he was one of the electors-at-large on the Democratic ticket, and in 1875 he was a delegate to the State Constitutional Convention, where he was a recognized leader on the Democratic side. In 1876 he was elected Lieutenant-Governor of North Carolina, and in February, 1879, he became Governor when Governor Vance was chosen United States Senator. In 1880 he was re-elected Governor. He is a man of genial, pleasant manners, and an able public speaker.

THE HON. ANTHONY M. KEILEY, U. S. Minister to Italy.

THE selection of Mr. Keiley for the Italian mission is not an evidence of discretion on the part of the President and the Secretary of State. The fact of Mr. Keiley being an ardent Roman Catholic of itself should have aroused doubt of his suitability for that particular office. Roman Catholics, as a rule, have a strong antipathy, on religious grounds, to the King of Italy, and it appears that Mr. Keiley has put himself on record in this matter with strong emphasis. At the time when King Victor Emmanuel, the father of the present King of Italy, took advantage of the fall of the French Empire to seize the ancient capital of his kingdom, a meeting of American Roman Catholics was held to protest against the injury to the Pope. Mr. Keiley presided and denounced the action of the King of Italy in strong terms. Of course the protest had no effect, and the king may never have heard of the meeting until Mr. Keiley was appointed; but there is not much doubt that his representatives in this country have by this time informed him of the sentiments expressed by Mr. Keiley on the occasion.

We notice that the press generally contends that we have a right to send to Italy, or any other country, any man we choose, and the government of that country has no business to interfere. That is so; but it is impolitic to send to any court a man who, on personal grounds, is objectionable to that court. If ministers are of any use at all, they are useful in transacting business between the two governments, and we know that business seldom runs smoothly when there is a personal antipathy between the two parties. The Italian Government will doubtless in any case concede all the rights due to us; but should we need any favor, Mr. Keiley would be less likely to obtain that favor than most people. Beside this, the relations between the King and the Pope are not by any means amicable, and in the event of their becoming openly hostile Mr. Keiley's sympathies would not be with that party to the dispute whose good-will is of importance to this country. It is rumored that Mr. Keiley recognizes this fact, and has declined the mission; but there is, at the time of writing, no authoritative confirmation of the rumor.

Mr. Keiley is a native of New Jersey, where he was born in 1834—fifty-one years ago. He has, however, spent nearly all his life in Virginia, where he has been the leader of the Democratic party in that State. He first came into prominence as the founder and editor of the Norfolk Virginian, and afterward as editor of the Petersburg Index and News. In the campaign of 1881 he was chairman of the State Democratic Committee, and in every election has taken a prominent and active part. He is strongly opposed to the readjustment policy of Senator Mahone, and an advocate of honest payment of the State debt. He has been thrice elected Mayor of Richmond, in which city he has obtained much repute as an able lawyer. During the war he went with his adopted State, and attained the rank of major in the Confederate Army.

The Death of the Republican Party is Decried by Neal Dow. In a letter to a contemporary, the man who in 1880 was a Presidential candidate in opposition to Garfield, and in 1884 was a worker for Blaine in opposition to St. John, thus expresses himself: "But now we are free from all entangling alliances with it [the Republican party], and are sure, beyond all possible mistake, that prohibition cannot be a perfect success in Maine, nor be adopted largely in the Union in the life-time of the Republican party. It must die that the homes of the people may be delivered from the infinite evils of the liquor traffic, from the poverty, pauperism, wretchedness and crime, coming upon them from the grog-shops which the Republican party in the nation, as well as in Maine, has taken under its care and protection. The party has deliberately placed itself between them and the friends of temperance, and we have no alternative than to put it down that we may come hand to hand in a death grapple with the liquor traffic, the gigantic crime of crimes, the great enemy of God and man." As Neal Dow has no alternative than to put it down, it will evidently have to go down, though the general feeling is that it is already pretty low in spite of his efforts to raise it last year. It is an ominous fact for the party to which Neal Dow proposes to return, that when he was its champion it polled only 10,305 votes, and when he left it and worked in opposition, the vote rose to 150,633. When he opposed the Republican party it triumphantly elected its President, while when he helped it it was defeated. If the Prohibitionists were believers in luck they might wish Neal Dow to remain in the Republican camp.

INFLUENCE OF CLUBS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached last Sunday Morning, April 26, 1885.

"Every tree is known by his own fruit."—LUKE 6:44.

A Universal Principle—Men are Gregarious—Ancient Celebrated Clubs—Two Specimen Club-Houses—Tests for the Club—Its Influence on the Home—A Wife's Fatal Blunder—Home Life Sacrificed—Homes Clubbed to Death—How to Divide a Week—An Obituary and an Epitaph—Test of Its Influence on the Occupation—On Moral and Spiritual Obligation—Choosing Eternal Companions—Your Little Child—Prizes too Good for the Devil—The Influence on Sons.

FALL pippins will not grow on a crab-apple tree. Chokey pears cannot be found in an orchard of Bartlett's. That principle of Christ always applicable and everywhere applicable. So if you want to know whether any institution is good or bad, you have but just to see what kind of character it produces. I remember that in my father's orchard there was a tree that bore luxuriant fruit; there was a hollow in the tree in which we boys sometimes used to hide. Which was the better place from which to judge of the character of the fruit on that tree, from inside the trunk, or standing outside looking up through the branches? People inside an institution are not as competent to judge of its tendencies as those who, outside of it, are looking to see what style of fruit it showers down. "Every tree is known by his own fruit."

I am asked, What is the influence of club-houses in America? And to the answering of that question I devote this morning's sermon.

MEN ARE GREGARIOUS.

Cattle in herds. Birds in flocks. Fish in schools. The human race in social circles. You may by discharge of gun scatter the flock of quails, and you may by plunge of the anchor send apart the denizens of the deep; but they will reassemble. And if by some power you could scatter all the present associations of men, they would again reassemble.

Herbs and flowers prefer to stand in associations. You plant a forget-me-not or a heart's ease away up alone on the hillside, and it will soon hunt up some other heart's-ease or forget-me-not. You find the herbs talking to each other in the morning dew. A galaxy of stars is a mutual life insurance company. Once in a while you find a man unsympathetic and alone, and like a ship's mast, ice-glazed, which the most agile sailor could not climb; but the most of men have in their nature a thousand roots and a thousand branches, and they blossom all the way to the top, and the fowls of heaven sing amid the branches. Because of this we have communities and societies—some for the kindling of mirth, some for the raising of sociality, some for the advance of a craft, some to plan for the welfare of the State—associations of artists, of merchants, of shipwrights, of carpenters, of masons, of plumbers, of plasterers, of lawyers, of doctors, of clergymen. Do you cry out against this? Then you cry out against

A DIVINE ARRANGEMENT.

You might as well preach a sermon to a busy ant-hill or beehive against secret societies. In many of the ages people have gathered together in associations, characterized by the old, blunt Saxon designation of club. If you have read history you know there were the King's Head Club, and the Ben Jonson Club, and the Brothers' Club—to which Swift and Bolingbroke belonged—and the Literary Club, which Burke and Goldsmith and Johnson and Boswell made immortal; and Jacobin Club, and Benjamin Franklin Junto Club, and others almost as celebrated and conspicuous. Some to advance arts, some to vindicate justice, some to promote good literature, some to destroy the body and blast the soul. In our own time we have many clubs. They are as different from each other as the day from the night. I might show you

TWO SPECIMENS.

Here is the imperial hallway. On this side is the parlor, with the upholstery of a Kremlin or a Tuileries. Here is a dining-room which challenges you to mention any luxury it cannot afford. Here is an art gallery with pictures and statues and drawings from the best of artists—Bierstadt and Church and Cole and Powers—pictures for all moods, impassioned or placid—Sheridan's Ride and Farmers at their Nooning. Shipwreck and Sunlight over the Seas. Foaming deer with the hounds after it in the Adirondacks. Sheep asleep on the hill-side. And here are reading-rooms with the finest of magazines, and libraries with all styles of books, from hermeneutics to fairy tale.

Men go there for ten minutes or for many hours. Some come from beautiful and happy home circles for a little while that they may enter into these club-house socialities. Others come from dismembered households, and while they have humble lodgings elsewhere, find their chief joy here. One blackball amid ten votes will defeat a man's membership. For rowdiness and gambling and drunkenness and every style of misdemeanor a man is immediately dropped. Brilliant club-house from top to bottom—the chandeliers, the plate, the literature, the social prestige a complete enchantment.

Here is another club-house. You open the door, and the fumes of strong drink and tobacco are something almost intolerable. You do not have to ask what those young men are doing, for you can see by the flushed cheek and intent look and almost angry way of tossing the dice and dropping the chips

THEY ARE GAMBLING.

That is an only son seated there at another table. He has had all art, all culture, all refinement, showered upon him by his parents. That is the way he is paying them for their kindness. That is a young married man. A few months ago he made promises of fidelity and kindness, every one of which he has broken. Around a table in the club-house there is a group telling vile stories. It is getting late now, and three fourths of the members of the club are intoxicated. It is between twelve and one o'clock, and after a while it is time to shut up. The conversation has got to be grovelling, base, filthy, outrageous. Time to shut up. The young men saunter forth, those who can walk, and balance themselves against the lamp-post or the fence. A young man not able to get out has a couch extemporized for him in the club-house, or by two comrades not quite so overcome by strong drink he is led to his father's house, and the door-bell rung, and the door opens, and these two imbecile escorts usher into the front hall the ghastliest figure ever ushered into a father's house—a drunken son. There are dissipating club-houses, which would do well if they could make a contract with Inferno to furnish ten thousand men a year, and do that for twenty years, on the condition that no more would be asked of them. They would save—the dissipating club-houses of this country would save—hundreds of homesteads, and bodies, minds, and souls innumerable. The ten thousand they furnish a year by contract would be small when compared with the vaster multitude they furnish without contract. But I make between the club-houses. I have during my life belonged to four clubs—a baseball club, a theological club, and two literary clubs. They were to me physical recuperation, mental food, moral health.

Now, what is the principle by which we are to judge in regard to the profitable or baleful influence of a club-house? That is the practical and the eternal question which hundreds of men in this house to-day are settling. First, I would have you by the influence it has upon your home, if you have a home. I have been told by a prominent member of one of the clubs that three fourths of the members are married men. That wife has lost her influence over her husband who takes every evening's absence as an advantage upon domesticity. How are the great prizes of art and literature and education the public well to go on if every man in the world bounded by his front doorstep on one and his back window on the other, his throat rising no higher than his own attic, going no deeper than his own cellar? When a man objects to a husband's absence for some other purpose she breaks her sceptre of con-power. We had an instance in this very church woman who protested against her husband enlisting in so many religious enterprises attending so many literary and charitable meetings, and she protested until she had successfully deceived him from all such places. He not attend here, he does not attend any church, he has lost his property, he has lost his mind, I fear he will lose his soul. His family is vilified by immoralities—his wife in one place, he in another place, the child in another place. There should be no protest on the part of a wife if the husband goes forth to some pious, useful, honorable mission. But alas the fact that so many men sacrifice all home for the club-house. I have in my household roll of the members of many of the clubs of great cities, and I could point you to the names of many who have committed this

TEST YOUR CLUB-HOUSE

AWFUL SACRILEGE.

Genial as angels at the club-house, ugly as a home. Generous to a fault for all wins and piers and yachts and horse races, but stingy the wife's dress and the children's shoes. Which might have been a healthful recreation had become an usurpation of his affections he has married it, and he is guilty of

MORAL BIGAMY.

Under that process, whatever be the features, she becomes uninteresting and he criticizes everything about her. He does like her dress, he does not like the way she arranges her hair, he cannot see how he was so unromantic as to offer her his hand heart. It is all the time talk about money, money, when she ought to be about Dexters and Derby Days and Eddies, with six horses all under control of ribbon. There are hundreds of homes in New York and Brooklyn being

CLUBBED TO DEATH.

Membership in some of these clubs means domestic shipwreck. Tell me a man becomes a member in a certain club, and tell me nothing more about him for ten years, will write his accurate biography. By that he is a wine-guzzler, and his wife is heart-broken or prematurely old, and his property lost or reduced, and his home is a mere name on a directory.

"Here are six days of the secular week," the husband and father. "How shall I divide the six nights? Well, I will give four to my family at home, or taking them abroad to place where they will be interested. They will give one night to a religious service, I will give one night to a club-room." I correlate you. But here is a man who makes a ferocious distribution of his time. He says: "I will give three nights to the club-room, I will give three nights to other duties." I tremble. Here is a man who makes a decent distribution of his time. He says: "Six secular nights, I will give five to the wife, and one to my home, and that one I will spend in scowling like a March because I am not spending it as I spend others."

THAT MAN'S OBITUARY

is written. There is not one man out of a thousand that gets as far as that on the road that ever stops. His physical health way under the late hours and the stimulants is an easy prey for erysipelas and rheumatism the heart. The physician at one glance that he will not only have that disease to but many years of fast living. The clergy at the obsequies talks in religious general men who got his yacht in the eternal rapids not come to the obsequies. Oh, no, they have pressing engagements! They will send wife with a wreath for the coffin-lid and words of sympathy, but they will be. Give me a chisel and a mallet that I may is tombstone. "Blessed are the dead who in the Lord, for they rest from their labors, their works do follow them." "Oh, no," say, "that would not be appropriate." me try again with this epitaph: "Let me the death of the righteous, and let my last be like his." "Oh, no," you say, "that ld be horribly inappropriate." Then give the chisel and the mallet, and I will cut a st epitaph: "Here lies a victim of a dissipa club-house."

he damage is often increased by the fact that scion of some aristocratic family belongs to b, and people born in humbler circles feel d to belong to that one where he be- s, not realizing the fact that some of the and grandsons of the great commercial blishments of the past as to mind are im- e, as to body diseased, as to morals rotten. y would have long ago got through with entire property, but the wily ancestor who his money by hard knocks knows how it be, and so he ties up everything in his will. e is nothing left now to that unworthy de- dant but his grandfather's name and roast rotundity. And yet many a steamer is d to be lashed fast of that worm-eaten tug, gh it pulls straight for the breakers. I can t you to men in Brooklyn and New York e because of an illustrious ancestry, are now g scores of men to their eternal ruin.

hich you may try your club-house, or the into whose membership you are invited, is question, What is the influence of that insti- n upon one's secular occupation? I can ow through a club-house men may advance commercial interests. I have friends who rmed their best mercantile relations h such institutions. But what has been nfluence of the one with which you are con- ed, upon re people more cautious now how they let have goods? Before you joined the club was credit with the commercial agency A? and it gone clear down on the scale? Then bee every day hear the going to pieces of com- cal establishments through the dissipations some club-house libertine or club-house kard who has wasted his estate and wasted estate of others. The fortune is beaten to es with the ball-player's bat, or cut amid- s by the prow of a regatta, or falls under sharp hoof of the fast horse, or is drowned e potions of cognac and Monongahela. The 's club-house was the Loch Earn, his occupa- was the Ville du Havre. They struck he high seas, and the Ville du Havre went er.

another test by which you may try all the -houses of these cities is the question, What ence will that institution have upon my e of moral and SPIRITUAL OBLIGATION?

I should take the names of all the people is house to-day and put them upon a scroll then lay them behind this organ, and some a hundred years from now should come and that scroll and unroll it in this building and the names, not one of you, from A to Z, ld answer. Any institution that makes me et that, is a bad institution. I have some- been perplexed, as some of you have been, uffalo, going to Chicago, to know whether e the Michigan Central or the Lake Shore, ally safe, equally expeditious, trains arriving e same hour; but suppose you hear that on road the bridges are down, the tracks are up, and the switches are unlocked, you very easily make up your mind which is the best to take. Now, here are into the great future—the Christian highway and the unchristian—the one safe, the other danger- ous. Anything that makes me forget that is a bad institution. I had family prayers before I joined the club. Do I have them now? I at- tended regularly the house of God before I joined the club. Do I now attend religious ser- vice? Would you rather have in your hand when you come to die a pack of cards or a Bible? Would you, in the closing moment of your life, rather have the cup of Belshazzarean wassail put to your lip, or the cup of holy communion? Would you, my brother, rather have for eternal companions the swearing, carousing, vile, story- telling crew that surround the table in a dissi- pating club-house, or the bright girl that God took? Ah! if you would not have been away so many nights if you had thought she was going so soon. Your wife has never brightened up since then. She has not got over it. She never will get over it. What a pity it is that you cannot spend more evenings at home consoling that great sorrow! Oh, you cannot drown that grief in a wine-cup! You cannot forget those little arms that were thrown around your neck while she said: "Papa, do stay home to-night, do stay home to-night!" You cannot wipe from your lips the dying kiss of that little child. And yet there has been many a man so completely overborne by the fascinations of a dissipating club-house that he went off the night of scarlet fever. He came back about midnight, and it was all over. The eyes were closed. The undertaker had done his work. The wife lay unconscious in the next room, from having watched for three weeks. He came up-stairs, and he saw the empty cradle and saw the window was up. He said, "What is the matter?" In God's judgment day he will find out what was the matter. Oh, man astray, God help you!

THE CHILD WAS DYING

The influence which some of the club-houses are exerting is the more to be deplored because it takes down

THE VERY BEST MEN.

The admission fee siffs out the penurious, and leaves only the best fellows. They are frank, they are generous, they are whole-souled, they are talented. Oh, I begrudge the devil such a prize! After a while the frank look will go out of the face, and the features will be haggard, and when talking to you, instead of looking you in the eye they will look down, and every morning the mother will kindly ask, "My son, what kept you out so late last night?" and he will make no answer, or he will say, "That's my business." Then some time he will come to the store or the bank cross and befogged, and he will neglect some duty, and after a while he will lose his place, and then, with nothing to do, he will come down at ten o'clock in the morning to curse the servant because the breakfast is cold. The lad who was a clerk in the cellar has got to be chief clerk in the great commercial establishment; the young man who ran errands for the bank has got to be cashier; thousands of the young men who were at the foot of the ladder have got to the top of the ladder; but here goes the victim of the dissipating club-house, with staggering step and bloodshot eye and mud-spattered hat set sideways on a shock of greasy hair, his cravat dashed with cigar ashes. Look at him! Pure-hearted young men, look at him! The club-house did that. I know one such who went the whole round, and turned out of the higher club-houses went into the lower club-houses, and on down until one night he leaped out of a third-story window to end his wretchedness.

Let me say to fathers who are becoming dis- sipated,

YOUR SONS WILL FOLLOW

you. You think your son does not know. He knows all about it. I have heard men who say, "I am profane, but never in the presence of my children." Your children know you swear. I have heard men say, "I drink, but never in the presence of my children." Your children know you drink. I describe now what occurs in hun- dreds of households in this country. The tea hour has arrived. The family are seated at the tea-table. Before the rest of the family rise from the table the father shoves back his chair, says he has an engagement, lights a cigar, goes out, comes back after midnight, and that is the history of three hundred and sixty-five nights of the year. Does any man want to stultify him- self by saying that that is healthy, that that is right, that that is honorable? Would your wife have married you with such prospects?

Time will pass on, and the son will be sixteen or seventeen years of age, and you will be at the tea-table, and he will shove back and have an engagement, and he will light his cigar, and he will go out to the club-house, and you will hear nothing of him until you hear the night key in the door after midnight. But his physical con- stitution is not quite so strong as yours, and the liquor he drinks is more terrifically drugged than that which you drink, and so he will catch up with you on the road to death, though you got such a long start of him, and so you will both go to hell together.

The revolving Drummond light in front of a hotel, in front of a locomotive, may flash this way and flash that, upon the mountains, upon the ravines, upon the city; but I take the lamp of God's eternal truth, and I flash it upon all the club-houses of these cities, so that no young man shall be deceived. By these tests try them, try them! Oh, leave the dissipating influences of the club-room, if the influences of your club- room are dissipating! Paid your money, have you? Better sacrifice that than your soul. Good fellows, are they? Under that process they will not remain such. Mollusca may be found two hundred fathoms down beneath the Nor- wegian seas; Siberian stag get fat on the stunted growth of Altain peaks; Hedysarium grows amid the desolation of Sahara; tufts of osier and birch grow on the hot lips of volcanic Sneehat- tan; but a pure heart and an honest life thrive in a dissipating club-house—never!

a wild beast is to keep your eye on him, but the way for you to conquer your temptations, my friend, is to turn your back on them and fly for your life.

Oh, my heart aches! I see men struggling against evil habits, and they want help. I have knelt beside them, and I have heard them cry for help, and then we have risen, and he has put one hand on my right shoulder, and the other hand on my left shoulder, and looked into my face with an infinity of earnestness which the judgment day will have no power to make me forget, as he has cried out with lips scorched in ruin, "God help me!" For such there is no help except in the Lord God Almighty. To His grace I commend you.

A Need of the Times is Pointed out by the London Christian. Its words apply with still more urgency to matters on this side the Atlantic, where the evil mentioned flourishes in all its vigor. Our transatlantic contemporary says: There are the Temperance and Purity Crusades, the Anti-Tobacco Society, and many other agencies of the right kind at work: may God bless and use them all! But there is not a crusade against the vile literature, the pernicious novels, the empty trash, so abundantly provided for and read by the young. There are several societies and organizations doing good, noble work in the matter; but the crusade, to be effectual, must begin in the home, the school, and the church. Parents, teachers, and pastors, a duty is laid on you to warn and to prevent. This immoral traffic is too often at the root of drunkenness, loss of virtue, embezzlement, and many hideous crimes. Fathers and mothers be vigilant! Look to the stuff your children are reading; a bad book has power to destroy both soul and body.

TIDINGS FROM MR. C. T. STUDD AND MR. STANLEY SMITH.

THE following items of news have been received from the two young collegians whose portraits appeared in this journal on April 9th; they are contained in letters home, which the young men wrote on shipboard while on their way to the sphere of their missionary labors in China:

Mr. Studd writes: "Red Sea, February 13th. I cannot tell you how good God has been; we know His goodness and love are always passing knowledge, how much more passing words! Every step of the way He has gone before us, and prepared the way for His foolish sheep; what a Shepherd He is!

"Our journey to Brindisi only served to refresh us; then we had a bright Sunday there before starting for Alexandria. We had some singing each day, and the last night the captain very kindly allowed us to have

A SERVICE ON THE QUARTER-DECK.

They rigged the place up beautifully for us, and we had nearly the whole of the passengers as a congregation. A very wealthy Australian spoke very kindly to us afterward, and evidently took a deep interest. He seems to be a Christian. He says he is going to follow us up through China's millions, to see if our expectations are fulfilled; so the dear Lord's faithfulness will assuredly be brought to light again and again.

"We have only been on board the Kaiser-i-Hind three quarters of a day, and yet the Good Shepherd has given several of us quiet talks to the passengers, and it seems as if the Lord had been preparing all their hearts beforehand; of course He has.

"What sad news from Egypt! We heard the latest about Gordon's death as we went across the desert. It seems an easy matter, and occupies a very short time, to send twelve thousand men to shed blood; but why are there not twelve thousand also going out to save souls? I wonder if each English soldier will want a special call from the Queen of England before he 'decides to go' to Egypt, or whether they will be content to obey the marching orders?"

Mr. Stanley Smith writes: "February 17th, nearing Aden. You will be expecting to hear of 'the good hand of the Lord upon us.' I hardly know where to begin. He has been—what shall I say?—so like Himself. We had a delightful journey to Brindisi; and then we got on board the Lombardy; we were only on her three days, but we managed to get many talks. I met a Christian friend, and we were enabled to hold a service among the first-class passengers.

"However, we came on board the Kaiser-i-Hind with great hopes and earnest prayer, not that we might do great things so much as that we might not hinder God. He has answered exceedingly abundantly above all we asked or thought.

"A friend of mine I met quite unexpectedly—rather

A FAST FELLOW.

He was travelling first-class, but the Lord gave me opportunities for two straight talks. Two days ago he came down to my cabin and asked me to read the Bible to him, and, finally, on his knees, was restored to God. The Lord gave me two nice cases yesterday, second-class passengers. One a backslider, who said he 'wanted to come back to God'; the other unconverted, who 'was quite willing to receive Christ'—both brought in. To-night, too, the joiner of the ship said he would come down to our cabin, and there he received Christ. I am expecting very shortly the fourth engineer.

"Another interesting case Mr. Studd is speaking to at this moment. He travelled also on the Lombardy from Brindisi to Suez. The first day I asked him, 'Have you peace with God?' 'No,' he replied, 'I am afraid I have not.' The next day he was open to conversation; but the third day he took the turn that 'he did not want to have anything to do with religion.' However, he is now in dead earnest. He leaves us at Aden, but I am sure if he is not brought in already, he will be before he leaves the ship. We have every night, and also have begun to say a few words in the interval of song. There are many interested, and we are believing for the ship. Nothing like expecting great things from God. Mr. Studd met a friend of his who played in the all-England football team. He has been much helped on. But it is so evidently God's work. The people so prepared at heart to listen and to talk. A blue-jacket on board we are expecting to step over the line; he was helped by a little book Mr. Montagu Beauchamp has given him, and Mr. Cassels has just had half an hour's prayer with him. We have at twelve o'clock, where we gather ourselves, the second-class passengers who have been brought in (there are eight second-class passengers, all of them now Christians, or much interested—interested enough to come to the Bible readings), and a Wesleyan missionary of Colombo and his wife, and also a young medical missionary to Japan, and two ladies who are destined for China as their field of labor.

"We remember you in prayer, as we know you do us. Oh, how blessed it is just to get out of the way and see God work! I expect we shall have greater things to tell you of from Colombo. We have generally been able to get one hour or more of prayer in the afternoon, and the Lord constrains us to expect great things. He makes us obey the command, 'Open thy mouth wide,' and of course He will perform the promise, 'I will fill it.' I am quite sure that the greatest joy God has is to bless; we feel we are just poor pensioners on His grace and goodness."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Poor Old Rag-man.—A Minister Related this fact at a recent meeting: "When I was coming up the street to-day, I met a man with a barrow, and stopping him, I asked: 'Are you saved, my friend?' He stopped, looked at me, and said: 'Oh, no one can be sure of these things.' I explained to him how he could be sure just by putting his trust in Jesus. He replied by saying: 'Oh, I am old, and I know I shall soon be home.' 'What do you mean by saying you will soon be home when you do not believe in these things?' I asked. 'I mean,' he said, 'that I shall soon be under the ground and have a clod to cover me.' But I told him that he needed something more to cover him than a clod of earth: he needed to be covered with the righteousness of Christ through faith in His atoning blood. Poor old man! there he was gaining his living by gathering rags, and had no hope for eternity. I believe that the few words which I spoke to him were blessed to the salvation of his soul!"

One Hanged and Another a Convict.—The Rev. Mr. Piper related: "About eighteen years ago two companions and myself were walking in a country road on a Sabbath morning, talking of worldly and very silly amusements. An aged minister passed us, and overhearing our frivolous talk, stopped and invited us to come to his church. When this servant of God left us, we laughed and jested at his words, and went to the church for the sole purpose of annoying him. With this end in view we took our seats in a front gallery, and throughout the service we laughed and talked and threw peas on the people below, much to their annoyance and our amusement, until the minister had to reprove us openly. Four years from that time one of the number was hanged for murder, a second is now undergoing penal servitude for life, and the third, by the kindness and long-suffering goodness of a merciful God, is now addressing you. Oh, young men, take warning, and 'Remember the Sabbath to keep it holy!'"

A Dying Consumptive Saved.—An Earnest evangelist said: "I was asked one night to go and see a young woman who was dying. When I arrived at her house I found her in the last stages of consumption. She at one time was a fine-looking woman, for I knew her many years ago, but she persistently neglected salvation until now. Oh, was I not glad that I could and tell that young woman that Christ loved her! She might have said how could the young man love her after she had refused Him long, or how could He love such a sinful creature as she was; many things she might have said, but she did not; she gladly listened to I told her of the story of the cross, and of the Lord Jesus Christ, and she was at once won with an unspeakable rest and blessedness."

A Young Irish Student went to Scotland and was placed under the care of a minister. But his guardian soon lost all control over him. The young man went to theatres, casinos, other places of worldly amusement—and one night he was induced to attend an evanescent meeting, and there was convinced of by the Holy Spirit accompanying the preaching of the Gospel. He was arrested in his downward career. To the friend who was urging him to accept Christ, he said: "I am afraid to give self to Jesus, because when I go back to Ireland and among my old associates again, I shall be as bad as ever." His friend replied thus: "Believe that Jesus is willing and able to do for you: and if you can trust Him for one moment, why not trust Him for every moment a ward?" The young man soon saw that He was able and willing to save is also able to all who put their trust in Him, and before the meeting he gave himself wholly to the Saviour. At his home in Ireland he had a letter who never ceased to pray that her brother might be brought to Christ, and great was his joy when God answered her prayer.

A Dead Dog's Critics.—A Minister Told the following story: "Some time ago I read that an eastern country, on a hot and sultry day, a body of a dog lay in a lane. Some one passed the dog and exclaimed, 'Ugly creature! where did it come from?' And another, keeping at a distance, said: 'What an odious smell is coming from that brute! it must have been flung from a cart.' Another, whose nostrils were not so sensitive, went over and examined the dog, and saw a rope had been tightly tied round its neck, passed on, saying, 'It must have been a such a fearful-looking creature.' It was covered with blood and mire, and in the last struggle with death its teeth had protruded over its jaw. The next who passed were Christ's disciples, and they, thinking that the Master would not look on such an object, the other side of the road; but Christ stepped over to it, and soon the eager crowd gathered around Him; and He, who could not look the eye of scorn on anything but sin, with tenderness and pity said, 'Pearls are not to be compared with the whiteness of its teeth. Oh, dear friends, the great and tender Christ will see loveliness and beauty in the most lovely objects!'"

Singing in Her Sleep.—Mr. Jack Said knew a young lady who was very anxious for the salvation of a friend who lived in the country. She told me she often prayed for her friend, and spoke to her of the careless life she was leading, but nothing seemed to do her. On one occasion this careless young lady came to pay a visit to my friend, who asked her to share her bedroom, that she might have an opportunity of speaking to her of Jesus. Night after night she spoke to her, but it was no apparent avail; her heart seemed like a stone. The last night of her visit, my friend was up with Christ upon her companion, knowing this was her last chance of speaking to her for time, but she went to sleep undecided, and a friend almost gave up hope. In the middle of the night her companion was awakened by her singing very sweetly, and sitting up in bed she found that it was her friend, who, quite unconsciously, was singing a sweet Gospel hymn. She listened to the sweet tones and the beautiful words till they ceased. In the morning young servant of Christ tried again to speak word for the Master, but her friend interrupted her with: 'It is all done; I am safe in the arms of Jesus!' 'Oh! when did this wonderful change take place?' eagerly asked her friend. 'You sang in the night, and awoke me,' she said, 'not only out of my bodily sleep, but, better far, out of my spiritual sleep.'"

THE REVELATION OF THE WICKED ONE.

By John R. Caldwell.*

The Summons to the Waiting Saints—Their Withdrawal—The Influence they are now Exerting—The Consequences of its Cessation—A Development of Apostasy—An Uprising of Lawlessness—Formation of a Political Confederacy—Persecution of the Saints Left Behind—The Interval Overlooked—Revealed in the Apocalypse—The Testimony of the Witnesses—The Appearing and the Coming—Two Resurrections.

WE know from Holy Scripture that soon the summons will come to the living, waiting saints on the earth, informing them that the long-expected moment has come, and they will be caught up to meet their Lord in the air (1 Thess. 4). They will disappear from mortal sight, leaving empty their places in business, in society, and in all the positions they now occupy. The world will look for them in amazement and consternation, but it will find them not. But it will see them again, for they shall subsequently return in glory with their Lord. But the intervening interval shall be occupied by momentous events, both in heaven and on earth.

As to the earth—owing to the presence and testimony here of a multitude of God's children, in each of whom the Spirit of God is dwelling, and by whom He is continually reproving and restraining evil—there is at present a barrier or hindrance raised to the full and its culmination in the man of sin; and so it is written in II Thess. 2:7, "The mystery of iniquity doth already work; only he who now letteth (or hindereth) will let (or hinder), until he be taken out of the way."

But with the removal of the Church to heaven, the last obstacle to the full outburst of wickedness shall have been removed; and "then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of His coming" (II Thess. 2:8).

Into the details of this mighty

UPRISING OF LAWLESSNESS

it is not purposed here to enter; suffice it to note, that two great scandals shall culminate, and be judged by the Lord. The one professing Christendom, which is shown in Revelation as "the Mystery of Iniquity, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots." The judgment upon this shall be, first, by the oppression and hatred of the political power, "the beast;" and secondly, by vengeance from heaven. (See Rev 17:16, and Rev. 18.)

The other, the great political confederacy, headed up in Antichrist, or the man of sin—who, exalting himself above all that is called God, and saying that he is God, shall be worshipped by many nations, received as Messiah by apostate Israel—shall cause all to be slain who will not receive his mark, and finally be destroyed by the Lord Jesus, when He shall come personally, with His saints, to take possession of the kingdom, and deliver and bless the faithful remnant of Israel.

Often has the question been raised and discussed,

"SHALL THE CHURCH BE ON EARTH to pass through these scenes of unprecedented tribulation and judgment, or shall it have been removed ere then to heaven?" That there will be saints on earth in the midst of it all, suffering and slain for their testimony, is certain; and if they be not the Church, who are they?

In answer to this, we find first that, in Daniel 12:1, they are called "the children of thy people." Of those an election—viz., "every one that shall be found written in the book," shall be delivered. The whole book of Daniel treats of the period of Gentile supremacy in the earth, of the time when Israel is captive and oppressed, and its prophecy goes on to "the time of the end"—foretells of Daniel's people, and their deliverance by the coming of the Lord to take vengeance upon their oppressors.

The whole period from the cutting off of the Messiah till His coming again to reign is overstepped, so that this present parenthetical dispensation does not at all appear. The saints, therefore, spoken of throughout Daniel as passing through these events, are not Christian, but Jewish; and as such shall be saved by judgment on their foes, and shall be blessed in the land of Israel.

In perfect harmony with this are the words of our Lord in Matt. xxiv. 15-31. The whole of this passage treats of a time of trouble in the land of Judæa; there also is seen, who cannot be deceived by Satan's imitations of Christ; for the false Christ cannot deceive those who know the true. This remnant shall be saved in the flesh, and to this end those days "shall be shortened."

At no time does God leave Himself without a witness, and in the midst of those days of tribulation and apostasy He will certainly have His faithful witnesses; but the character of their testimony will not be such as the Church is called to bear—viz., of grace, but rather analogous to that of Moses and Elias, a testimony of judgment. Such is the character of the testimony of in Rev. 11. Fire proceeded out of their mouths and devoured their enemies. Compare Rev. 11:4 with Luke 9:54-56. The contrast is conclusive proof that the "acceptable year" shall have ended, and a new dispensation have begun; and strictly in accordance with this is the prayer of the martyred remnant in Rev. 6:10, presenting an equally distinct and characteristic contrast to that of Stephen, in Acts 7:60.

Some have maintained that between the coming of the Lord for His saints and His return with them to judgment, there will be no interval, and based this conclusion upon the Second Coming of Christ being ever spoken of as one event. They argue that if there be an interval between, during which Antichrist reigns, then there must be "two Second Comings of Christ;" and if there be saints martyred and raised again after the Church is caught away, there must also be "two first resurrections."

This may appear at first sight conclusive, but a very slight reference to the manner of prophetic Scriptures will show that, though plausible, the argument is fallacious. When viewing an extensive landscape, those objects in the foreground which are a mile or less apart are seen to be so; distances are easily estimated by the eye; but, in the far distance, mountain peaks that may be many miles apart appear as one, or close together. Such is the manner of prophecy. In the Old Testament Scriptures the "sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow," are almost invariably foretold as though the glory would immediately follow the sufferings. No mention is made of stretching out for well-nigh two thousand years, between the rejection of Christ and His coming a second time in glory. Indeed, strange as it may seem to some, it is only from the New Testament that we know of any such distinction as a first and a second coming of the Lord Jesus. As far as the Old Testament Scriptures are concerned, the two events appear as one.

In witness of this see Ps. 22, where the sufferings of the cross are immediately followed by the glory of the kingdom. See also Is. 52:14,

"the visage marred;" verse 15: "Kings shall shut their mouths before Him." Also, in Isa. 61:2, "the acceptable year" and the "day of vengeance" are seen close together; but in the synagogue of Nazareth the Lord Himself, when quoting this verse to the people, closed the book at "the acceptable year," knowing that the day of vengeance was long postponed, because of the long-suffering of God (Luke 4:19).

So also in Zech. 11, 12, 13, 14, the sufferings of Christ are spoken of with many minute details; but the restoration of Israel, and their turning again as a nation to the Lord, and the taking away of the veil of unbelief, are also foretold as immediately consequent, whereas these events are of a future, though the selling for thirty pieces of silver, and the smiting of the Shepherd were accomplished but eighteen hundred years ago. Many other instances might be given, but these may suffice to remove from our minds any surprise that the coming of Christ should be regarded as one event, although it should be accomplished as it were in two parts, with an interval between, which even if it should extend to seven years is very short in prophetic reckoning.

As to the "two first resurrections," this idea arises from not seeing that the "first resurrection" comprises all who rise to life eternal, including Christ as the first-fruits; some who were raised immediately after Him (Matt. 27:52, 53); the Church; the Old Testament saints; the two witnesses of Rev. 11:1, 12; and finally, the entire company of those who shall be slain under Antichrist, for the Word of God and the testimony which they hold. Compare Rev. 6:9-11 with Rev. 20:4. Then, and not till then, is the expression used, "This is the first resurrection."

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON DIVINE HEALING AND TRUE HOLINESS.

BETHSHAN, 10, Drayton Park, Highbury, London, N., England. }

BELOVED BROTHERS AND SISTERS: Our hearts are full of the fact that God is about to bring forth the fulfilment of the prophecy of Joel, in these last days, on a grander scale than the world has ever seen. Therefore we are led, as we believe, by the Lord, to call upon all who, in all lands, are interested in the revival of divine healing and true holiness, to meet in conference here in London, beginning June 1st, 1885. The time for such a conference seems to have come. About half a century ago the Lord began to revive the truth of His direct healing of the body through faith. This was in Germany, principally through the revered Pastors Blumhardt and Rein, and in Switzerland through the no less revered Dorothea Trudel.

At the same time in other countries, the Lord as signally began to revive the truth of holiness through faith, and many are now beginning to see that the body is inseparably connected with the spirit and soul in God's thought of full salvation. We are, however, only in the dawn of the coming glory. Much remains to be learned more perfectly, and very much is yet wholly unknown.

The need for a general conference is strongly pressing upon us.

I. That we may wait together on the Lord, confident that what we know not about the Lord's direct healing He will teach us by His word and His spirit; and that by mutual conference, each may have the benefit of what others have already learned.

II. That the difficulties may be met of many who really believe in the facts of both healing and holiness, but do not clearly see the Lord's will and way in the matter.

III. That public meetings may be held in London and other large towns, through which the light may be widely diffused, and the name of the Lord be glorified.

All are invited to share with us the benefits of the conference.

In the name of the workers at Bethshan.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50

per annum, payable in advance.

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Improvement in General Grant's Health was maintained last week, though on Saturday last he was again in considerable pain, and an examination of the throat showed that the trouble there was still making progress. It was, however, a source of comfort to the family that in the early days of the week the abatement in the patient's agony was so marked. On Monday, April 20th, the general was able to go for a short drive in the Park, and on Tuesday he had so far recovered strength that he ventured to walk for two blocks and back again to his house. On the following day he walked out again. After his return, a Chicago gentleman called with a message from Mr. William E. Gladstone. He explained that while he was in London he met Mr. Gladstone at the Liberal Club, and that the Premier, learning that he was about to return to New York, said: "I wish you would convey my regards to General Grant." Mr. Gladstone then wrote on a card bearing his name and official address this message, which the messenger delivered personally: "With respectful sympathy, and best wishes for a speedy recovery and a long and useful life." Mr. Gladstone expressed the warmest sympathy for General Grant, and said Americans could hardly appreciate the anxiety felt in England over the general's illness, and the warm feeling that was entertained there for him. On Thursday and Friday he had a short walk and drive each day, and the physicians in attendance discontinued the bulletins. On Saturday the general was fatigued after a restless night, and did not go out. On Sunday and Monday he was again much better.

An Important Decision of the United States Supreme Court handed down last week marks another stage in the apparently endless question of Virginian bonds. It is now thirteen years since this dispute between the State of Virginia and her creditors commenced, and the excitement aroused in the State by this decision shows that it is not yet settled. In this case the question was whether the bondholder could pay to the State any part of his taxes in coupons. The court decides that the State is bound to receive its bond coupons when offered in payment of taxes and debts due the State; that if it refuses the tender of coupons and seizes the property of the tax-payer for non-payment of taxes in money the latter may sue the tax-collector for damages; and, furthermore, that the tax-collector may be restrained by injunction from levying on the property of the tax-payer who has tendered the amount of his taxes in coupons. Under this decision the State must accept the coupons in payment of taxes and other dues or take nothing. It cannot refuse to honor its own paper and then exact payment of taxes in money. This is equivalent to a declaration that the whole readjustment scheme is unconstitutional, but it is an apparent violation of the eleventh amendment, which prohibits a suit in the Federal courts of a citizen against a State, except with its own consent. How difficult of decision the question was is shown by the character of the dissenting judges, who were Chief-Justice Waite and Justices Miller, Gray, and Bradley, who held that jurisdiction of the court was barred by the amendment. The decision of the majority upholds the refunding act of 1871, and overthrows the act of 1882, commonly called "the coupon-killer." A constitutional convention is now talked of in Virginia, and a campaign threatened, in which Mahone will be the candidate for governor.

The Scandal of the Star Route Trials is being again stirred up by the trial of Dickson, the foreman of the first jury. The defence is making a vehement assault on ex-Attorney-General Brewster. Dickson is charged with having corruptly endeavored to influence members of the jury by reading to them a written statement concerning the alleged attempt of a man named Bowen to bribe him in behalf of the government. It is obvious to disinterested observers that the real object of the trial is being lost sight of in the endeavor to shift the responsibility for the shameful miscarriage of justice which occurred, from the shoulders of the guilty parties.

Another Dynamite Outrage Occurred in London on April 23d. About eleven o'clock in the morning an explosion in the Admiralty building startled all who were in that and the adjacent government offices. It proceeded from an office in the basement of the building, in which the chief clerk, Mr. Swainson, was at work. The office was wrecked, and Mr. Swainson received a severe scalp wound. The police believe that it was not the work of the Irish dynamiters but of some unscrupulous employes of the office with whom Mr. Swainson was unpopular. Since the previous dynamite explosions the Admiralty and other government offices have been closely watched, and the janitor declares that on the morning of the explosion no stranger had entered the building.

A Great European Conflagration is now threatened by the dispute between England and Russia. Rumors have long been current of overtures being made to France by Russia for an alliance, and last week an event occurred which gave a certain air of probability to the rumors. The suppression in Egypt of the French newspaper Bosphore Egyptien has been magnified by the French Government into an international ground of quarrel, and a demonstration out of all proportion to the affair has been made by France ostensibly against the Khédive, but really against England, under whose tutelage he is. This unfriendly attitude of France, combined with effusive demonstrations of friendship taking place in the capitals of Europe between French and Russian officials, has led to the suspicion that France has agreed to assist Russia in the event of a war with England. This ominous rumor is accompanied by a marked change in the tone of the German press. Recently it was hostile to England, but it has now undergone a radical change. Its utterances are decidedly friendly, and there are other indications that, in the event of Russia and France joining hands against England, Germany would take part in the fray. From England she has nothing to fear, but from France on the one side and Russia on the other she is continually menaced. It is believed that Italy also will be involved, and that she is desirous of aiding England if war should break out. These rumors may be merely the symptoms of the seething going on throughout Europe, but they plainly show that a very slight incident might precipitate a conflict which would convulse the whole of Europe, and complete the changes which must take place before the final close of this dispensation.

A More Warlike Tone Characterized the Reports of the Anglo-Russian negotiations last week. An opinion prevailed throughout Europe that Russia desired war, and would make no concessions to avert it. The account given by the Russian General Komaroff of the battle on the Kussk is contradicted by the English general Sir Peter Lumsden, who states that the Afghans made no advance nor offered any provocation to the Russians, and that the Russian general's report is false in nearly all particulars. This dispatch has increased the probability of war by exciting the English people, and the impression it has given that the Russians are treacherous and deceitful. The conduct of the negotiations between the two governments is secret, and Mr. Gladstone in his reply to interrogatories in the House of Commons pathetically begged the members to refrain from pressing him for information. The situation, he said, was so grave that a word might cause misapprehension. An ominous feature of the position is that Mr. Gladstone asked the House of Commons for an appropriation of $55,000,000. He was very guarded in his remarks as to the purpose to which the money was to be applied, but he said: "The government rely upon the patriotism of the House, but our intentions have been and are now based upon a strong desire that every pacific means should be used to obtain a just and honorable settlement of whatever controversies England might be involved in."

A Proposal in the Nature of an Ultimatum was reported as emanating from the Russian Government on Monday last. The St. Petersburg correspondent of the London Telegraph informed that journal that the Imperial Council had resolved to inform England that Russia would consent to the appointment of a special mixed commission to examine into the facts in relation to the reports of General Komaroff and Sir Peter Lumsden, and to decide which of the reports is correct. M. de Giers has advised that if England refuses to accept these proposals, Baron de Staal, the Russian Ambassador in London, be withdrawn and all negotiations be broken off. General Kouropatkin urges an immediate advance upon Herat, and his proposal finds many supporters.

News from the Scene of the Rebellion in Canada shows that its suppression will be difficult. On April 20th a scout who arrived at Battleford, reported that he had found Fort Pitt abandoned and badly wrecked. Two days later the Fort Pitt garrison of police arrived, under the command of Inspector F. Dickens, the third son of the late Charles Dickens, the novelist. The garrison narrowly escaped massacre. Two weeks ago the fort was surrounded by Indians, but the police, being well armed and with plenty of ammunition, felt confident that they could defend it. The Cree chief, Big Bear, however, asked for a parley with the factor, McLean, and offered to protect the lives of all in the fort if they would lay down their arms and surrender. McLean and the civilians agreed, and thirty whites, men, women, and children, went into the Indian camp, where, it is feared, they were massacred. The police, after a desperate fight, in which one of their number was killed and several wounded, made their escape to Battleford. General Middleton's force had a severe battle on April 24th near Batoche with Riel's men. The losses were heavy on both sides, and it would appear that General Middleton was defeated, though the accounts of the battle are contradictory. The gravest apprehensions are now entertained of a general Indian rising, in which a bloody massacre would be inevitable.

Subscriptions to the Fund for Supplying THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to colored ministers and others unable to pay for it were received last week to the amount of $91, and we hereby tender our thanks to the donors on behalf of those to whom the paper is now being sent. From Chicago we have received $80, accompanied by a list of names, which have been duly placed on our list; from Menno, Pa., a friend sends $6; from Denbigh, Ont., Can., $2; from "a Friend," $2; from Syracuse, N. Y., $1. Dr. Talmage informs us that he has received a letter from a beneficiary of this fund, who was, in the midst of terribly protracted suffering, supported and encouraged last year by the reading of the paper week by week, and who pathetically desires that his gratitude be recorded.

Mr. D. L. Moody Held Special Services at Princeton on Saturday and Sunday last. The First Presbyterian Church was filled to overflowing with an audience composed of college and seminary students and townspeople. On the platform were President McCosh, Dr. A. A. Hodge, and others of the college faculty, and the pastors of the town. The music was given by a choir of students. Mr. Moody spoke with great earnestness for about an hour. Many were deeply touched. After the service many persons remained for a few moments for personal conversation. Mr. Moody on Sunday conducted the college services in the Marquand Chapel, both morning and afternoon, and preached in the First Presbyterian Church in the evening. Mr. Moody while in Princeton was the guest of President McCosh. A great deal of good, it is hoped, will be done by his visit to the college and town.

The Suicide of Dr. David Stern, a Jewish Rabbi, at Wilkesbarre, Pa., on April 19th, caused deep sorrow in that city, where he was formerly pastor of the Jewish congregation. The papers found in his room clearly proved that he was temporarily insane. He left explicit instructions for a plain, unostentatious funeral, and requested that the portions of Scripture read at the obsequies should be Ecclesiastes 3: 9-22 and Isaiah 53. In the rooms he occupied during a recent visit to New York two pages of manuscript in his handwriting were found. They were marked "Preface," indicating that he intended them to precede a pamphlet or book. In this he spoke of having heard, in September last, the Bishop (Thorold) of Rochester, England, deliver a sermon at St. Stephen's Church, in Wilkesbarre, that had made an impression he could not throw off, and convinced him that the Christian doctrine was the true doctrine. He was a frequent attendant, during his stay in Wilkesbarre, at the services at St. Stephen's Church. Dr. Stern was formerly editor of the St. Louis Jewish Tribune, and was a frequent contributor to other Jewish journals.

Another Blow at Polygamy has been Struck. The United States Supreme Court sustains the decision of the Supreme Court of the Territory in the Clawson case. Mr. Clawson appealed to it from the sentence of four years' imprisonment and a fine of $800 pronounced upon him in the District Court, and his appeal was last week dismissed. The question to be decided was whether polygamists could sit as jurors in the trial of a polygamist. The Supreme Court decides that they may be legally excluded. This decision will render the conviction of polygamists easy, and if the law is enforced several noted Mormons will join Mr. Clawson in prison.

The Prince and Princess of Wales Received a hearty reception in Belfast, at Portadown, Dundalk, and other places where the loyal population preponderates. In Belfast the scene was one of the wildest enthusiasm. So demonstrative were the people that it was as much as the police could do to keep a way open for the progress of the royal carriage. At Ulster Hall the various public bodies of Belfast presented addresses of welcome to their Royal Highnesses. The Prince made personal replies to the different addresses. At Portadown and Dundalk the Prince and Princess of Wales received ovations. At all the railway stations along the route demonstrations of loyalty were made, dwellings, public buildings, and farm structures bore banners, flags, wreaths, decorations, and inscriptions expressive of loyalty and welcome. In the evening, when the Prince and Princess took their departure, they were followed to their yacht by an immense crowd. No hostility was manifested. The town was brilliantly illuminated, and huge bonfires were built upon the hills overlooking the harbor. A large number of university students chartered a steamer and serenaded the royal yacht.

A Cure for the Dime-Novel Appetite has been found by a trustee of the Providence Public Library, who has gathered into a scrap-book the adventures of the boys who read dime novels, and has made it his business to ask the boys one by one who are interested in these stories to spend an hour or two in reading, not the imaginative story, but the way in which the small boy has attempted to realize how boys ought to live and what they ought to be allowed to do. It is said that the dime-novel boy usually reads the scrap-book about two hours. He then lays it down in disgust, and nothing can induce him to return to those stories again. He asks the person in charge of the reading-room for a better class of books. It would appear that Providence boys have more sense than is found either in boys or men in other parts of the country. No one can read a newspaper without seeing examples of the fact that vice ends in misery and death, yet the number of vicious people is not diminished (1 Cor. 10: 6).

A Female "Enoch Arden" Arrived at Peoria, Ill., on April 22d. A despatch from that city to the New York Sun states that three years ago a German hotel-keeper and his wife quarrelled, and the lady suddenly and secretly left her home before a reconciliation was effected. She went to St. Louis and thence to San Francisco, where she obtained employment as a governess. Her employer was the wife of a sea captain, and with her and her children the runaway wife sailed around the world; and did not touch at an American port until this month. Then an irresistible longing came over the wanderer to return to her husband and beg his forgiveness. On arriving at Peoria she found that her husband had sought her diligently for two years, and failing to find her had obtained a divorce and married another lady. When she found that her place was thus filled she was broken-hearted, and returned disconsolately to her employment. Her self-reproaches made her lot more miserable than that of the hero of Tennyson's famous poem, whose misery was due to his misfortune, not to his fault. Happily the sinful wanderer who in penitence seeks Christ need have no fear of being sent away. Sincere repentance is always met by forgiveness and full restoration (11 Chron. 7: 14).

An Eccentric Wish was Gratified last Week at the funeral of an old gentleman well known in New York. The funeral procession stopped in going to the cemetery at the house of a judge, who was an intimate friend of the dead man. The halt was made in compliance with a desire expressed by the deceased during his last illness. A little while before he fell ill he went out for a drive, and called, as he was accustomed to do, on the judge, and chatted pleasantly about old times. Before his departure he shook hands with the judge. "I've stopped here many times, judge," he said, "and have always passed a pleasant hour. The last ride I shall ever take will be past your place in a hearse, and I'll not pass the place without stopping." And when, shortly afterward, he was seized with the illness that terminated fatally, he gave explicit instruction to that effect. He was buried on the side of a hill, with his face to the West. This also was at his own request. About five years ago he bought a plot of ground in Woodlawn Cemetery. "I want to be buried here when I die," he said, "with my face toward the setting sun, for there is no finer sight to me on earth than to see the sun dropping to rest after the toils of the day." In the evening after the funeral the light of a beautiful sunset rested on the new-made grave. It may be hoped that one who had evidently thought about death had other and better desires, and that he obtained through Christ, an entrance into that land where friends never separate, and where there is no need of the sun (Rev. 22: 5).

A New Kind of Life Preserver has been patented by a newspaper reporter. It was exhibited last week by a New York ship chandler, who, pointing to a ring of painted canvas two feet in diameter that hung against the wall of his store, said: "It is filled with cork shavings, and will float an elephant. The new feature is the little tube running around inside of the ring. It is full of oil, and is arranged so that when the preserver is thrown to a drowning man the oil will ooze out and spread over the surface of the water, thus keeping the waves from breaking in his face. Many a good swimmer has lost his life because of the spray, although assistance was near at hand." If the new life preserver will obviate this difficulty, it is likely to come into general use. A struggling swimmer to whom it may be thrown will be doubly helped. He will be supported, and the waves around him will be tranquillized. It is a pity that so few people put their religion to the same twofold purpose. The Christian who fully realizes its power and intention finds in it not only salvation for his soul but deliverance from the distresses and perturbations of his circumstances while battling in the world (Isa. 26: 3).

A Self-Imprisoned Fish is a Natural Curiosity, which has been sent to the Smithsonian Institution. A bottle, to which a large bunch of bivalves had grown, was fished up recently by a Baltimore oysterman. Inside the bottle was a fish too large to get out of its mouth. Various guesses have been made at the cause of the fish being in so strange a situation. Evidently it must have been much smaller when it entered the bottle than it was when it was found. It may have been that having gone in, it was unable to find its way out, but the probability is that it liked its quarters in the bottle, and stayed there until it grew so large that it could not escape. In either case it had clearly prospered in its imprisonment, and its very prosperity had led to its death. The fish should be placed where every visitor to the museum can see it. There are many people who stand in need of precisely the warning its fate is fitted to convey. Men whose youth was full of spiritual promise often find when, in middle life they have grown great in wealth and social influence that the world holds them prisoner by habit and social customs, and the way to eternal life and liberty is too strait for them (Matt. 19: 21-24).

Nine Days of Widowhood, Followed by a second marriage, recently disturbed the arrangements of the editor of a Kansas journal. He thus explains the affair: "We had in type for this week's issue a notice of the death of Mr. —, of Washington Township, who died a few days ago, containing condoling words to his bereaved widow and child; but on learning that the widow had shaken off her weeds and transformed herself into a gushing bride, we withdrew our sympathy, and would like to have had a book of quotations, so that we might have been able to find a verse suitable to append to their marriage notice. We understand that husband No. 1 had been dead just nine days to a minute when No. 2 stood up and claimed the widow's hand in marriage." The editor seems to have felt a little chagrin over the wasted paragraph, but he need not have done so; the lady evidently stood in no need of editorial condolence. Social custom stamps her precipitance as indelicate, but there is no question about her legal right to do as she did. The marriage relation, which the Apostle Paul frequently uses as a type of the believer's union with Christ, he presents in this identical aspect. Unhappily, there are many who, in spiritual matters, do not realize the freedom of which He speaks (Rom. 7: 2-4).

TO LOVERS OF JESUS: AN EXAMPLE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"She hath wrought a good work on me."—MARK 14 : 6.

A Good Work, yet Displeasing to Disciples—The Censure of Judas—He was a Business Man—A Beautiful Work—Had Seven Beauties—I. Glorifying Jesus—A Spontaneous Gift—II. An Act of Pure Love—III. A Sacrifice—IV. Done with Preparation—V. Done without a Word—VI. With Reference to Christ's Death—VII. A Glimpse of His Resurrection.

THIS holy woman had displeased the disciples. She must have been very sorry to do that. She would not have wilfully grieved the least servant of her Lord. But she did so without the slightest blame on her part; it was the unexpected consequence of a most blessed action, and the fault lay with those who complained of her holy deed, and not with her. I do not know whether all the disciples felt grieved, but we are told by Matthew that "they had indignation," and he seems to speak of them as a body; from which I gather that those who love Jesus much must not measure their conduct by that of Christ's ordinary disciples, indeed it might fare ill with them even if apostles became their judges.

This honored woman performed a notable act, which is to be rehearsed wherever the gospel is preached, and yet thereby she stirred the wrath of the brotherhood of the disciples; of how small account is the judgment of men!

Chiefly she called down upon her head

THE CENSURE OF JUDAS.

As far as Judas was known to his brethren he was reckoned among the best of them. They never suspected him of playing the traitor, or they would have cavilled at his being their treasurer; they once had indignation at James and John, but the canny Judas had their respect. I should think he was the most business-like man of the whole company—which is not saying much for business, is it? He was a leading spirit among that little band. He was one who would be selected because of His prudence—and that is not saying much for prudence, is it? Doubtless Judas abounded in that cool, calculating shrewdness which makes a man fit to deal with moneys and purchases. He had far more business ability than impetuous Peter, or affectionate John, or thoughtful Thomas. He was the right man in the right place, if he had but happened to have been an honest man.

Wonderful it was that he could conceal the deep meanness of his spirit from all his fellows during the years in which they lived together; but he had done so, and therefore his opinion carried weight with it. Among the apostles the censure of Judas meant the

of a judicious person. His judgment was not what you and I would esteem it to be, for we should think nothing of his censure now, because we know that he betrayed his Lord; but the disciples could not foresee this, and in their judgment that which Judas would condemn must be very censurable; at least it must be unbusinesslike; it must lack common-sense; it must be imprudent and wasteful. Was not Judas the sort of man who in these days many a father would point out to his boy as an example? Hear him say, "Boy, if you want to get on in the world, imitate Judas Iscariot; he is the model man; he is a Christian, and yet he has a keen eye for his own advantage, and is a sharp man of business."

It was a hard thing for a timid woman to bear such a censure from one so highly respected in the college of apostles; but she had this solace, which I will warrant you put quite out of her mind all care about the censure of disciples, even of the biggest of them. She

PLEASED HER MASTER.

She could see by the very look of Him that He accepted what his followers condemned. She knew in her conscience that she had the approbation of the Lord, even though she had the disapprobation of the servants. And oh, brothers and sisters, let us always carry our case into the highest court, and live before the Lord, and not as the slaves of men!

I am going to talk about this blessed woman at this time with this hopeful desire—that you and I may imitate her ever-memorable example. I shall have nothing to say but to open up the meaning of our Lord, as far as I know it, when He said, "She hath wrought a good work on me," or "in me." The passage might be rendered—only the translators do not like to use the term—"She hath wrought a beautiful work on me"—a comely work. "A thing of beauty is a joy forever." This was a thing of beauty, which is a joy forever to the church of God, in that constant memorial of her which is blended with the preaching of the gospel of Christ; for as long as the gospel is proclaimed this Mary of Bethany shall have a memorial, because of what she did. What was there beautiful about her work—the breaking of the alabaster vase, and the pouring out of the liquid nard? What was there beautiful about that? I will try to show you.

I. There were

in it, and the first and chief beauty, perhaps, was that it was altogether a glorifying of Jesus. She meant when she poured that ointment on His head to honor Him personally; every drop of it was for Himself, out of reverence for His actual personality. She was not so much thinking of His deeds of love, or of His words of truth, as of His own unrivalled and most precious self. She had seen His deeds of love when Lazarus was raised, she had heard His words of truth when she sat at His feet; but now she felt an adoring reverence for His thrice blessed person, and she brought that box of precious spikenard, and offered it to Him as her Teacher, her Friend, her Lord, her all. Suggestion was made that she should have sold it and given it to the poor; but she longed to present one offering to Him direct, and not by any roundabout method. Doubtless she was not behindhand in her gifts to the poor, but she felt that when she had done that she had not satisfied the cravings of her grateful heart toward Him who had become poorest of the poor for her sake. She wanted to give something to Him—something suitable for such an One as she conceived Him to be—something suitable for the time and circumstances then present with regard to Him. Because she had a love for Him beyond all others that she had ever heard of, her heart must find expression in a deed of love which must be entirely, wholly, only toward Himself.

Now, this is as we have read the text—a beautiful thing. It will be beautiful on your part and mine if, having taken care of the poor according to our ability, having discharged the claims of our relationships to our fellow-men, we then feel that we must do something for Jesus—distinctly for our Lord. Do you ask me what you shall do for Him? The holy woman's deed had been somewhat spoiled if there had been a command for her to bring the alabaster box, and pour the ointment on His head; her love commanded her, and that was better than a formal precept. The very glory of it lay in the spontaneous suggestion of her own heart that she must do a something which should be all for Jesus! Alas! good Lord, how little hast thou of this devotion in these calculating days. Instead of "all for Jesus," how seldom we do anything for Jesus! My heart craves now to know what I shall do that I may imitate her who gave to "Jesus only" that box of spikenard, very costly.

II. A second beauty lay in this; that it was altogether of love to Jesus. The other woman—blessed was she also among women—I refer to that woman who was a sinner; she also came and brought an alabaster box, and did much the same thing as this Mary of Bethany. But she did what Mary did not do; she mingled weeping with her ointment; she washed His feet with tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head. That was a beautiful act in its own way, but Mary's deed is a beautiful thing in another way. In this lies the distinction: there does not seem to have been in Mary's act any remembrance of personal sin, though, doubtless, that feeling was in her heart, and had brought her to the higher stage of adoration of her pardoning Lord. Her sin was put away long ago.

Mary had sat at Jesus' feet, and had chosen the good part, and the matter of pardon for sin had been transacted a long while before; and now, although in her heart there is deep gratitude for it, and for the raising of her dear brother Lazarus, yet it seems to be quite absorbed in the deeper thought of her soul, for she had attained to an all-consuming love of Himself. She never would have known that kind of love if she had not learned to sit at His feet; but to sit long there has a wonderful operation on the human mind; it causes even things that are good in themselves to be overshadowed by matters that are higher and less in relation to self.

III. The third beauty of the action was that it was DONE WITH CONSIDERABLE SACRIFICE.

There was an expense about it, and that of no trifling character to a woman who was neither queen nor princess. I shall always feel obliged to Judas for figuring up the price of that box of costly nard. He did it to blame her, but we will let his figures stand, and think the more of her the more he put down to the account of waste. I should never have known what it cost; nor would you either, if Judas had not marked down in his pocket-book that it "might have been sold for much." How he grudged that "much!" He calculated the value at three hundred pence. He did well to put it in pence, for his sordid soul revelled in small moneys which make up the pounds. Pence, indeed, when the expense is for him to whom the silver and the gold belong! Yet I like his calculation in pence, for it is suggestive, since a Roman penny was a day's wages; and take a day's wages now—say 4s. [about a dollar]—and you get some £60 [about $300]. It was a large sum of money for a woman in her state of life in Bethany. It was £10 of their money, but money then was of a different value from what it is now, and it was a great sum for her to expend in one single deed of love. Her gift was costly, and the Lord Jesus deserved to be served at the best rate, and at the highest cost.

There is nothing to satisfy love in the slender oblations which come forth like an unwilling taxation, which a miser could scarce withhold. But oh, to give to the Lord Jesus freely, richly, whatever it is with which He has intrusted us, whether it be gold or genius, time or words—whether it be the minted coinage of the purse, or the living courage of a loving heart, or the labor of an earnest hand! Let us give our Well-beloved the best we have, and He will call it beautiful. Mary's gift was all for Him, and all for love, and it was done at great expense, and therefore it was beautiful.

IV. Next, remember, that part of the beauty of Mary's action lay in this, that it was DONE WITH PREPARATION.

We are told by John what we should not else have known, "Against the day of my burying hath she kept this." "Kept this." It was not that seeing Jesus there at the feast, and being seized with a sudden thought, she rushed back to her stores, and fetched out the little vase of spikenard, and broke it in a passion of affection, which in cooler moments she might regret. Far from it; she was now consummating the long thought of weeks and months. We have known warm-spirited brethren and sisters both say and do and give grandly, under a certain spur and impulse, what they never thought of doing when they entered into the assembly. I shall not blame them; rather do I commend them for obeying gracious impulses; but it is not the best way of doing service to our ever-blessed Master. Passion seldom gives so acceptably as principle.

This holy woman was no mere planner and purposer, but a doer of holy deeds. She could keep her alabaster box as long as was prudent, and yet she did not arrive at the tempting conclusion to keep it altogether. She allowed her heart to weigh the project; and the more she weighed it, she became the more resolved to do it—to do it when the due time came. When she believed that the hour had come she did not delay for an instant. She was as prompt as she had been thoughtful. The Passover was drawing very near; it was within six days, and so she brought out what she had held in reserve. Blessed are the punctualities of service which are the result of earnest endeavor to honor the Lord in the best possible way.

There is something beautiful in seeing, as we have seen, some poor woman saving her littles, and putting them by for years till she could accomplish a secret purpose by which Jesus would be glorified. It is striking to see, as you and I did see, a woman of moderate wealth discarding all the comforts of life that she might save sufficient that there might be an orphanage in which children might be cared for; not, as she said, for the children's sake, but for Christ's sake, that He might be glorified. The Stockwell Orphanage is the alabaster box which a devout woman presented to her Lord. Her memory is blessed. Its perfume is recognized in all parts of the earth at this moment, to the glory of the Lord she loved. Such a thoughtful deed is what Jesus would call a beautiful thing. Let us abound in such beautiful things.

V. There is a fifth point of beauty. Mary did her great deed

WITHOUT A WORD.

Dear sisters, you will pardon me for commending this holy woman for her wise and fitting silence all through her gracious act. She did not talk about it beforehand, she said not a word while she did it, and she said nothing afterward. Martha was the worker, and rather the talker too; but I think that all you will find Mary saying is, "Lord, if thou hadst been here my brother had not died;" and she was so scant of words that she had to borrow those from Martha. Martha said a great deal more than that; but Mary was quite satisfied to be as brief as possible. She was a great thinker, a great sifter at Jesus' feet, and a great learner, but not a great talker. When the time came she was a great worker, for it is very curious, though Martha bears the palm for work in our ordinary talk, yet Mary, the thinker, did more than Martha, the worker. "She," said Christ, "hath wrought a good work on me," which He never said of Martha, good as Martha was.

Though she does not bear the name of a worker in the vulgar judgment, yet is she the queen in the kingdom of good works. Yet, I remind you, she did not say a word. There is such a thing as spoiling what you do by making so great a fuss before you do it, that when the mouse is born people are only astonished that such a small creature should be the only fruit of the dreadful throes of the mountain. Moreover, there is such a thing as talking so much afterward of what we have done that it spoils it all. It seems as if we must let all the world know something about ourselves; whereas the joy and bliss of it all is not to let yourself be seen, but to let the oil go streaming upon the Master till He is anointed with perfume, and we ourselves sink back into our natural insignificance. Silent acts of love have musical voices in the ear of Jesus. Sound no trumpet before thee, or Jesus will take warning and be gone.

VI. Next, and sixthly, there was this beauty about the action of Mary—that she did it in REFERENCE TO OUR LORD'S DEATH.

The disciples shrank from thinking of that sad subject. Peter said, "That be far from thee, Lord." But Mary, bearing her Master's heart very near her own, and sympathizing with Him in His glorious enterprise, instead of drawing back from the thought of that death, performed her work in connection with it. I am not certain to what degree she was conscious that it was so, but there is the fact—the anointing had reference to the burial of the Lord. It seems to me that the best and tenderest duty that Christians do for their Lord Jesus is that which is touched with the blood-mark—which bears the stamp of the cross. The best preaching is, "We preach Christ crucified." The best living is, "We are crucified with Christ." The best man is a crucified man. The best style is a crucified style; may we drop into it!

VII. The seventh beauty, to my mind, is this: you may think it a little far fetched, but I cannot help mentioning it, for it touches my heart. I believe that Mary had in this anointing of the Saviour some little from the dead, and of His after existence. For I would ask of you, Why do nations at all embalm their dead? Why not consume them in the fire? A mysterious something makes the ordinary Christian man shudder at the thought of cremation. That must surely be an acquired taste; unsophisticated nature does not court the furnace, or covet the flame; we prefer to lie beneath the green hillock with our fathers. Many nations of antiquity, and especially the Egyptians and other Orientals, took great care to anoint the bodies of the departed with precious perfumes, and to lay them asleep in gums and fine linen. What for? Because there darkly shone upon their minds some thought of the hereafter.

There remained with man, long after the fall, a glimmering, undefined belief in immortality. That truth was so universally received that the Old Testament takes it for granted. The existence of God and the immortality of the soul lie at the basis of Old Testament teaching. The after-life of the body was accepted also in a manner more or less clear. Immortality was not brought to light, but there it was, and they who reject that doctrine go back into a darkness denser than that in which the heathens themselves dwelt. Why did the Egyptian king embalm his father, and lay him in spices, but that he thought that somehow or other there was another life, and he would, therefore, take care of the body? They would not have wasted precious linen, and gums, and spices, if they had thought that the body was mere rottenness for worms to consume forever. Mary had deeper and clearer thoughts than that, for she expected that something would happen to that blessed body after Christ had died; and she must, therefore, anoint it, and bring the most precious spices that she could procure for His burial. At any rate, let your service of the Lord Jesus be the service of a risen Christ. Come not hither to worship one who died years ago—a hero of the past; but come to adore the ever-living Jesus.

"He lives, your great Redeemer lives."

He will certainly come in His own person to reward His saints; and ere He comes He sees what you are doing. If this does not nerve you to tireless diligence in holy service, what can? Our Lord Jesus Christ lives. Let us find

SOME WAY OF ANOINTING

His dear and reverend head—some way of crowning Him who wore the crown of thorns for our sake. Ours it is to know that He lives, and that we live in Him. On Him would we expend the full force of our being, counting it all joy to spend and to be spent for His sake.

I am not going to stir you up, my fellow Christians, to do anything for Christ, for I fear to spoil the freeness of your love's life. I do not want to be pleading with you to enter into His service more fully; for the work of pressed men is never so much prized as that of happy volunteers. Yet as I love you I would have you love your Lord more and more. It is so sweet to belong to Christ, that the more fully we can belong to Him the more free we are.

As for you that do not love the Lord Jesus, God be merciful to you! I will not pronounce upon you an Anathema Maranatha, but I tremble lest it fall upon you. I am sore grieved for your sakes. I am, moreover, sore vexed for Christ's sake that He should be deprived of your love and service. What has He done that you should slight Him? Oh, blind eyes, that cannot see His beauties, and deaf ears, that cannot hear the charms of His voice! God be merciful to you, and help you to trust your Saviour, and then you will love Him for His salvation! It is no wonder that the saved ones love their Lord; it is a marvel that they do not love Him ten thousand times more. The Lord be with you for Christ's sake! Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

THOUGHTS FOR WEARY HOURS.

THE weariness of the hours would cease for any Christian who realized fully the meaning of the thoughts here suggested. There is comfort, consolation, encouragement in this little volume for the tried, troubled, depressed follower of Christ, whose heart sinks by reason of his way. Sickness, sorrow, bereavement, temptation, anxiety, poverty, humiliation—the Christian on his journey through the world surely encounters one or more of these foes of happiness. He escapes no more than the worldling, though he has sources of comfort the worldling knows nothing of. But sometimes when sorrows come the spirit sinks so low that, like Christian in the dungeon of Doubting Castle, he does not think of the key of promise that will unlock any door of the prison. The object of this little book is to remind him of this key. It may not tell him anything he did not know before, but it may call his attention to the bright side at a time when it is diverted from it by pain or sorrow. In poetry and in prose, by the quotation of God's promises and by suggestions from experience, the reader is encouraged to be patient and look up. "All things come to us backwardmost" is one of the thoughts offered (p. 52); "we can never see them right in the face, so as to understand what they are really like, until they are gone by;" and so the suffering Christian, with the thunderclouds around him, is advised to wait hopefully until the storm is over and the rainbow appear, before he complains. Seventy-eight of these little gems of thoughts are collected here, each one of which will be best appreciated by those who look at it with tearful eyes. Pp. 120. Price, 50 cents. Published by Mr. Thomas Whittaker, New York.

PROPHECY AND HISTORY

IN relation to the Messiah, by Alfred Edersheim, M.A., D.D., Ph.D. The publication of this volume in America is timely. It contains the latest series of the Warburton Lectures, which deal with a topic that recent events have unhappily rendered very prominent in every intelligent household. About two years ago a sensation was produced in Christian circles by the reports published in the New York daily journals every Monday of sermons or lectures delivered the day before in a Protestant Episcopal Church by the rector. They were afterward collected, revised, and published by him at a low price, and have found their way into every city in the Union. The interest they excited was due mainly to the fact that, although the work of a Christian clergyman, they were directed against the doctrines held by orthodox Christians about the Old Testament. The lecturer advanced the theory that the books of the Old Testament are of comparatively modern date—none of them prior to the time of Ezra, and that they are in the main a collection of mythical legends, beautiful exceedingly, but not literally true—a book of human origin, and not a revelation from God. The arguments in support of this theory were drawn from the writings of the masters of the higher criticism, chiefly those of German nationality. The theory was not new, but it was presented in an attractive and popular form, and, as we have said, the book has had a wide circulation, and its influence, as far as our observation extends, has been largely mischievous in undermining faith in the Bible, especially among educated young people.

The object of Dr. Edersheim's work on Prophecy and History is exactly the opposite of the work of the New York clergyman. It is an attempt to vindicate the Bible as a revelation, and to show from the very same standpoints as those occupied by the destructive critics that their reasoning is sophistical and their conclusions false. Dr. Edersheim's profound learning and acute critical powers admirably qualify him for the task he undertook. Accepting the canons of criticism laid down by his opponents, he shows that their conclusions are not sustained, and that even on their own rules there is a greater probability in favor of the orthodox than of the heterodox view. He traces the origin of Christianity to the teaching of the Old Testament, and shows that the Messianic hope must have originated before the exile; that the kingdom of God was the leading idea of the Old Testament; that Jewish and heathen testimony establishes the fact that Christ was regarded by the early Christians as the fulfilment of prophecy; that there is a very clear and well-defined distinction between the Old Testament prophecies and the heathen divinations, and that the new criticism does not sustain the theories of the critics as to the age and authority of the Old Testament. These are but a few of the positions established by Professor Edersheim, but they are sufficient to indicate, for the purpose of so brief a notice as we can give, the line of his argument.

He is a courteous and extremely fair debater, and his opponents have no ground to complain of misrepresentation. Their arguments are squarely met, carefully examined, and their weakness and inconsistency pointed out with all the candor and respect which characterizes a man who is an earnest seeker after truth rather than a zealous champion of a theory. It is this respectful treatment of arguments which it is too much the fashion to treat with contempt that enlists the attention of the reader and holds it until he sees them crumble to pieces under the well-directed blows of a master learned and valiant. Dr. Edersheim knows full well that the battle is serious, that the issues at stake are inconceivably important to Christianity and the world, and that the faith of the young men of this generation is being undermined insidiously by the promulgation of these deadly doubts; knowing all this he is in earnest in his work, and his argument is a masterpiece of skill. If any reader remains unconvinced after reading Dr. Edersheim's book, he will nevertheless admit that the destructive critics have not a monopoly of learning and ability. P. 392. Price, $2.50. Published by Messrs. Anson D. F. Randolph & Company, New York.

An error was inadvertently made in these columns last week, which we wish to correct.

In a notice of the excellent work of Dr. Thain Davidson, entitled "Talks with Young Men," it was stated that its price was $2.50. The publishers, Messrs. A. C. Armstrong & Co., of New York, write us that the price is $1.50.

QUIET RESTING-PLACES.

"READ it again, sir," pleaded, in plaintive tones, a dying woman. "Quiet resting-places—quiet resting-places—it sounds nice. It's very noisy here in this awful court; one couldn't pray, if one knew how, in the midst of the drunkenness and quarrelling."

So, once more, Mr. Leslie read: "My people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, and in sure dwellings, and in quiet resting-places." Verse after verse, showing God's way of salvation, had Mr. Leslie repeated that afternoon; but none had spoken to the heart of the poor weary woman like this one.

"Quiet resting-places; quiet resting-places, sir! It takes me back to long ago when I was a girl at home, when, my day's work done, I used to climb up into the nut tree, and rest on my leafy seat, to listen to the ripple of the brook, and think of Jamie, for he was not then as he is now, but as bonnie a lad as ever won a woman's heart; that was quiet and restful-like, sir."

"Quiet resting-places," again she almost moaned. "Oh, sir, if you only knew how quiet my heart is! I think if it were all quiet outside, still it would be all in a tumult like here," she said, placing her hand on her breast. "Oh, the thoughts that will keep rushing up—thoughts of the past, thoughts of the future! If I could only find rest—rest, that is what I want, a quiet resting-place."

"Let me show you a striking contrast to this promise," and Mr. Leslie read from Jer. 50: 6, 19, and 20: "My people hath been lost sheep; . . . they have turned them away on the mountain; they have gone from mountain to hill, they have forgotten their resting-place. And I will bring Israel again to his habitation. . . . In those days . . . the iniquity of Israel shall be sought for, and there shall be none, . . . for I will pardon them whom I reserve." "You have forgotten," added Mr. Leslie, "He is bringing back His lost one."

"If I only knew how to come to Him—oh, where is He? I cannot find Him; and I have so wanted Him since that day in the mission-room when they sang,

'There is rest for the weary, there is rest for you.'

"My little boy can sing it all now; but I cannot get it; it cannot be for me."

"Suppose," said Mr. Leslie, "Jesus, the sinner's Friend, came, with His pierced hands, and brow marked by the crown of thorns, and stood beside you, and said, 'Come unto me, . . . and I will give you rest; 'what would you say?'

"I think my mother's verse would do for me, too; you know she loved Him. It was:

'Just as I am—though tossed about,
With many a conflict, many a doubt;
Fightings within, and fears without,
O Lamb of God, I come.'

"Will you say it now to Him?" gently asked the clergyman, "for He is here, close to you, waiting for you to answer."

"Will He take me? Is He here? Wasn't there something about not casting out? Oh, I will come—I do come—save me—take all my sins away—give me rest."

"Amen," said the clergyman, softly; "the Master has heard and answered. The quiet resting-place is yours for He maketh the storm a calm—then are they glad because they be quiet. So He bringeth them unto their desired haven."

AN AFGHAN SACRIFICE.

It is remarkable how many of the customs of the inhabitants of Afghanistan indicate a Hebrew origin. The superstitions and corruptions connected with their belief and their worship are numerous, but there seems to underlie all of them a basis of revelation. If we can imagine a race sprung from a few families who had either lived in Palestine before Christ, or had been intimately associated with the Hebrews, and then had been shut out voluntarily or by circumstances from further light, and had groped and groped in the darkness after God, "if haply they might find Him," our conception would be of such a race as these Afghans. A singular illustration of this fact occurred during a recent journey made by Sir Peter Lumsden. He is the commissioner sent out by the British Government to agree upon and define the frontier between Afghanistan and Asiatic Russia. The Czar delayed sending a commission to meet him, Russia having crafty designs which could be advanced by the delay. So Sir Peter Lumsden has been kept waiting there for more than a year. The scene depicted in our illustration occurred during a journey across the Persian frontier. It is described by Mr. Simpson, one of the party, as follows:

"The word, 'korbanieh' means the act of sacrificing, and it seems to be a common ceremony practised in this locality. When any one is ill, a sheep is sacrificed to insure recovery. On this occasion, when Sir Peter Lumsden was arriving at Miandasht, a number of people belonging to the place stood in a row on the left; and we saw three men in the middle of the road with a sheep. As we neared them, one of the men, who had a knife, cut the animal's throat, and severed the head, which he lifted, and throwing it high in the air, it fell at the side of the way. The right thing to do is to ride past between the body of the sheep and the head, which Sir Peter did, the people to the left bowing their heads and salaaming as he passed. Sometimes the visitor in whose honor the sheep is killed stops his horse close to the sheep, when it would have been killed close to the horse's feet, and some of the blood would have been sprinkled on the hoofs. The people understanding that this part of the operation might not have been agreeable on the present occasion, it was dispensed with. The ceremony was repeated next day on Sir Peter's arrival at Abbasabad. At none of the towns on our coming from Teheran was this done till the arrival at Miandasht. It may be assumed that the rite is a survival from the pre-Mohammedan period, for it does not seem to belong to the simplicity which characterizes the worship of Islam."

Isabel's Visit to Gertrude's Aged Friend.

GERTRUDE'S SUBSTITUTE.

"SURELY you are not going out, Gertrude?" said a young lady, who, entering her sister's room, saw her dressing for an excursion. "You know the doctor said you must not think of leaving the house while these east winds are blowing. Dear Gertrude, do not go; it is madness, with your throat not near well."

"I must go, Isabel," was the reply. "I am doing myself more harm by fretting than the east wind could do me. It is three weeks since I went, and my poor friends will miss me so much. No one else goes near them, and they cannot read for themselves so as to understand."

"How you do sacrifice yourself for those old women, Gertrude! I don't believe they care so much as you think for your Bible-reading. I guess you take them tea or tobacco, and they submit to the reading on that account. But this is more imprudent than anything you have done yet. You really must not go. I would sooner go myself than you should put your life in peril."

"Ah! if you would go and see two or three of them, I should be content," said Gertrude. "They are not so selfish as you think; they would be really glad to see you."

"But I could not talk to them as you do. If they were to ask me to expound, I should not know how to do it. They will expect a little sermon after the reading, will they not?"

"No," said Gertrude, sadly, "not those I am anxious for you to visit; they are pious old women. They will be quite content with your reading to them. But do not be flippant, dear; rather pray to God to open your eyes to see spiritual things for yourself; then you would rejoice to expound, as you call it."

Isabel loved her sister too well to raise any further objections, and dressing quickly was soon on her way to the homes of two of the old women to whom Gertrude was a ministering angel. In the first house she entered an aged woman, clean and neat in her appearance, was seated at a spinning-wheel. Many years ago, in the old country, she, a young girl then, had spent many an hour at her grandmother's side by the wheel, and had learned to spin with so much dexterity that she had charmed the old woman's heart. The same old wheel had passed into her girlish hands by her grandmother's dying wish, and had been brought across the Atlantic with her to be an amusement and an occupation for her in her own old age.

Isabel greeted her kindly, and explaining her sister's absence, asked if she might read to her. The eagerness of the old woman's response showed how welcome to her Isabel's offer was. "I never was much of a scholar, miss," she said; "when I was young and in the old country schools were not so plentiful as they are here, and now I'm old and my eyes are failing, reading is harder than ever. I'd take it kindly if ye did read me a chapter."

"Is there any chapter in particular you would like me to read?" Isabel asked, seating herself and opening her Bible.

"It's all good, miss; read anywhere; maybe you have a favorite chapter. I like to hear about the mansions, for I shall soon be there; but I shall enjoy any of it."

Isabel turned to the fourteenth chapter of John, and read about the mansions, as the aged woman suggested, her hearer listening intently.

"Don't you think it was strange, miss," she said, as Isabel finished, "that Thomas didn't know the way? I've often thought it was. Seems to me if he'd wanted to know it he might have learned, being with the Lord Himself. I suppose it was then like it is now: folks need to be told over and over again, and then they don't know. Should you think, miss, when the Lord told Thomas He was the way that he understood Him?"

Isabel turned back to the sixth verse, and read it again. This old woman seemed to regard the passage as real history, while Isabel had read it then as she had read it at home, and listened to it in church, without interest, as a familiar tale.

"Perhaps Thomas didn't know even then," the old woman continued; "he would know afterward, though, when the Lord was crucified. But it seems strange that any one should read about it now and still not know. Thank God, that's not you nor me, miss. It's an awful thing to be so blind."

Isabel said nothing, for she would not grieve the old lady by telling her that she was not a Christian as her sister was. She read one or two Psalms, and then hurried away, lest she should betray herself. The other woman to whom she had promised to go was not at home, and Isabel's promise being kept, she gladly returned home. She thought she had dismissed the whole thing from her mind, but a greater than she took care that it was not so dismissed. The old woman's words, "It's an awful thing," continually recurred to her, and with them the plain statement of Christ, "I am the way, the truth, and the life." The Holy Spirit was at work in her heart, and before the next day was over Isabel was in her sister's room begging Gertrude to show her the way of salvation.

THE JEW'S WAR.

A SERIAL STORY.

On the Witness-stand.

CAROLA was advised to keep herself closely within doors till the trial was over, and the excitement abated. She spent most of her time in the garret overlooking the river; her heart laden now with many a heavy burden both of the past and the future. She wondered how she could have forgotten that past all these years, and lived her happy, pure, and simple life in the country. She loathed it with an absolute loathing. And yet, if she could but go among these people, her childhood's associates, and win them to Christ, and to God, oh, how willingly would she dwell among them once more! Perhaps this was what her Lord would have her to do. The future was not altogether dark as she thought of what she could do for them, and how she would lift them out of their misery into the peace which possessed her own soul.

But nothing could be done till the trial was over. Once she showed herself in the street, and she was instantly surrounded by her old neighbors. It was strange to them and to herself to mark the difference there was between what she was and what she had been. Here was Carola, who had been first and foremost in all their street brawls and wrangles, standing in their midst, a sweet, gentle, gracious woman, widely apart from them. They were of the lowest and most degraded type, and she was a modest and lady-like girl. They did not like the change; it was too great for them. But if she did what was right for George Bassett, and he got off clear, she would be their favorite once more, in spite of all.

So Carola's welcome to the haunts of her childhood was conditional. She was expected to deliver her former lover, to stand by her order in society, and not to take sides with the police, who were generally regarded as the foes of that order. If she failed in that she would be regarded as a traitor, and they showed clearly that her presence among them would not be endured. It seemed to Carola as if the whole world had turned against her. The Arnolds had shown plainly that she would not be welcomed among them on account of her tainted past, and those to whom they had sent her were turning against her and would cast her out if she obeyed her conscience. Old friends and new ones alike turned their backs upon her.

But the Arnolds were not without some compunction. It cost them an effort to disobey Christ and follow the maxims of the world. Carola would have been easier in mind if she had known what they were suffering and that they were acting reluctantly. Philip especially suffered acutely.

When he went out into the frosty night of the Christmas-day which had been the happiest day of his life, he felt as if death would have been a far less bitter ending to it than this terrible shock of disaster. He, almost mechanically, yet half-conscious of a set purpose, retraced the paths which he had wandered along with Carola that afternoon. At every step he could recall her words, the tender tones of her low voice, the light that lay in her shining eyes, the most modest and sweetest grace he had ever seen in woman. All that was best in him had been attracted to her. He felt that if he was to lead the truest life possible to him it must be at her side; no other woman in the world could so help him to be what he might be.

That was all over. By her own confession she was a woman whom it would be utter disgrace to marry. Her birth, her early home and training, her whole life, till a few years ago, had been such as to render her totally unfit to be his wife. He had overlooked her inferior station in spite of the dissatisfaction openly expressed by his father and mother. But she was not the frank, simple Christian girl, the pure, innocent girl who had stolen into his heart the first moment he saw her. How was it possible that she could have been all she had been, so sweet, and fair, and winsome, and yet have been so base a thing, so steeped in vice and wickedness? No; she was utterly unworthy to enter his honored and unstained home.

It was after midnight before he returned home, and found only his mother sitting up for him. She had hoped that being alone he would have poured out his heart to her; but he could not help remembering how reluctantly she had yielded to the persistence of his love, and he did not expect to meet with real sympathy from her. There would be the element of triumph in it, which would spoil all its efficacy. Yet when he found Carola gone the next morning before he was down, he wished he had been told of her intention to leave them at once. He would fain have seen her once more, if only to bid her farewell forever.

During the course of the day two policemen from Market Upton came to the Grange to inquire after Carola. A bevy of the cottagers gathered together in the great kitchen, and with a slow and cautious enjoyment of the strange excitement, discussed the events over point by point. Such a thing had never occurred in Hazelmount before; nobody had ever been associated with a murder, and it was almost a subject of congratulation that it had been none of the villagers themselves, but their school-mistress only, who had been the witness of it. For all at once Carola was a stranger, a foreigner again; one whose forefathers had not been known, and who might therefore be capable of many misdeeds of which no native of Hazelmount could be guilty.

"She could not have hidden it if she would," said Mrs. Arnold to her husband.

"She did not know that," he answered; "it was a free confession, poor girl!"

When the day of trial drew near Philip could no longer control his desire to see Carola again. Two or three of his acquaintances from Market Upton, relatives of the murdered man, were going up to London to be present at it; and he resolved, not to accompany them, but to go alone, and privately. Perhaps if he saw Carola in the witness-box, and heard her tell her story in public, it would effectually uproot the love which he felt powerless to destroy.

The court was crowded, for George Bassett had many boon companions, whose time was of little value, and the excitement of a trial their chief pleasure. Philip could not have crushed in but for a policeman from Market Upton, who knew him, and made a way for him. He found himself in the back of a closely packed assemblage; a crowd of the lowest class of the London poor, haggard, squalid, and stunted, dressed in dirty rags and dingy finery, with faces of a lower type than he had ever seen before. These were Carola's people, her kinsmen, the class she had sprung from. Her name was in all their mouths; George Bassett and Carola, they were linked together with hideous familiarity.

When the prisoner was placed in the dock Philip forced himself to take minute notice of his brutal, dissipated face, his bloodshot eye, his heavy jaws and bull-dog neck, even to a large black wart on his large cheek. His eyes seemed fastened to that repulsive face; and he stood staring at it, hearing nothing and taking no heed of time in a sort of bewildered trance, until he heard Carola Fielding called as a witness.

There was a thrill of excitement in everybody about him. Yes; there she stood, and he groaned half audibly as he turned his eyes toward her. For a moment the image of her as he had first seen her, facing the setting sun, and singing as the birds sing, crossed his mind. But the sunny face was pale as death now, and the shining eyes were dim, those eyes that always shone with the light of joy and peace. And now there is not a sound in the court. The solemn oath has been administered to her, and she is looking across at the prisoner to identify him, and all her face quivers for an instant.

Yes; she knows him. Many questions are put to her, and she answers them simply and modestly; but her voice has an undertone of anguish as she replies to some of them.

"Yes. George Bassett had been called her lover; and he had kissed her once."

"Yes; she had been drinking the night her grandmother died; but she was not drunk. She had been drunk in the streets sometimes."

"How can she say it and live?" cried Philip to himself. He had not taken his eyes off the sweet, pale face, and the unconscious grace and sorrow of the girl's bearing. It was almost as if some innocent child was accusing itself of an impossible sin. But the people around Philip, when her testimony was given, cursed her with terrible and bitter curses for not saving her sweetheart; and he pushed his way out, heart-stricken, and given up to despair.

He hastened to leave London; for what good would it do to see Carola again? The two faces he had gazed upon were indelibly graven in association on his brain. George Bassett, a coarse and sensual brute, with his evil eye of recognition and terror fixed upon Carola. It haunted him, and seemed as if it must usurp the image of Carola, and reign over his memory in its stead. What a horrible remembrance to dwell in his tranquil home, and to walk about the old lands with him!

Home appeared dark and mournful as he travelled toward it. How could he take up life again, and tread the accustomed paths, and pursue the trivial round of every-day work? Every spot of his old homestead and farm would be desecrated by the remembrance of Carola. If she had died only, he might have cherished every thought of her, as of one who had gone to be among the angels, from whom she had seemed to come. But what a degraded reality was this!

He could not utter a word either to his father or mother when he reached home; and they kept silence, seeing how bitter his trouble was. But the next morning there came a letter for Mr. Arnold, which he read aloud to his wife and son, before they separated for the day's work.

"I asked you if I might write," said Carola, "and you told me I might. I want you to understand and not to blame me too much. I have just come back from the court where they are trying George Bassett. I do not know what his sentence will be; but I had to answer some questions which you will not understand when you hear them at Hazelmount."

"I was born in this garret where I am writing. My father and mother were dead, and my grandmother was bed-ridden. I had to go about the streets for all that we wanted, especially to the gin-palaces, for she used to drink a great deal of gin. We lived as if we were very poor; I was often hungry, and always ragged. But as far as I was concerned myself I was where God had placed me. I did not choose my birthplace or my kindred."

"But I should have been as wicked and miserable as the other girls I knew but for an old Jew, whose house we lodged in. It seems to me now that he is the best man I ever knew. I did not know what I owed to him; as far as possible he kept me from harm and ruin, and the only thing I did to grieve him was to drink a little of what my grandmother was always drinking. I was in danger of becoming a drunkard; but I never drank habitually, and I did not know it was wrong. Even Matthias could not tell me it was breaking one of the ten commandments, which he taught me and was so earnest for me to keep."

"My grandmother died when I was nearly eighteen; and at her funeral the chaplain gave me his New Testament. I had never heard of my Lord Jesus Christ, and it was all new to me—every word. Oh, if I had only words to tell you what it was like for me to find out suddenly that Jesus Christ had lived in this world, and died to save us! There was so much I had to be saved from; and Matthias had never been sure that his God would receive me. I had found my Lord, and it was all a new life to me. Then I went to a clergyman, and told him I wanted to go to a school where I could learn all about Jesus Christ, and he sent me to that school in the country where Mrs. Stewart chose me to come to Hazelmount and be the village school-mistress there."

"I want to say that I scarcely ever thought of all my bad former life. Every day was so filled up with pleasant work, and I was so happy, that it seems to me now I had not time to think about it. Old Matthias Levi was so angry at me for becoming a Christian he never wrote to me; and whenever the recollection of him came across my mind I drove it from me, because he had cursed my Lord, and was like the Jews that crucified Him. So it seemed to me then, but now I know better. He had never known Jesus Christ; and the people here, whom he thinks are Christians, are enough to make him hate Christianity. I have promised him I will never leave him, but will take care of him as if I were his daughter."

"I think if I stay here with the people among whom I was born I may do them good, and win some of them to believe in Christ, for they do not know Him; they are like those who crucified Him; and He said, 'Father, forgive them; they know not what they do.' I have money enough for myself, and I can give all my time to them. If that is what God will have me to do, I shall be a better servant to Him, perhaps, and I shall be happier by and by, perhaps, in this miserable and wicked place than if I lived at Hazelmount, which is like paradise to me. Oh, yes! I begin to see that our Lord, though He was a man of sorrows, was happier here, saving the world, than if He had stayed forever in heaven at the right hand of God."

"Do not think that if any of you had asked me any questions I should not have told you. I was not willfully silent. But what else could I have done than what I did? As soon as I knew about Jesus Christ I loved Him and believed in Him, and He forgave my sins, and saved me from all my misery. I could not blot out all those years when I knew nothing.

"George Bassett was not my lover. I always dreaded him, and hid myself away from him; but he kissed me once against my will. I was only seventeen then.

"This is what I have to say to you. I shall not see any of you again, because I know how degraded I must seem in your sight. But oh, do not think more hardly of me than you need think! Be a little sorry for me, because my life was all spoiled before it was in my own hands. Yet it is not all spoiled; that was a wrong thing to say. Nothing can alter the love my Lord has for me, and I can be His servant anywhere. If the gate of my paradise is closed against me, He has opened the gate of heaven to all believers."

"I see what her life has been pretty clearly, poor child!" said Mr. Arnold, folding up the letter.

"Very sad!" responded Mrs. Arnold; "but nothing can alter the fact that she was born amid vice and sin—among the lowest of the low. She could never come here to be Philip's wife and the mother of his children. That could never be. We owe some duty to our ancestors, and to our descendants."

Neither Mr. Arnold nor Philip made any reply; but when, later in the day, she asked her husband for Carola's letter, he said he had given it to Philip, and she did not think it wise to reopen the subject with him.

None of them knew that Carola had gone into imminent danger in doing what she did. They did not realize the noble heroism of her act. Carola knew, however, that she would have to face the fiercest indignation of her old associates, who would have applauded her she perjured herself to save her early associate from the gallows. Even she was not prepared for the savage outburst of fury that took place.

CHRIST OUR EXAMPLE.

S. S. Lesson for May 10, Phil. 2: 5-16. Golden Text, 1 Pet. 2: 21. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Passive Attitude—Power to Hinder not to Help—Difference in Trials—Those from God—Those Caused by Stupid People—How to Behave in Strife—Trials from Associates—The Secret of Christ's Life—How to Work out Salvation—The Unmurmuring Worker.

"Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus." The Apostle does not say make this mind to be in you, he does not exhort us to imitate the Lord Jesus by any power which is latent in us. He says

"LET."
Writing as he does to "the saints in Christ Jesus which are at Philippi" (Phil. 1: 1), he infers that which he expressed to the Corinthians—"We have the mind of Christ" (1 Cor. 2: 16); now, give place to His mind, let His mind transmute yours. It is as though he had said "You have nothing to do but to abstain from putting hindrance in the way. Christ in you will do and be all that God wills, if you only let Him; you cannot produce the mind of Christ, but you can either hinder it, or let it rule you."

What, then, is the mind of Christ? In the preceding verses Paul exhorted the Philippian church to be "likeminded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind." It was the last earnest prayer of the Lord Jesus, "That they all may be one; as Thou, Father, art in me, and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that Thou hast sent me" (John 17: 21). God the Holy Trinity is a perfect oneness of three wills, and thus God the Trinity is Love. There is no self in the Godhead, and God calls His church to be on earth what the Godhead is in heaven, a perfect unity of wills, made one by being voluntarily and completely yielded up to a superior will, which is good, acceptable, and perfect. It is comparatively easy to bow to the will of God in those things in which no human being but ourselves has anything to do; when, for instance, a dearly loved one is taken from us, or when a crop is lost through change in the weather, or when anything comes without human intervention. But some of our most galling trials come upon us through relations or fellow-Christians, who, conscientiously on their part, put a pressure upon us to force us contrary to what we see to be the will of God. Or, again, when they habitually depreciate us, so that we come into one of two temptations: either that of standing on the defensive, which is of the earth earthly, or of losing all heart in the work of God in our hands, which is equally of the flesh. Paul shows us the plain, blessed way of the Spirit of God.

"Let nothing be done through strife." It takes two to strive; if another commences, we are not obliged to take part, we may gently but firmly refuse to argue. "But in lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves." Thank God, this is possible. "What, even if another commences strife, can the one who refuses to strive esteem him better than himself?" Yes, honestly; he may see that Satan is pressing his friend hard, and that only the grace of God keeps himself from taking part in the strife, so that there is not one iota of credit due to him, and then nothing but love will remain in his heart, and the friend, when the Lord conquers him, will find no wounded feeling to meet him, but only

THE MIND OF CHRIST.

I can hear some say, "Ah, that is just what I want; but when my husband says the most galling and bitter things, which are quite unjust, I can't help a wounded feeling rising up. Or when my associate in the work of God will assume the control of a father confessor, I feel, I must free myself from a tyranny which comes between me and God. Or, again, when my sister will assume a responsibility about my bodily health, and tease me up as though the Lord were not my Healer, I must break out from a bondage which is sapping the very life of my faith, and which hinders my relations with God." Dear friends, here is God permitting a state of things in which you may have the opportunity of handing all over to Jesus: husband, sister, friend, health, all, and you have the opportunity of esteeming that you, who have perhaps taken Jesus as your all, are far less to be esteemed than they, seeing you have not counted it all joy when you fell into these temptations; and you have not let patience have her perfect work (James 1: 2, 3).

Jesus is waiting to put His mind into you, and to maintain His mind in you. While "with man it is impossible to see God in all these things and to rejoice in them, with God all things are possible." And blessed be God, Jesus let into the heart to have full control and complete management, can live no other life but His own there. Have this mind in you which was also in Christ Jesus; who, being in the form of God, counted it not a prize to be on an equality with God, but

EMPTIED HIMSELF

[Rev. Ver.] Here was the secret of His whole life, Jesus emptied Himself. He came to express His Father, not Himself, and that in the life of man, not that of God. All the time He lived on earth He was God as much as He is God now in heaven, and yet He did not live His God-life on earth, but was always the anointed Man, the man full of the Holy Ghost. As man He preached, but with the Spirit of the Lord upon Him (Luke 4: 18); as man He cast out devils and healed the sick. "If I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you" (Matt. 12: 28). "If I do not do the works of my Father, believe me not" (John 10: 37). All His life Jesus walked as self-emptying man, in the life and power of another. "Have this mind in you," just as self-emptying, just as nothing, as He was; live Christ, or rather let Christ live in you. Thank God, it is possible; thank God, it is His will for every one of us.

He "emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself, becoming obedient even unto death—yea, the death of the cross" [Rev. Ver.]. Every step was from lowliness to lowliness, from nothing to nothing, from shame to shame. And therefore God hath "highly exalted Him and given Him a name which is above every name." Only into emptiness can God pour His fullness; only where the mind of man gives way before Him and abdicates all the place can the mind of Christ triumph. God has made the name of that one self-empty man to be a name in which every knee shall bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, and the day shall come when every tongue—the tongue of the infidel and the tongue of the Jew, the tongue of the Mohammedan and the tongue of the Brahmin, the tongue of the dumb and the tongue of the idiot, shall confess by the power of the Holy Ghost, that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

"Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling. How? By letting the mind of Christ be in you.

OUR WORK IS TO LET GOD WORK.

"This is the work of God, that ye believe on Him whom He hath sent" (John 6: 29). Work, by letting self go before the presence of Jesus, who comes to take its place by filling you with His own mind. Work by letting another work, for it is God which worketh in you to do all the rest, "to will and to do of His good pleasure." Self-emptiness does not count on self-doing anything or being anything, does not defend itself or depreciate itself, but ignores itself, puts itself out of the question. But you may say, "if I set myself out of this, I shall be reminded of myself all the time." Yes, indeed, and this is why we need not set ourselves to this work. We let Jesus' mind be in us, and He works the rest; we fall back, He takes the place; we give Him the ground, He occupies it. And this working of His is in us if we let it, to obey which follow—"Do all things without murmurings and disputing"—i.e., never in anything whatsoever either murmur or dispute. Should a Brahmin or a Mohammedan, who had never met with a Christian, ask the question, "What is a Christian like?" the answer should be, "A man who is never heard to murmur, and whom you cannot draw into a dispute." "That ye may be blameless and harmless, children of God without blemish, among whom ye are seen as lights in the world, holding forth the word of life" [Rev. Ver.]. God's working alone can make and keep you blameless and harmless, children of God without blemish. Paul calls his converts here Bible candlesticks. Shining as lights holding forth the word of life, and they gladden the heart of Paul the prisoner, for he saw that he had not run in vain, neither labored in vain.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES—Sackville Street Dublin.

THE ROYAL OLIVE BRANCH.

ONE of the wisest and most advanced members of the British Parliament recently spoke of the "cast-iron benevolence of foreigners." The phrase happily described the policy of England toward Ireland. Of benevolence of late years there has been plenty, but it has been the benevolence of foreigners. Though the two islands are geographically near to each other, the difference between the two peoples is as marked as though one island was in the Arctic, and the other in the torrid zone. Englishmen do not understand the Irish people, have never tried to understand them; and, therefore, the boons they have flung to them have been the gifts of foreigners. A glance at the map will convince any one that Ireland must be in union with England, but there is no necessity for that union to be the union of slavery. If England would study our own system of government, and consider that Louisiana and Vermont are in the character of their citizens as widely separated as are England and Ireland, and are yet living amicably under the same flag, and are equally loyal to that flag, she might learn how to manage Ireland and save both countries a world of misery. But she has let Ireland severely alone with the landlord's agent, and the policeman, and she wonders that a country so held down is not happy and loyal. The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales should lead to a more enlightened view of the trouble. England ought not to infer from the demonstrations of loyalty that Ireland is content, and nothing more need be done for her; she should rather see that the welcome tendered is a sign that there is material in Ireland even yet, out of which wise statesmanship may produce a better order of things, and that personal sympathy, proofs of personal confidence and good-will, evidences of a sincere desire to foster friendly feeling are the first steps to be taken toward amicable relations.

THE PRINCE OF WALES.

ALBERT EDWARD, Prince of Wales, the eldest son of the Queen and the heir-apparent to the throne, was born at Buckingham Palace, London, November 9th, 1841, and is now in his forty-fourth year. According to the practice which has prevailed for more than five hundred years, he was created Prince of Wales about three weeks after his birth. He is also, by inheritance, the Duke of Cornwall, which Duchy yields him an annual revenue of over $300,000.

While his early education was carefully conducted by tutors, his father, the late Prince Consort, may be said to have been his chief instructor until he went to college. His education was completed at Edinburgh, Oxford, and Cambridge.

HIS TRAVELS.

Perhaps the most interesting feature in the more public life of the Prince of Wales has been his travels to various parts of the world. When he was little more than a youth he began his travels by going on a tour through Germany and Switzerland; after this he visited Ireland, where he became exceedingly popular among all classes of society.

He next visited Germany, and afterward Rome. Canada was visited in 1860, and there his reception was most loyal and cordial. In fact, the Canadians were at a loss for expressions of loyalty strong and deep enough to convey their joy in having their Queen's son among them. From Canada the Prince travelled to the United States, and in New York and other great centres of influence received a hearty welcome becoming to the position the young man occupied as the future head of a nation allied to us by blood and language. These visits were made during vacation time, and as a relief from his studies at Cambridge, whither he returned when term began.

MEETING PRINCESS ALEXANDRA.

While upon one of these tours he paid a visit which was to have an important bearing upon his future life. He was returning to England from Belgium, when he met, for the first time, the Princess Alexandra, of Denmark. He was precluded by law from marrying any one but a royal lady, and also from marrying a Roman Catholic. Hence the circle of his choice was limited to a very few ladies, among whom the daughters of the King of Denmark were the most prominent. The interview resulted in a mutual feeling of affection. They were married on March 10th, 1863, the ceremony being one of the utmost magnificence. Its issue has been three sons and three daughters, the youngest son dying in infancy.

Perhaps no event in the history of the Prince of Wales showed more clearly the high place he occupied in the nation's interest than his dangerous illness toward the close of the year 1871, when he was afflicted with typhoid fever, and for some weeks it was feared that he would die. The Prince was at that time residing at Sandringham, in Norfolk, and telegrams were despatched several times a day and published in every city and town in the kingdom, giving particulars of his condition. These were for some time read with the gravest anxiety, and special prayers were offered, in places of worship generally, that, if consistent with the will of the All-wise, his life might be spared. At last, to the relief of the nation, the Prince was pronounced to be out of danger, and eventually, on February 27th, 1872, the Queen and her son went to St. Paul's Cathedral, publicly to return thanks for his restoration to health.

In 1875 the Prince visited India and made a royal progress through that wonderful country. A series of brilliant receptions were held in his honor, and the native princes vied with each other in entertaining him and loading him with costly presents.

The Prince is a man of the most genial disposition. He is remarkable for his affability and friendliness. He has a wonderful memory, and, it is stated, never forgets the face and name of any one he has once seen. Some very remarkable anecdotes are told of his power in that respect. The better class of English people, however, see with deep regret that his moral life is not so pure as that of his father. The temptations incidental to his position and his own easy disposition led to his falling an easy prey to vice. Of late years, especially since his illness, there have been welcome intimations made from time to time of an improvement in this matter. It may be hoped they are true, for the English aristocracy are much influenced by the example of the monarch, and such a court as that over which George IV. presided might seriously lower the standard of morality in all ranks of society.

THE PRINCESS OF WALES.

THE good and charming lady whose portrait accompanies that of her husband on the frontispiece has won the hearts of the English people by her grace, amiability, sweet patience, and general loveliness of character. She is now in her forty-first year, having been born in the Royal Palace at Copenhagen, on December 1st, 1844. The early years of the Princess Alexandra were spent at the palace situated in the street called Amalgegade, in Copenhagen. This has been the town residence of her parents ever since the day of their marriage, and all their children were born and educated here. It has been the home of a most exemplary and happy family, and is full of sweet remembrances to the Princess of Wales.

EARLY DAYS AND COURTSHIP.

Those who had the happiness of knowing the Princess in the days of her girlhood describe her as characterized by pure and refined tastes, and giving evidence of fine mental abilities; but they refer especially to the sweetness of her disposition, and to her early popularity in her native land, where she laid aside the hauteur royal personages generally have, and mixed freely with the people. The announcement of her betrothal to the Prince of Wales caused a general interest to be felt in England toward her, and when the people learned how noble and lovable and virtuous she was, they hailed the proposed union with pleasure.

LEAVES DENMARK.

The announcement, in Copenhagen, toward the close of February, 1863, that the Princess Alexandra was about to quit the home of her early years, was the signal for public demonstrations in her honor, which sufficiently testified to the high esteem in which she was held. She was accompanied on her journey to England by her parents and her eldest brother, and attended by a numerous suite. The welcome she received on her arrival was enthusiastic, and her beauty, grace, and dignity were the subject of public congratulation.

The marriage took place on March 10th, 1863. From that time until the present the Princess has been growing in public esteem. She has been a devoted wife and mother, and in both capacities has displayed those sweet womanly qualities which good people always appreciate. Her position has been one of extreme delicacy, the Prince being surrounded by vicious and dissolute men, to whom he has extended the hospitalities of his house. Nevertheless, the tongue of scandal, which has been so busy with her husband's name, has never uttered a whisper against hers. During his illness her devotion to him was constant; she watched continually at his bedside, and the only time she left the house during those long weeks of anxiety was when the congregation at the village church was praying for the Prince's recovery, and she went to join in their prayers. There is in all England to-day no more popular lady than Alexandra, Princess of Wales.

THE ROYAL VISIT TO IRELAND.

THE picture on the first page represents Sackville Street, the "Broadway" of Dublin. It is a magnificent street of unusual width, and its buildings compare favorably with those of any capital in the world. Dublin has been called the capital of the English in Ireland, and so, in fact, Irishmen regard it. The time, however, is past when the city was treated by the English as a capital. The mansions of the nobility once full of life and gayety, stand empty and silent; their owners away in London or some European capital spending the money that they formerly spent in Dublin. Misery, discontent, almost despair sit like a heavy pall on the city, and Nelson from the top of his column in Sackville Street looks down on a scene of squalid wretchedness unequalled in any other city. Why this is so, is too long a story to tell here, but the sudden change that came over the capital last month, when it put on new life, shook off its torpor, and arrayed itself in bunting and flowers to welcome its Royal visitors, is significant of much that the English aristocracy might meditate upon with advantage. The population of Dublin proper is 249,602, but in the suburbs, notably in the fashionable suburb of Kingstown is a population almost equal to that of the city itself, and which in the daytime flows into Dublin on business or pleasure.

On Tuesday, April 7th, the Prince and Princess of Wales, accompanied by their eldest son, Prince Albert Victor, left London for Holyhead, where they arrived at midnight, and the following morning, about eleven, they reached Kingstown, Dublin Bay. On landing they were received by the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, Earl Spencer, and an address of welcome was presented by the Town Commissioners. The train speedily conveyed them to Dublin, where other addresses of welcome were presented. They then proceeded to the Castle.

On the very next day the Prince of Wales showed that he had not paid his visit to the rich and aristocratic people only, by personally making of the city. From the one class as from the other he received a respectful and enthusiastic greeting. It is stated that the idea of visiting Ireland first occurred to his Royal Highness while sitting on the Commission to inquire into the condition of the London poor, and he did not hesitate when he arrived in the country to see for himself a type of the dirty dwelling-places of the very poor. Unhappily, there was no necessity to wander far from the Castle to find the most squalid of the Dublin population.

The Prince of Wales and his son, accompanied only by Captain Hammond and Mr. Francis Knollys, left the Castle by the private bridge communicating with the gardens, and, entering a carriage without escort, proceeded at once to the foul slum which, with its bird fanciers' shops, and other still more offensive places, closely resembles the notorious thoroughfare in London known as Seven Dials. Prince Albert Victor had this fact impressed upon him very seriously, for in stepping from the carriage he came into collision with a heap of vegetable refuse lying putrefying in the open air, and measured his tall length upon the ground.

The royal party were piloted through this district by Dr. Cameron, the superintendent medical officer of health. They saw an unsavoury specimen of

A TENEMENT OF THE LOWEST CLASS,

The houses in the narrow lane are of four stories, and were once perhaps wholesome and respectable. The house through which the Prince passed still maintained a mahogany balustrade, which was handsome, and in other days its inhabitants were evidently not persons to be regarded as warnings and examples. Dr. Cameron explained the character of the place as the party went up the creaking stairs.

The broken flooring, dilapidated roof, the vaults of sanitary accommodation, were all commented upon freely by the royal visitor, who eloquently expressed his sympathy for the occupants. The Prince openly denounced the apathy which allowed such dwellings to exist, plainly intimating what his opinions were of the owners.

During the time this work of inspection was proceeding the word went round that the Prince was there, and immediately the occupants of all the other houses in the lane rushed out, and in a brogue peculiar to the neighborhood expressed their wonder. The Prince now found himself at the door, with a mob of as uncouth and wild-looking men, women, and children about as could be imagined; but from their attitude it was quickly seen that the people were not hostile. The Prince received them with smiles, and quickly cheer upon cheer was given. The youngsters, almost naked, shouted themselves hoarse, and men and women offered hands, which the Prince, without demur, shook heartily. The picture presented of the heir to the British throne thus handshaking with the most wretched of Dublin's citizens at their own door will not be soon forgotten by those who witnessed it. The old people, amazed at the gentility of the Prince, showered blessings on his head. The Prince with some difficulty got away.

In the drive through Bridge Street, Cannon Place, and by St. Patrick's Cathedral, all thoroughfares inhabited by the humblest citizens, a genuine welcome was accorded. A visit was then made to which have been erected in the locality known as the Coombe-area, where the Chairman and Secretary of the Artisans' Dwellings Company pointed out the merits of the model cottages which are here erected. A more distant block of a similar description, built by Mr. E. Cecil Guinness, was next inspected. Mr. Guinness himself received the royal party, and conducted him through the buildings. From first to last there was no change in the pleased appearance of the people, and the Prince was received with cheers wherever he went. He then visited or veteran soldiers at Kilmainham. The pensioners were mustered by General Sir Thomas Steele, the commander of the forces in Ireland, and among them were some Crimean soldiers.

THE ROYAL HOSPITAL

The old fellows were delighted at the kindly notice taken of them by the Prince, and were especially gratified by his military salute, and the "I am very glad to see you, my friends," with which he took leave after their exercises.

On the same day the Prince held for the reception of gentlemen. All the Protestant Church dignitaries, hundreds of military officers, deputy-lieutenants, and nearly every representative man attended. The 16th Lancers performed music in the Upper Castle Yard, Dublin, during the reception in the throne-room, which was expected to last over four hours, the presentations numbering over fifteen hundred. Prince Albert Victor accompanied the Prince at the levee. By two o'clock the Prince of Wales, who had donned the full-dress uniform of a field officer, and the young Prince, who wore his naval dress, appeared in the throne-room. A large proportion of military and naval uniforms gave color to the picture, and the full bottomed wigs of the legal dignitaries lent variety.

The Prince and Princess afterward visited founded in 1866 for the higher education of ladies, and for granting certificates of knowledge. The college was all a-flutter with excitement, for at three o'clock the royal patroness, whose name the institution bears, was to enter it. The Princess at a former visit to Dublin stopped short at the door, being then, owing to her lameness, unable to mount the stairs. Now she was to see the lady students face to face, and receive the inevitable address. Lovely flowers had been placed in every nook and corner, and the earnest, bright-eyed lady students, with their teachers and professors, bloomed, too, on the staircases and dainty passages. The proceedings were most interesting and pleasant, especially after the crowds of the streets and formal ceremonies.

"SWEET GIRL GRADUATES."

There are about two hundred students connected with the college, and the ladies present wore white and pink rosettes, indicating their connection with classes of its literary society. The Princess of Wales, escorted by the Archbishop of Dublin and the Countess Spencer, with one of the University dons, passed down to the dais. The national anthem was sung, a gorgeous bouquet environed with rich Irish lace was presented by a young lady, daughter of the Provost of Trinity, and an address was read rehearsing the successful work done by the college in the higher intellectual education of women. The Princess thanked the Dean for the reception, and assured him of her continued interest in the institution. Among ladies who came under notice were four of the nine B.A.'s who matriculated at the University, whose lovely faces under the quaint college caps, with the flat, square "mortar-board" top, and their graceful forms robed in the college gowns, reminded the spectator of Tennyson's epithet, "sweet girl graduates."

On the following day, April 10th, the Princess herself assumed the attire of a Doctor of Music, and so entered this learned sisterhood. The Princess and her party before leaving visited the scholars of the Alexandra school for girls under sixteen years of age, in preparation for entrance to the college. This visit to Alexandra College gave her Royal Highness much pleasure, and it leaves a delightful remembrance for the collegians.

A round of gayeties occupied the Royal visitors during their stay in Dublin. As the Irish gentlemen had enjoyed an opportunity of meeting the Prince of Wales, the Irish ladies were invited to meet the Princess. Her "drawing-room" was as great a success as had been the Prince's levee. For more than three hours there was a constant succession of carriages at the gates of the Castle where the Princess was holding the state reception. One after another the carriages drew up at the Castle entrance, the long line extending for miles, and the fair occupants patiently waited their turn for appearing in the Royal presence. The grace and sweetness of the Princess charmed all hearts, as the genial, unaffected manner of the Prince had won the admiration of the men. The visit was a success, and both the Irish aristocracy and the Royal party appeared to be delighted with the acquaintance thus made.

AN UNTOWARD INCIDENT

unhappily marred the subsequent days of the visit. When the festivities were at their height, the Lord Mayor of Dublin, who had been conspicuous by his rudeness to the Royal visitors, was seen driving through the city. He was hissed by the Loyalists, who were rejoicing over the visit of the Prince and Princess. The Mayor was exasperated, and angrily declared he would complain to Mr. Parnell and notify the Nationalists in Mallow and Cork of the insult to himself. It is supposed that he did so, for on the Royal party arriving at Mallow, on April 14th, three of Mr. Parnell's friends, who are members of Parliament, were at the station with a gang of roughs and a brass band. The band played the Nationalist air, and the roughs hooted and hissed the Prince and his party. After the train had left the station there was a fight on the platform between the police and the mob. At Cork there was a repetition of the Mallow scenes. One man in the crowd threw an onion at the Princess, which struck a footman who interposed. Stones were thrown at the royal carriages, and at night there was a riot, in which windows were smashed and the flags and decorations put up in honor of the Prince's arrival were torn down and burned.

On their return to Dublin and during their visits in the north of Ireland the Royal visitors were met with increased loyalty as though the people were anxious to efface from their minds the unpleasant impressions of the journey in the south. Amid general rejoicings and demonstrations of loyalty the visit came to a close, and on April 27th the Prince and Princess returned to England, promising to renew their visit in the near future.

Mission Work in Madagascar is Making progress in spite of the unsettled condition of the country. Mr. R. Baron, one of the missionaries there, in the course of his report, says that it is a matter of surprise to the missionaries how little the war has affected their work. Many new chapels have been built, and the war, though perhaps shaking the faith of some in the Christian religion, has tended to deepen and strengthen the spiritual life of the people. It is in the schools that the evil results of the war have chiefly manifested themselves, though even here the state of things is not so deplorable as might have been feared. There has been a falling off in the number of children attending the day-schools, caused by many of the lads having engaged themselves as government artisans in making pottery, gunpowder, etc., in order to avoid being sent off as soldiers to the coast. Several of the country churches have suffered in attendance for this reason, though the city congregations show scarcely any diminution of numbers. But the soldiers at the seat of war have held regular religious services, and the work of Christian teaching has been maintained, as far as circumstances would allow, by the evangelists and preachers stationed in the various camps.

An Urgent Appeal for Funds is Made by the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions. The Board has suffered seriously during the past few years by the death of its most liberal supporters. In the appeal now issued the Board says: "Our missionaries have never been more signally blessed than they are at the present time. A large number of revivals are going on in different parts of our field. God in His providence is bidding us 'go up and possess the land.' In the face of all this we are compelled to halt! We shall come to the next Assembly with a debt of about $150,000, unless immediate relief is afforded us."

HOW TO DISCRIMINATE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached last Sunday Morning, May 3, 1885.*

"And it came to pass, when their hearts were merry, that they said, Call for Samson, that he may make us sport. And they called for Samson out of the prison house; and he made them sport."—JUDGES 16: 125.

THREE thousand people had assembled in the temple of Dagon. They came to make sport of eyeless Samson. They were ready for the entertainment. They clapped and pounded and shouted, "Fetch him out, fetch him out!"

THE BLIND GIANT.

led by a lad, comes into the midst of the temple. At his first appearance there goes up a shout of laughter and derision. The giant pretends to be weary and wants to rest himself, and he says to the lad leading him, "Show me the pillars of the house." The strong man puts one hand against one pillar and the other hand against the other pillar, and with the mightiest push that the earth ever saw throws himself forward until the whole house comes down in thunderous crash, and the audience are ground like grapes in a wine-press. "It came to pass, when their hearts were merry, that they said, Call for Samson, that he may make us sport. And they called Samson out of the prison house and he made sport for them!"

In other words, there are

and destructive, which bring down disease and death upon those who practise them, and while they laugh and cheer, they die. The three thousand that perished that day in Gaza are as nothing compared with the tens of thousands of people in all the ages who have been destroyed by sinful amusements and by good amusements carried to excess.

You have already found out from this series of sermons that I have no sympathy with ecclesiastical strait-jackets, and with the universal denunciation of all kinds of recreation. I think the Church of God has made in trying to suppress the sportfulness of people instead of trying to direct it. I am glad to know that many of the Young Men's Christian Associations of our cities are adjoining to their reading-rooms gymnasiums and bowling-alleys. I am glad that our denominational institutions at Princeton have established a gymnasium to which they expect the students regularly to come. In other days, after studying for some seven and nine years, we came out of the theological institution with bronchitis and liver complaint, and as the man entered the pulpit people said, "Doesn't he look heavenly?" because he looked sick. But it has been found out by Christian men that we must as well as cultivate the soul, and the mightiest of Christian workers have joined in recreations. William Wilberforce trundled a hoop with the children. Martin Luther helped dress the Christmas tree. The Prime Minister of England wields the axe in the park at Hawarden. We must point out certain balances by which all amusements may be weighed, and this morning I shall lay down certain principles by which you are to judge for yourselves in regard to all operas, all theatricals, all skating-rinks, all lawn tennis, all ball playing, all yachting, all good and all bad amusements. I do not propose myself to be the jury, but I will make you the jury, and having pleaded before you the cause I will expect you to render the verdict.

First of all, apply the question, of that amusement? There are men made up of hard facts, and they are a combination of multiplication tables and statistics. Show them a picture and they immediately begin to discuss the pigments employed in the coloring. Show them a rose and they will tear it to pieces for botanical analysis, which is only a post-mortem examination of a flower. They seem to have no rebound to their nature. They never do anything more than smile. It seems as if nature had built them by contract and made a bungling job of it!

WHAT IS THE REACTION

But there are those, blessed be God, who have bright faces, and their life is a song, an anthem, a psalm of praise. Even their troubles are like the vines that grow up to the top of great towers, where the sunlight sits and the soft airs of heaven keep perpetual carnival. They are the people you like to have come to your house. They are the people I like to have come to my house. If you but touch the hem of their garments, you are healed. Now, such persons are peculiarly liable to be tempted by pernicious amusements. The swifter a ship the more important the stout helmsman. In proportion as a horse is gay it is important to have a strong driver. If you have an exuberant nature you need to look out for the reaction of all styles of amusement.

There are amusements that send one to bed at night so nervous he cannot sleep, and he comes forth in the morning not because he is rested, but because duty drags him from the pillow. Any amusement is wrong that gives you a distaste for the drudgery of life—for tools because they are not swords, for working aprons because they are not robes, for cattle because they are not the infuriated bulls of the arena. Any style of amusement that fills you with a longing for a life of romance—love that takes poison and shoots itself, moonlight adventures and hair-breadth escapes—is a bad amusement. Amusements were intended to build us up. They are obnoxious if they pull us down.

THE COST.

Another question which you and I must ask in regard to any amusement is: "Will it demand of me an expenditure beyond my means?" You are not to consider money thrown away that is expended in recreation. It is silly for you to come from some innocent amusement and say, "That is money wasted, that is time wasted." It may be an important investment to you, a more important investment than the transaction from which you receive a hundred or a thousand dollars. But oh! how many reputations and how many properties are riddled by

COSTLY AMUSEMENTS.

The table is robbed by the club. The champagne is indebted to the children's wardrobe. The carousing party ruins the boy's primer. The table-cloth of the corner saloon is indebted to the wife's faded dress. Excursions that make a tour around a whole month's wages, and women whose entire business it is to go shopping, have their counterpart in uneducated children, in bankruptcy that appals the stock-market, and that appals the church, and in drunkenness which goes staggering across the beautiful carpet of the mansion, and dashes into the mirror, and drowns the carol of the music with the whooping of bloated sons come home to break their old mother's heart.

When a man goes into costly amusements for which he is not able to pay, he first borrows what he cannot earn, and then he steals what he cannot borrow. First he goes into embarrassment, then he goes into lying, then he goes into theft, and getting as far as that he is not apt to stop short of the penitentiary. There is hardly a prison house in America which has not to-day of costly amusements. Again and again have I been requested by broken-hearted parents to go over to New York and beg off from the punishment of the law some young man who has sinned against his employer. Alas! how often the errand has been unavailing. The young man had salary enough for all lawful expenditure he had not salary enough for sinful indulgence.

Merchant of New York, merchant of Brooklyn, was there something wrong about the cast last night? Has there been some derangement in the accounts of your establishment? Has the money drawer had a leakage? There is some one in your establishment who is probably engaging in sinful amusement. What you do not pay him in lawful salary he makes up for by theft. Oh, how beautifully opens! Here is a young man who says: "I am out now for a good time. Never mind economy—I'll get money some way. What a bright day, what a beautiful road! crack the whip and over the turnpike. Here, boys, fill high your glasses, and drink to long life, and health, and many a day just like this."

Hard-working young men look out of the store window and say: "How is that? We have to toil and drudge, and we have no such luxuries. They do nothing, and have everything." These fast men seem to have a life thrilling with enchantment. They stare at others and in turn get stared at. The watch-chain jingles and the cup foams, and the cheeks flush, and the eyes flash. The midnight hears the guffaw of their laughter. They swagger, they tell unclear stories, they jostle decent people off the side walk, they parody the hymn learned at their mother's knee, they blaspheme God, and when some one gives them kindly admonition they say, "Who are you?" and when the doom of the unrighteous is set before them they say, "Who cares?"

Some night you are going along the street and you hear and there is a rattle of the watchman's club, and there is a rush of the police. What is the matter? That reckless young man has been killed in a grog-shop fight. Carry him home to his father's house. The parents will come, and they will wash the blood from the wound, and they close the eyes in death. The prodigal is home at last. The mother will go into her little garden and she will gather the sweetest flowers she can find, and twist them into a garland to put over the silent heart of her wayward boy, and then push back from the bloated brow the long locks which were once her pride. The father's voice will rend the air as he says: "Oh, my son, my son, my son, would God I had died for thee, my son, my son, my son!"

Another balance by which we are to weigh amusement is the question, Into what will it lead me? In that organization of which I am to be a member what are the morals? In that place to which you invite me to go what style of companionship is dominant? Ah! do they drink, are they unclean, are they blasphemers, are they abandoned in any of their habits?—In the name of Almighty God I warn you quit that association; do not go there again. They will despoil your reputation. They will undermine your moral character. They will make no contribution for your children after you are dead. They will weep no tears at your burial. They will chuckle over your damnation.

Ah! the day comes when those who have despoiled their fellows will be brought to account. Oh, that great THEATRE OF THE JUDGMENT.

Scene, the last day. Enter lords, dukes, princes, clowns, beggars. No sword. No tiara. No crown. For footlights, the kindling fires of a burning world. For applause, the clapping floods of the sea. For orchestra, the trumpets that wake the dead. For galleries, the clouds filled with angel spectators. For curtain, the heavens rolled together as a scroll. For tragedy, the doom of the destroyed. For farce,

* A verbatim report, revised by Dr. Talmage, and printed without abridgment.

the attempt to serve God and serve the world at the same time. For the last scene in the last act, nations tramping across the stage, some to the right, some to the left. Come, ye blessed! Depart, ye cursed!

Another balance by which you are to weigh all these amusements—remember, you are the jury; another balance by which you are to measure and weigh all these amusements is the effect they have on

YOUR PHYSICAL CONDITION.

I have already hinted at this, but not fully discussed it. There are a great many good men who need most of all physical recuperation. There are good Christians who are writing dreadful things against their immortal soul when there is nothing the matter with them but an incompetent liver. There are Christian people who think it a kind of religious duty to feel poorly, and because Richard Baxter and Robert Hall were invalids, they hope through the same sickness to achieve the same results.

GRANDUEUR OF CHARACTER.

Now, let me say that God will hold you responsible for your invalidism if it is your own fault, and if through right exercise you could get rid of it.

We all admit the influence of the body on the soul. Put a man of mild disposition for a little time on the diet which the Indian is put upon, and in a short time there will be a change of the chemical properties of his blood, and the blood will become like that of the lion, the bear, the tiger, and the mild disposition will become cruel, and fierce, and unrelenting. That has been a matter of experiment. Now, we all admit the influence of the body on the soul. What, right, then, have you to maltreat your body? What right have you to deface the temple of the Holy Ghost?

There are good people whose hope of heaven is all bedclouded with clouds of TORRERO SMOKE.

They shatter the physical vase in which God put the jewels of eternity. They have great intellect and soul in a body that they have allowed to run to ruin and waste. Machinery enough to propel a Great Eastern across the Atlantic, fastened in a rickety North River propeller. Physical development which has no result except in fabulous lifting and perilous rope-walking and pugilistic encounters, only excites our contempt, and I confess to an admiration for that man who has a sound mind in an athletic body, every nerve and bone and muscle and tissue of which is consecrated to right uses.

Oh, it seems to me outrageous that men should allow their physical health to go to ruin, spending all their remaining years not in some great enterprise for God and the betterment of the world's condition, but in studying about what is the best thing to take for dyspepsia. A ship that is ought to have all sail set, and the men at their posts, carrying a cargo for eternity, keeping the crew all the time busy in stopping up the leakages. When you may with an honorable and righteous amusement get rid of your querulousness and the fourth of your disease, your body and mind, how can you turn your back upon such a grand, medicinal? Dr. Mason said to the pill-bearers when his son was being carried out of the hall of his dwelling, "Move softly; ye carry a temple of the Holy Ghost" which temple we are. And you have no more right to damage your body than you have to damage your soul.

EFFECT ON DISPOSITION.

I must also, and you must estimate all amusements by the taste or distaste they give you for home life. I stand to-day in the presence of some shattered homes. Oh, if I could charm you by that word Home! Do you not know that all you do for your home circle you will have to do soon or never do at all? Do you not realize, oh father, that all the influence for good you can bring upon your children you must start now or never start at all? Do you not realize, oh wayward husband, that death will break up your conjugal relations, and alas for you if you stand at the grave of one who perished through your neglect! I saw stand at the deathbed of a Christian wife. She pointed to the ring on her finger and said to him, "You see that ring?" He said, "Yes, I see it." She said, "Do you know who put that ring there?" He said, "Yes, I put it there." Then all the memories of the past seemed to rush upon him. Oh, by that day when in the presence of men and angels you promised faithfulness and kindness in joy and sorrow, in sickness and in health; by the memory of those hours when you stood in your new home planning out for a bright future; by the cradle and the joyful hour when one life was spared and another given; by the sick bed from which the little one lifted his arms and you knew he must die, and the arms were put around both of you, bringing you together in that dying kiss; by the family Bible in which, amid the stories of heavenly love, is the brief but expressive story of births and deaths, by the neglects of the past and the agonies of the future; by the judgment day, when husband and wife, parents and children shall stand in immortal group ready to be caught up in shining array or shrink back into darkness—all these I charge you give to your home your best affections. When there are so many innocent amusements,

WHY GO ASTRAY!

Why stop your ears to a heaven full of songsters, and then listen to the hiss of a dragon? Why turn your back upon a hillside all abloom with flowers and all adash with nimble torrents, and with blistered feet go clambering up the hot sides of fire-belching Cotopaxi?

Let me say that your style of amusements will decide your eternity. It may have seemed almost trivial to some of you that for three or four Sabbath mornings I should be speaking upon these things, but I tell you

THEY INVOLVE HEAVEN AND HELL.

One night at the corner of a street I saw a young man halt as though he were trying to decide something very important. Why did he halt there when the great tides of population were going up and down? As he momentarily lifted his hat, I saw he had an intelligent forehead. I looked and saw he had a robust frame. He was a splendid young man, a highly-cultured young man, an honored young man.

WHY DID HE HALT?

at that street corner that night? The fact is, that every man has a good angel and a bad angel contesting for the mastery of his immortal spirit, and that night that young man standing at that street corner was deciding between the good angel and the bad angel of his nature.

"Come with me," said the good angel; "I will take you to your home. I will put the wing of protection over your pillow. I will guide you all your life with a supernatural love. Come with me; I will bless every cup out of which you drink, every couch upon which you rest, every doorway you enter. I will consecrate your tears when you weep, I will consecrate your sweat when you toil, and, at last, I will hand over your grave to the right angel of a Christian resurrection. Come with me." The young man hesitated. The bad angel came forth from heaven, sent by the Lord in response to your father's petition and your mother's prayer. "Come with me," said the good angel, with a voice of unearthly symphony, and there was music in it like that which drops from a lute of heaven when a seraph breathes on it.

"No, no," said

THE BAD ANGEL;

"come with me; I will make you a brighter offer than that. The wines that I pour are from chalices of bewitching carousal. The dance I lead is over floors tessellated with unrestrained indulgence. There is no frown of God on the sin that I practise. The skies are Italian. The paths I walk are pansied and primrosed. Come with me." The young man hesitated. The bad angel smote the good angel, and spreading its wings in the starlight it sped upward and away, and a door in the sky flashed open, and the bright wings forever vanished. That was THE DECIDING POINT.

in that young man's history, for now unrestrained he followed the bad angel, and they passed gate after gate, and as they passed each gate it slammed with a clang that said, "Never again shall this open." And the bad angel, followed by the young man, passed through portal after portal, and as soon as they had passed there was a

and there was a shoving of the bolts, as if something had said "forever," and the skies grew lurid, and the garden turned into a desert, and the June air became the cutting of December sleet, and the bright wings of the bad angel turned into sackcloth, and the eyes that were full of the light of love became hollow with hopeless grief, and the fountains that had tossed nothing but wine now poured forth bubbling tears and foaming blood, and the young man said: "What is this serpent that I see at the right side of the path?" and the bad angel said, "That is the serpent of

STINGING REMORSE."

And the young man said: "What is that lion at the left of this pathway?" and the answer came, "That is the lion of all devouring despair." And then a vulture flew through the sky, and the young man said, "What is that vulture?" and the answer came, "That is the vulture waiting for the carcasses of the slain." And then the young man tried to pull off from him the folds that had wrapped around and around, and he cried "What is this that twists around me in awful convolutions?" and the answer came, "That is the worm that never dies." And forthwith all from the charmer, and the young man said: "What does all this mean? I believed what you told me that night standing at the street corner. You have deceived me. What does all this mean?" Then said the bad angel: "I will tell you now. I was sent forth from the pit of the lost world to capture your soul. I watched for you many a day and many a night, but the night you hesitated I triumphed, and now we are here. Come, let us fill these two chalices of fire and drink to darkness and woe and death. Hail, hail!"

Oh, young man! will the good angel sent forth by Christ, or the bad angel sent forth by sin, capture your soul? Their wings are interlocked this moment above you in struggle for your destiny, as above the Apennines eagle and condor fight mid sky. This hour may decide your destiny. God help you! To hesitate is to die!

The Mormon Authorities have Forwarded to the President a declaration of grievances and a protest against the execution of the anti-polygamy laws. The following passage, which is part of its concluding observations, is a sample of the whole: "We protest against unfair treatment on the part of the General Government. We protest against the prosecution of persons, many of whom are infirm and aged, who entered into plural marriage before it was declared a crime and have never violated any law. We respectfully ask for the appointment by the President of a commission to fairly and thoroughly investigate the Utah situation, and pending its report we solemnly protest against the continuance of this merciless crusade." It is evident that the Mormons cannot or will not understand the situation. It is not so much a new law that is disturbing them, as a law which closes up the ruts through which they have been accustomed to wriggle from under the operation of an old law. They have been defying the laws of the United States for a long time with brazen effrontery; their Danites have murdered and ravaged with impunity. Now that the executive machinery is rearranged by the Edmunds law in such a way as to enforce obedience, they cease defying and protest. When they obey the law "the merciless crusade" will cease.

A LADY'S WORK IN FRANCE.

EVERY one knows how much destructive work in a time of war may be done by a single sharpshooter, who crawls into a rifle-pit, and from his place of concealment picks off individuals from the enemy's camp. The same line of tactics is being adopted in the army of the Prince of Peace. We commend the example of this Christian lady to others who, with a small income to relieve them of the necessity of working for their daily bread, find their time hang heavily on their hands. This lady thus describes the way in which she spends her days in France, in independent service for her Saviour:

"I had heard much of the spiritual destitution of the French people, and as I speak French like a native, and had no personal ties binding me to any place in particular, I thought I would go to France and see if, in a quiet, unobtrusive way, I could win souls for Christ. My experience as to expense in the way of living and mode of work may be reasonable and helpful to the large-hearted who have small purses. If you think so, make use of what I write as you please.

"Expenditure.—My yearly income has been $300; my yearly expenditure, under $250. I live in a provincial town of France, and in the summer go to take a course of mineral waters, to the mountains, and after to the sea-coast.

"Mode of Living.—Hitherto I have lived in furnished lodgings; a sitting-room and small bed-room, without attendance, six dollars a month; all requisite utensils for cooking and living were provided. I was entirely my own servant, and found it a very independent, comfortable, and homelike mode of living. Excellent markets, with varied and reasonable supplies, provided a table without stint of quantity or quality. A length of day from six to ten left plenty of time free from household matters for other uses—reading, writing, sewing, walking, and visits, with some Christian object in view.

"Mode of Working.—I get acquainted with the people at the market and in the cemetery. This leads to personal home visits. A book for addresses is kept at hand for the names of those who seem to welcome the proposal to come and see them. My 'visiting list' is a large one, and as I am a great walker I go to distant places. Sometimes tea is taken, made, and shared. When I go back to France I mean to try and gather the neighbors together in one of the homes where we can have tea and a Bible-reading. These visits are always welcome. No money is given, but Gospels, floral-cards, tracts, pictorial papers for children are given, explained, and turned into prayer. It is a good plan to take some chlorate of potash for gargles, camphorated spirits of wine, and cotton wool for toothache; and a mixture (made from one ounce of chilli peppers, two tablespoonfuls of salt, and a pint of vinegar) for external application for sore throats, coughs, and all sorts of aches and pains. Everybody appreciates bodily help, but not at first spiritual help.

"I used to give tracts, with a word of advice. It is good to read these carefully before going out and to underline leading thoughts. It is food for self-digestion, and the receivers receive some of the vitality the giver has got therefrom. Perhaps the seed-sowing at the cemetery on Sunday afternoons may be a useful idea to general travellers on the continent. Many go there to visit the last resting-places, and to pray for the souls of their departed friends. They have time, and are in a frame of mind when a word about their own souls is likely to be well received and to do good. The floral text-cards give the introduction. They are offered, admired, the price is asked, and they are told it is a gift, to be paid for by a promise made and kept; they must read, hear it explained, then take it home, keep it, read it, pray about it, till it gets written on their hearts. Others, passing, stop to hear what is going on; then they want a card, and there is sometimes quite a little knot of listeners to the reading of the different texts and explanations. They are such interested listeners that it is easy to speak home, This opening-up of the inner soul-life, and God's voice in the garden, is something new and fresh, they feel it is what they need and like; many say so, and wish more of this teaching. Besides, they get something to take home to read.

"The cemetery is a good mission-field; sorrow and trouble soften the soil for good seed. I avoid speaking of Romish errors, unless questioned, but it is good to write classified texts, proving Protestant truth, on the back of the floral-cards. Those who have Testaments can find the passages, and they can be talked over in the visits at home. Thus sound doctrine will come to replace error, as light dispels darkness. They are not afraid of De Lacy's Testament, authorized by their own church.

"I am now forming a lending library, the books to be changed when visiting. Other hints might be given to those to whom mission work is new, but to the earnest worker experience is the best teacher. Enough has been said to show the willing-minded possessor of a small income that a happy, useful life may be found in France. I must add, however, that though this casual work is good, something different is needed to make France a 'missionary nation'—aggressive, thorough, consecutive work, conversion, training, teaching, ploughing, clearing, planting in this large field. Still, this preliminary work may produce material for after and more decisive work, for which much might be done by combined workers with combined incomes, living independently, and done, too, on the self-supporting thrift system, with effective and lasting results."

AN AFGHAN CONVERT.

DR. T. P. HUGHES, who has spent over twenty years in missionary work among the Afghans, relates the following incident, which shows how powerful are the influences operating in that country against the propagation of Christianity. It also shows that when once the faith in Christ has found an entrance into the heart—even a heart so dark as that of an untutored Afghan—persecution, social ostracism, and all the power Satan has at command, cannot overcome it.

Dr. Hughes says: "Myrad Ali, a native of Koonah, indirectly descended from Mohammed, through the influence of the Holy Spirit embraced Christianity and was baptized. We sent him down to L— for four years, and when he returned he said, 'I must go back to my village.' I said, 'They will kill you.' 'I can't help it,' said he; 'I must see my brother.'

"He went. We both prayed earnestly before he went. I followed him in my prayers. A few days afterward I received a letter from him saying, 'Circumstances have been too great for me; I shall declare myself a Mohammedan in the Mosque on Friday next.' I went to the neighboring village to that in which he was staying and sent for him, and he came and stood before me.

"Ah," said he, 'mine is the case of the rich young man in the Gospel. When I returned to the village, to the scenes in which I had roved in my early days; when I saw the cradle in which I had been rocked; the little lanes in which I had played as a boy; when the old nurse came to me and threw herself at my feet and said, 'Your dear mother was a Mohammedan—you do not remember her; she died when you were a month old. She was such a sweet and tender creature. Your father was almost the chief man here, and he was a Mohammedan; are you better than your father? Do you believe that your father and mother are in hell and that you will go to heaven?' Then they sent for the priests of the village, and they came in and reasoned, and I seemed almost off my head, and the devil came and forced home the reasonings of the priests, and in a moment I said I will declare myself a Mohammedan in the Mosque.'

"I prayed with him; we remained nearly the whole evening together in prayer. Then he departed from me on his white pony. Oh, how I followed that man with pleading and prayer! I went back home humiliated, as only a missionary can feel. I went back to Peshawar feeling that God was humiliating me in the presence of my Afghan friend.

"But the day following, who should enter my little residence but Myrad Ali. 'Oh, sir,' said he, 'when I went back to my village I told my brother that I had seen you; and although these lips of mine would declare on Friday that I was a Mohammedan, at heart I am a Christian.' He then said I must clear out of the village at once. 'Why, we shall all be murdered if you remain; and here I am, sir, the prodigal returned.'

"And last week, I received a letter from my fellow-laborer, Azrad Ali, who is going on well, and he tells me this young man is now a magistrate—the first Afghan Christian magistrate the world has ever seen."

THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN CRISIS IN PROPHECY.

Its Sudden Development—Foreseen Twenty-Seven Years Ago—The Exposition of Mr. Beales—Policy of the Prince of Rosh—Ezekiel's Prophecy Partially Fulfilled—The Testimony of Historians—Inevitable Isolation of England.

THE present international crisis which is agitating the people of the British Empire has come upon the nation, and upon other nations which are merely spectators, with the suddenness of a thunderbolt from a clear sky. While the interest in foreign affairs was concentrated on the inglorious and disastrous campaign in the Sudan, suddenly another question comes to the front, of interest so absorbing that the whole affair of the Sudan sinks into insignificance. Who would have thought three months ago that the announcement of the chief of the British Government that the Sudan would be evacuated, and that all this expense in men and money would be suffered to go for nothing, with no result accomplished—who would have thought that such an announcement would be made without provoking indignant protest? Yet so it has been. All eyes are directed to the East, and all thoughts are concerned with the more important question, Is England in honor bound to fight Russia? and can she hope to grapple successfully unaided with that gigantic power?

Unexpectedly has this crisis come upon statesmen and cabinets, yet the student of prophecy is not taken by surprise. Twenty-seven years ago an eminent expositor, guided by the light of expressed his conviction that about this time the world would witness such a movement on the part of Russia as that which has agitated England and all nations within the past few weeks. In 1858 a book was published entitled "Armageddon," the author of which, the late Mr. Charles Beales, having patiently studied the prophecies of the Bible, gave to the world the results of his study in this book, which displays considerable learning, literary skill, and remarkable ingenuity. In it he showed how the first portion of Ezekiel's prophecy, and especially the first half of the passages (Ezek. 38:4 and 39:2), had been fulfilled by the Czar of Russia in his attack on Turkey. He also expressed the belief that as

PRINCE OF ROSH

"Gog of the land of Magog, the chief (Russia), Meshech (Moscow), and Tubal" (To-bolsk), he would invade Palestine with a vast army after the Jews shall have been restored there at the time of the latter-day war of Armageddon (an epoch which evidently in the present year, 1885, is yet a few years distant). He then adds [Vol. III., p. 545]: "It is more than probable that Gog of the land of Magog may occupy the prophetic interval of time which has yet to elapse before his permitted aggression upon Palestine, by wrecking his vengeance upon England in the invasion of India."

In proof of his theory that India was the objective point of the Russian foreign policy, and that even at that date, now twenty-seven years ago, Russia was stealthily advancing with the leopard-like movement (Daniel 7:6 and Rev. 13:2) toward her prey, Mr. Beales quoted several standard authorities, among them Oliphant's

"Russian Shores of the Black Sea," Sheil's "Persia," Ferrier's "Caravan Journeys," and Alison's "History of Europe," Vol. VI., pp. 557-571. These writers, treating of secular history, corroborate on their side the ancient prophet, whose eyes, opened by the Omnipotent Ruler of the universe, saw the events of the future stretched out before him. The following are among the passages cited by Mr. Beales :

"When Persia is no longer able to resist the demands of Russia (says Oliphant), and Cabul only anxious to aid her designs, the tenure by which Great Britain holds her dominion in India will be materially affected, and it may be thus affected sooner than we anticipate ; for surely, during the present crisis of Eastern affairs, these results are not to be deemed altogether speculative." So also Lady Sheil. "Excluded from prosecuting her ambitious projects in other quarters [Constantinople, from which she has been twice driven back], revenge, the desire of retrieving her prestige—all conspire to urge Russia to the East. She will await the favorable moment in patience, moving forward in the mean while by the wiles she is reputed to understand so well. In the Crimean War, in 1855, she was opposed by England, France, Turkey, and Italy ; next time these conditions may be changed."

Ferrier, after showing the supposed impossibility of the Russians reaching the frontiers of India, and crossing the Indus, to be an illusion, "when they have made up their minds to attack India," concludes a careful review of the whole subject with the following words : "The two principal cities of Afghanistan once in the hands of the Russians, they would become the arbiters of the various and conflicting interests of Central Asia, and could unite them all in their own favor, by proclaiming that they march to the conquest of India, with a view of restoring the national dynasties, subverted by their enemies. The very presence of the Russians in that country would of itself immediately create a hostile feeling against their ADVERSARIES AMONG THE NATIVES : many chiefs and their dependents would take arms ; the English would then find their rear menaced and on their own territory. Sir R. Shakespeare was right when he said to the Khan of Khiva, 'We have a garden which is India ; the walls are the fortified towns of Tartary and Afghanistan. Let the Russians once seize them, and our garden is theirs.' The Czar only waits the fall of the Caucasus to strike his talons into Afghanistan. He intends then to carry his arms into Turkistan, which he has already encircled with a chain of fortresses. The distance from thence to Herat is short, and the road is easy. If the Persians are not masters of it, and do not open the way, the Russian army in ten days can do so, and will once at Herat, who can foresee where they will stop."

[Since this was written, the Russians have seized the Caucasus and Turkistan, as Ferrier predicted, and are now advancing toward Herat.]

Alison, in his "History of Europe," writes in the same strain :

"The Court of St. Petersburg [he observes] never trusts anything to chance, or the hazardous accidents of unprepared warfare. Slowly but steadily advancing, like the Romans, by the construction of roads and the erection of fortresses, and then successively rendering each conquest the base of operations for the next, it has succeeded for a century past, without experiencing any lasting disaster, in advancing its dominion over the wildest regions in every direction. The march to the river Indus is long, the mountains intervening high, the difficulties great ; but the distance is not so great, the country not so arid, the wilds not so interminable, as the route to Kamchatka, which is daily traversed by her troops without difficulty."

THIS IS A CORRESPONDENCE, as Mr. Beales showed, of no slight importance between two independent narratives. The inspired prophet on the mount of heavenly vision saw the prominent facts rearing their heads above the ways of the world, as the mountain climber sees below him the spires and monuments and other elevated objects, but not the intervening country ; the secular historian sees the paths along which governments have marched, and when it is asked, Where will the journey end ? the prophet and the historian are in accord.

It must be noted also that the indications are clear that either by conquest, by internal rebellion, or by her own voluntary act England will eventually lose control of India. As we said in 1866 ["Forty Coming Wonders," p. 39], both India and Ireland, and with them all the British Colonies and dependencies, will be separated from Great Britain before the formation of the ten-kingdomed confederacy. The separation may not be formal and avowed. They may not be independent States in name, but they will cease to be under the legislative control of England, and will be independent in action and government, even though their nominal allegiance may be maintained. The old Roman Empire, of which they formed no part, will, in those latter days, comprise neither more nor less than it did originally, and the host of colonies and dependencies which now acknowledge British sway will not be carried with Great Britain into the ten-kingdomed confederacy. Canada and Australia have already local self-government, which lacks little of complete independence, while India and Ireland, the two most important countries which England governs directly, are held by a most precarious grasp. This menace to India and the intestine troubles in Ireland are intimations of what would happen if England's power should be weakened. Already restive, they would break away, and, like ancient Rome, England would have neither the will nor the strength to compel their submission.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Spanish Fisher Boy's Salvation.—At a recent meeting the Rev. Mr. Gault narrated : "There was a little Spanish fisher-boy whose teacher had a Latin Bible, but he got it translated into Spanish, and this little boy, when he went to school, read the Bible, where he learned of the love of Jesus. Soon he found the hidden treasure, which only a diligent seeker finds. Soon afterward one of their most important religious festivals occurred, and this little fisher-boy said : 'Last year, at this season, I carried the cross upon my shoulders ; but this year I carry Jesus in my heart.'"

Saved on a Race-course.—A Devoted Evangelist said : "A Christian man was giving away tracts at a race-course. He offered one to a man, who rudely said, 'No, I don't want your tracts ; give me the commandments.' 'Ah ! my friend,' said the tract distributor, 'what have these commandments done for you ? Have you kept them ?' That is another question, was the response. 'Shall I tell you,' said the messenger of God, 'that these very commandments have condemned you, and that it was needful that a sacrifice should be made whereby we might escape from the deserved punishment ?' After being shown the way of escape through Christ as the only Saviour, the man received the message of salvation with gladness, and went on his way rejoicing. May the Lord keep him !"

The Devil after his Prey.—"I once Read a fable which represented Satan coming to take possession of some one. He first cast his eyes on a young man sitting on the top of a car. He thought, 'I will go and take possession of this young man and make him do my work.' So thinking, he darted at his longed-for prey ; but when he came close to him, he staggered back, for the young man was singing, 'Guide me, oh Thou great Jehovah.' Seeing he could get no resting-place there, he made his way to a garret, where sat an old woman at a spinning-wheel. She was very poor and in great want, and Satan thought, 'I will make that old woman believe anything.' But again he was defeated, for the old woman was saying, 'I will trust in the Lord, and He will provide.' Satan had again to turn away, for he could not be in the presence of one who was so near God. He was next seen entering the house of an old man who was dying. He was more embarrassed now than ever, for the old man was quietly repeating, 'Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil,' etc. Again Satan had to turn away disappointed. This is the strongest weapon we have for fighting the great enemy of our souls, for he will not come near one who is thinking of Jesus Christ, and so living, we need not fear to die."

Perdition through Putting Off.—Mr. Drysdale related : "A young student was asked by some friends to give his heart to the Saviour, but he flippantly replied, 'Not yet, until I am done with my student life !' The time specified soon expired, and the young man was about to enter into business, and again he was asked to give himself to the Saviour, to which he answered, 'Not until I make some money ; I have no time now.' God greatly prospered him in business, and the same all-important question was again asked him, but he once more put it aside by saying, 'Oh, wait until I get married, and then I will think of these things.' It pleased God to give him a godly wife, and after he had a large family growing up about him, the question was again pressed upon him, but still he eluded it by saying, 'When I have made my fortune, I will think of these things ; he got his way, his fortune was made, but a few weeks after he retired from business he burst a blood vessel, which caused his death, and he died without Christ."

What a Falling Off was There!—Mr. J. G. Forbes related : "When I was at business lately, I met with a man whom I asked, 'Are you a Christian ?' To this he replied, 'You asked me that before, and I promised to come to the meeting ; but I was working late.' 'Indeed,' I replied, but did not believe him. He turned away, but came back again, and said, 'I wish to tell you, sir, that I was not working late : I came to the open-air meeting, and when it was over I went right to the rum-shop. Not very long ago I was an earnest Christian, and it was my greatest delight to win souls for Christ. God blessed me with a comfortable home and wife and children, but oh, sir, I am a backslider, and my poor wife and children have suffered much from my cruel treatment. I am one of the worst men in the world,' he exclaimed ; 'I have cried to the Lord with all my heart, and at those times I feel worse than ever.' 'You have been cherishing some secret sin in your heart, and that is why you do not get relief,' I said. That man has now returned to the Lord, who has said, 'I will heal your backsliding. I will forgive you freely.'"

What Changed Bella's Mind.—An Evangelist related that Dr. Nettleton at one time went to call on a friend, and when entering the dining-room he met the mistress of the house coming out, and in angry tones she exclaimed, 'I wish, Doctor, you would speak to Bella about her soul, for I cannot make any impression.' The mother had spoken to her daughter about her sins, but, alas ! like many others, had not gone in the right way about it. She had spoken in an annoyed manner, and even grew angry, which is never a way to bring a soul to Jesus. At the first opportunity Dr. Nettleton spoke to Bella, but her answer was that she was too young. "May I ask how old you are ?" said the Doctor. She replied, "I am nineteen, and I will give myself to the Lord when I am thirty." "As I came through the cemetery," said Dr. Nettleton, "I came upon the grave of a friend of yours, and she died at the age of nineteen." At the remembrance of this Bella burst into a flood of tears, and sobbed out, "Oh, Dr. Nettleton, I cannot wait another year ; I will give myself to the Lord just now." Before Dr. Nettleton left that house there was joy in the presence of the angels over another sinner that had repented.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Monthly Treasury Statement just Issued shows the effect of the increased depression in business. The reduction in the public debt was $4,837,339. During the ten months now expired of the fiscal year, the receipts have been $263,000,000. It was estimated that the revenue for the year would amount to $330,000,000, so that unless the receipts during May and June are largely above the average, the year will show a large falling off. The falling off is in customs as well as in internal revenue, which are, in both cases, not only less than the estimate, but less than the amount they produced last year. The expenditures, on the other hand, have increased. They have exceeded those of the corresponding period of last year by $19,000,000. Present indications are that, reckoning the required contribution to the sinking fund, the income will exceed the expenditures by something less than two millions. There is, therefore, little prospect of any changes in the fiscal policy of the government being made by Congress.

Encouraging Reports of General Grant's Health were issued every day last week. The improvement in his general physical condition and in his energy and spirits was very marked, though no distinct assurances respecting the cancer are afforded by the physicians. Whether it is really a cancer we are not told, but there has been no authoritative contradiction issued of the first statement that it was a cancer. Vague reports are in circulation that there is a possibility of a new discovery having been made which will show that cocaine, which was freely used locally to deaden the pain, is a cure for the disease, but the physicians are silent on this subject also. The whole people, however, are glad to learn that the General has given practical proof of renewed strength by resuming work on his book. On two days last week he dictated to a stenographer for an hour, which shows that his throat must be much better. Monday, April 27th, was his sixty-third birthday, and he was greatly cheered by receiving from all sections of the country the heartiest congratulations and good wishes. It was, by a strange coincidence, Memorial Day in the South, and the Confederate Survivors' Association, of Augusta, Ga., after their parade telegraphed to the illustrious sufferer their sincere congratulations on his birthday. In the evening General Grant sent out a comprehensive response in these words: "To the various army posts, societies, cities, public schools, States, corporations, and individuals, North and South, who have been so kind as to send me congratulations on my sixty-third birthday, I wish to offer my grateful acknowledgments. The despatches have been so numerous and so touching in tone that it would have been impossible to answer them if I had been in perfect health. U. S. GRANT."

The Hon. Anthony M. Keiley, of Virginia, whose portrait appeared in the last number of this journal, has been appointed Minister to Austria-Hungary instead of to Italy. That appointment is less objectionable than the other, and if Mr. Keiley is to go anywhere as the representative of the United States, perhaps he will do less harm in Vienna than elsewhere. It is a pity that he should be sent to any place in Europe as a minister. In a recent speech he declared that he had not changed his views about the temporal power of the Pope, a fact which ought to disqualify him for any mission. The rule of the Pope over the people of the Pontifical States was of a character which should be odious to any American imbued with love of liberty, and a man who wished that rule perpetuated does not fitly represent the United States. Besides this, he openly declared, a few days ago, that his own State is, in his opinion, under a government founded on "a gross and bloody violation of public rights." We hope he will not repeat that statement in Vienna. Mr. Keiley has a perfect right to hold such opinions and to express them, but what must we think of the President and the Secretary of State who selected such a man as a representative of the United States at a European court?

An Epidemic of Malignant Typhoid Fever is desolating Plymouth, Pa., a town of about nine thousand inhabitants. It first showed itself two weeks ago, and spread rapidly. At the commencement of last week seven hundred persons in all lay ill with the disease, and the deaths averaged three a day. It attacked young and old, rich and poor, and business was practically suspended. On Friday there were one hundred and ninety new cases, and on Saturday an increase of one hundred and sixty-five cases was reported, and there were eight deaths. To add to the affliction, there is a great deal of destitution among the stricken families. At best it is only a hand-to-mouth existence with many families in the little town, and when sickness comes to add to their troubles they must succumb to want. For over three years the mines have only been worked on half time, and it was all the men could do to provide their large families with the commonest of food. Now a great majority of them are not able to work at all, even when they have the opportunity. The wealthier citizens, especially a Jewish merchant, are contributing money nobly, and the physicians and drug-store proprietors attend to all cases, even when there is no prospect of payment. It is expected, however, that if the epidemic continues a relief committee must be organized, as the distress is extreme. Other cities may learn a lesson from this sad calamity. It is caused by polluted drinking water and defective sanitary arrangements.

The Extraordinary Appropriation for which Mr. Gladstone asked Parliament was voted by an overwhelming majority on April 27th. Mr. Gladstone's speech on the occasion was one of his most brilliant efforts, and it raised his reputation everywhere as that of an honorable, conscientious statesman, determined to avert war if it was possible by any sacrifice short of national dishonor. In the course of his speech he said the government considers it necessary to have the entire resources of the empire well in hand for use and application wherever they may be required. In regard to the alleged smallness of the special vote, he reminded the House that it is the largest that has been asked since the Crimean War, and is also coincident with large increases in the annual army and navy votes.

Furthermore, he said, the case relates primarily to India. In order fully to appreciate the amount entailed, it is requisite to know the extent of the measures being taken in India. The case is not one of war, actual or perhaps proximate. He did not feel called upon to define the degree of danger, but he would say in regard to the sad contingency of an outbreak of war or rupture of relations with Russia, that Her Majesty's Government had striven to conduct the diplomatic controversy in such a way that it unhappily ended in a violent rupture, they might at least be able to challenge the verdict of civilized mankind whether or not they had done all that men could do, and had used every just and honorable effort to prevent the plunging of two such countries into bloodshed and despair. In spite of the efforts of the New York Herald and other journals to stir up ill-feeling toward England and enlist sympathy for Russia, the general feeling of the American people is that Russia is the aggressor in the quarrel, and that England has the better claim on our good will.

The Fluctuating Rumors from Europe kept the world in suspense throughout last week on the subject of the Anglo-Russian difficulty. The prospect varied from day to day, as facts were cable which were thought to indicate the probability of a peaceful solution or the reverse. At the close of the week the indications were inclined to peace, though the basis of hope was of the smallest and most precarious character. It was asserted that England and Russia had agreed to submit to the decision of the King of Denmark, as arbitrator, the question in dispute respecting the battle of March 31st. The two governments are diametrically opposed on that question. The English commissioner, Sir Peter Lumsden, who is on the spot, denounced the Russian attack on the Afghans as an unprovoked, wanton act of aggression, while General Komaroff, the Russian commander, declared that the Afghans had advanced in a menacing attitude. The question of veracity is really the one at issue, and it is this on which the King of Denmark is, it is said, to adjudicate. The real question involved is the boundary line between the Russian territory and Afghanistan. In this England is said to have made important concessions, agreeing to accept the boundary claimed by Russia and technically known as the "Lessar" line, providing Russia will pledge herself to make that the "abiding" limit to her encroachments. It is possible that Russia will give this pledge, as she has found by experience that the most solemn pledges may at a convenient time be disregarded under the plea of the exigency of circumstances. She has never allowed pledges to obstruct her will when there is anything to be gained by breaking them. European statesmen believe that if war is averted it is a temporary arrangement, and that sooner or later Russia and England will have to fight for the prize in Asia.

The Financial Statement of the British Government shows that war preparations and the Sudan expenses will entail heavy burdens on the people. The accounts of the past year show a deficit of $5,245,000. This with the $55,000,000 now voted will throw on the current year a burden of over $60,000,000. Only a part of this large sum will be covered this year. An increase of the tax paid on income by more than one-half, and which will now amount to one-thirtieth of the income, is proposed, and the tax on beer and spirits will be increased. Mr. Childers announced, before making his statement, that it would be a demand on the patriotism of the people. He might have called it a practical test of their sincerity. It is probable that many who are now screaming for war and setting their own opinions of the situation against those of statesmen who know all the facts, will reconsider when they are asked to contribute one-thirtieth of their income to pay preliminary expenses. It is the middle-classes who will feel the strain most, workmen do not pay income-tax, and the wealthy can afford to pay it.

The Contributions Received Last Week For the fund for supplying colored ministers in the South and others with the CHRISTIAN HERALD, amounted to $87. They were in the following sums: From Muscatine, Iowa, $50; Idaho Springs, Col., $1; Lockport, N. Y., $2; Victor, Iowa, $1; a well-wisher, $5; a friend, $1; C. H., W. Va., $2; and $25, the donor of which desires to remain unindicated in any way. Remarkable instances of conversion through God's blessing on the circulation of this journal have been reported to us from time to time, and we should be glad to hear of more of them, as would also those friends whose kindness enables us to send the paper to many who cannot afford to pay for it. If any of the colored ministers whose names are thus on our list meet with such cases in their work, perhaps they would be kind enough to send a report of them, addressed J. S. Box 1749, Muscatine, Iowa.

A Bible Institute will be Held in Chicago in May and June for Christian workers. Rev. W. G. Moorehead, D. D., Xenia, O.; Rev. E. P. Goodwin, D. D., of Chicago, and Major D. W. Whittle, are among the instructors. Inquiries should be addressed to Miss E. Dryer, Bible Institute, 150 Madison Street, Chicago.

Bible Carriage Work, which has Proved Successful in England and other European countries, is to be commenced here shortly. Two young Englishmen, one of whom is familiar with the work, are arranging to commence an extensive tour with a Bible carriage. They propose visiting country places where there is no church, and holding services of a strictly unsectarian character; they intend also making a house-to-house visitation, with the view of disposing of Bibles, tracts, and religious literature. The carriage and their stock will cost $200, which they are now collecting from friends interested in the undertaking. Among those who are assisting them are, we are informed, Mr. McBurney, of the New York Young Men's Christian Association; and the Rev. Dr. Rainford, of St. George's Protestant Episcopal Church of New York. Inquiries, suggestions, and gifts are received by Mr. C. H. Andrews, 418 East Twenty-sixth Street, New York.

How Criminals are Developed Was Explained at a public meeting in New York last week by Mr. W. M. F. Round, the Secretary of the Prison Association. He said that in the course of his visits to the prisons he had found a deplorable state of things existing. In one of them he saw a horse thief, a burglar, and a boy arrested for larceny all in easy communication with one another, and all in equal danger of being either burned to death or dying from malaria. Out of sixty-six county jails in this State, Mr. Round said, twenty-three were like this one. In some of them men and women could talk to one another in the same corridor. Some of the county jails were tolerably fair, and others were altogether too comfortable—mere boarding-houses for thieves and tramps. Mr. Round told of one jail in which he found the prisoners playing cards, and the sheriff told him that he "always did the best he could to make it home-like for 'em." Mr. Round mentioned, for the benefit of sceptical persons, several instances of criminals being permanently reformed whose sincerity he had seen severely tested.

A Curious Surgical Operation without Precedent in this country was performed recently in Bellevue Hospital, New York. A girl was taken there whose arm had been crushed and lacerated in a machine. The wound was healed, but the girl could not move her fingers, the muscles being dead. She returned to the hospital, and the surgeons decided it was a case which could only be cured by muscle-grafting. She was put under the influence of chloroform. A large dog was brought in and placed under the influence of an anæsthetic on another table close by. An incision was made into the skin which had formed over the scar on the girl's forearm, and a piece of live muscle taken from the dog's leg was inserted. Her blood passed into it, the skin was laid back, and the arm carefully bandaged. The dog's leg was humanely dressed and bound up, and he was removed from the room before the girl recovered consciousness. She is now, after an interval of three weeks, able to use her hand with her former ease. Skillful as the surgeons were, their skill would have availed nothing without the living muscle. It is so in spiritual maladies; the finest philosophy and the grandest theories cannot quicken the dead soul. Contact with the living Saviour is the only way from death to life (John 6: 53).

A Gigantic Snow-Slide in Colorado Involved the loss of eleven lives. On April 27th a party started out from Leadville, Col., to the Homestake Mine, on Eagle River, to see what had become of eleven miners who had been missed from their usual haunts in Leadville. Arriving at the mine they found that the hut in which the men lived had been crushed by an enormous snow-slide. Excavation was at once commenced, and after an hour's hard work the corpses were found. One body stood erect with the head thrown forward, as if listening, the whole position indicating apprehension. Near him lay one of his companions in a bunk, with his face downward and arms crossed under the head. Several logs lay on the body. One man was found beside his bunk in an attitude of prayer. In another part of the cabin were two bodies crushed between fallen timbers. Other bodies were found lying about the cabin, as if thrown from the bunks by the shock. Death had evidently been instantaneous with all. The sight was so terrible that even the rough rescuers, unused as they were to pity, were moved to tears. No one could witness a scene so sad without commiseration for the poor victims, yet we know that even a fate like theirs will one day be covered by impenitent sinners rather than that which awaits them (Rev. 6: 15-17).

Why Cannot a Base-ball Player Catch a Ball dropped from the top of the Washington Monument? The question is asked and answered in a journal devoted to matters connected with out-door amusements. It seems that four expert base-ball players have tried the experiment and have failed to hold the ball. The failure is owing to the velocity attained by the ball in its descent. The journal states that a ball so dropped has a velocity of one hundred and eighty-seven feet per second when it strikes the ground. This velocity can be better comprehended by comparing it with a batted ball. No one has been known to make a longer hit than two hundred yards which, by scientific calculation, must have had a velocity at the start of one hundred feet per second. Allowing the same ball to have been hit with sufficient force to give it the same velocity at the starting point that it acquires in falling from the monument top, it would have gone five hundred and forty-four yards, and no one would dare attempt to catch it. The same principle is in operation in morals. The momentum increases as a man descends in the abyss of sin. Some have fallen so far and have been falling so long a time that human strength seems powerless to stop them; but they are never beyond God's reach while they live and can call upon Him to save them (Isa. 1: 18).

That he was not an Orphan as he had Supposed is a discovery made a few days ago by a man in West Virginia. One of the leading lawyers at the bar of that State is Mr. T. M. Smith, a young man who resides at Hamlins. He went there from Meigs County, Ohio, but he had no friends there, and believed until lately that he had neither father nor mother, brother nor sister surviving. A West Virginia newspaper states that Mr. Smith has made an important discovery. It appears that his mother, who resided with her husband in New Jersey, died when this son was about three months old. In obedience to her dying request, her brother, T. M. Jaynes, took charge of the infant, and soon afterward removed to Ohio. For reasons not stated Jaynes allowed Smith to believe that both his parents were dead. He gave him a good education, and saw him well started in life. Recently an item in a New York newspaper attracted Mr. Smith's attention, and he wrote to the party named. A correspondence followed, which resulted in the discovery that Mr. Smith's father, three brothers, and four sisters are living in Salem, N. J. Mr. Smith has set out to visit his kindred, of whose existence he had been ignorant all his life. Although Mr. Smith seems to have got along very well without parental assistance, the discovery that he is not alone in the world must be very pleasant to him, and it is not wonderful that he promptly set out to make his father's acquaintance. It is so with the enlightened sinner. When the revelation reaches his heart that God is his Father and loves him in spite of his wanderings and his sins, life takes a new shape, and the son is ever anxious to know more of his Father's character and will (Rom. 8: 15-17).

A Bridegroom Prescribed by a Physician was taken by a grateful patient, as recently related by an old resident of Washington, D. C. The physician was the father of General Hunt, and was reputed one of the ugliest men of his time. But he married an exceedingly handsome young lady, one of the belles of Maryland. Some years afterward he was asked how he persuaded the lady to marry him. He said: "When she was attending boarding-school her eyes became injured and she was blinded. I was called to prescribe for her. For some time I kept her eyes bandaged, and though we became well acquainted, and she finally recovered her sight, she did not see me. About a year afterward we chanced to be together at a reception. She knew that I was the doctor who had cured her eyes, and that evening she came to me, complained of suffering from a severe cold, and asked me to prescribe. I took from my pocket a blank prescription and wrote: 'Dr. Hunt; to be taken immediately.' She read it and looked up laughingly. Our engagement followed, and soon after we were married." Dr. Hunt's ugliness proved no bar to his suit when he prescribed for the young lady, for she had evidently already learned to love him, and she owed her eyesight to his skill. Love, as the Christian well knows, may be inspired by one not seen, and in his case he owes to Him whom he loves, far more than eye-sight (1 Peter 1: 8).

A Great Gold Nugget was Found Under the old stump of a tree in Victoria some time ago. The circumstance was described recently by a miner to the reporter of a San Francisco journal. He said: "There was an unusually rich diggings in the vicinity of Mount Moliagul, Victoria, that had made a hundred men rich. It had been thoroughly worked in every direction, and it was thought that every grain of gold in the neighborhood had been collected. The crowd that once made the camp a busy scene of life had all gone away, leaving the shanties to the mercy of the weather, which soon made them a picturesque ruin. Off toward the east there was a solitary tree stump, standing on a pillar of earth, that had not been cut away by the gold-hunters because of the old roots of the tree that spread through the soil. It was not more than ten feet in circumference that had been left by the diggers. One day two miners came to the deserted camp and stopped over night on the site of the old camp. It occurred to them that the ground under the stump was as likely to prove rich as the portions of the neighboring field that had yielded so much gold. They began by undermining one side of the stump, but before they had dug in three feet they discovered an enormous nugget, one of the most valuable that had been found in the whole diggings. Those who are seeking for souls, more precious than gold, need never despair of finding unoccupied ground. Our fathers found such precious treasure in the neglected missionary field, and there is still much treasure awaiting the seeker there and in our own slums (Ps. 126: 6).

THE MAN CHRIST JESUS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.*

"Now consider how great this man was."—HEBREWS 7:4.

Melchizedek's Greatness—Many-Sided—Christ's Surpassing Greatness—I. An Exhortation to Consider it—Christ's Claim on the Consideration—Needs to be Considered—Brings Reward—II. Aids to Consideration—His Relationship to God—And to Men—The Surroundings of His Advent—His Mysterious Birth—His Life—Grandly Victorious—In His Death—In His Resurrection—In His Second Advent—III. Practical Lessons—His Infinite Power—Blessings for Seekers.

CONSIDER how great Melchizedek was. There is something majestic about every movement of that dimly-revealed figure. His one and only appearance is thus fully described in the Book of Genesis: "And Melchizedek, King of Salem, brought forth bread and wine: and he was the priest of the most high God. And he blessed him, and said, Blessed be Abram of the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth; and blessed be the most high God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand. And he gave him tithes of all." We see but little of him, yet we see nothing little in him. He is here and gone, as far as the historic page is concerned, yet is he "a priest forever," and "it is witnessed that he liveth." Everything about him is on a scale majestic and sublime. "Consider how great this man was" in the combination of his offices. He was duly appointed both king of righteousness and peace, and at the same time priest of the Most High God. It may be said of him that he sat as a priest upon his throne. He exercised the double office to the great blessedness of those who were with him; for his one act toward Abraham would seem to be typical of his whole life; he blessed him in the name of the Most High God.

"Consider how great this man was" in his supremacy over all around him. He met Abraham when he was returning as a conqueror from the overthrow of the robber kings; and the victorious patriarch bowed before him and gave him tithes of the best of the spoil. Without a moment's hesitation the man of God recognized the priest of God, and paid to him the tribute of a subject to the officer of a great king. When Paul had once proved that Melchizedek was greater than Abraham, he felt that he had clearly proved him to be.

at least to the Hebrews; for the seed of Abraham can recognize none greater than Abraham; and since Abraham by paying tithes acknowledges his subordination to Melchizedek, it is clear that the priest of the Most High God was the greatest of men.

"Consider how great this man was" as to the singularity of his person, "without father, without mother, without descent"—that is to say, we know nothing as to his birth, his origin, or his history. Even this explanation hardly answers to the words, especially when it is added, "Having neither beginning of days, nor end of life." So mysterious is Melchizedek that many deeply-taught expositors think that he was veritably an appearance of our Lord Jesus Christ. They are inclined to believe that he was not a king of some city in Canaan, as the most of us suppose, but that he was a manifestation of the Son of God, such as were the angels that appeared to Abraham on the plains of Mamre, and that divine being who appeared to Joshua by Jericho, and to the three holy ones in the furnace.

"Consider how great this man was" in his being altogether unique. There is another "after the order of Melchizedek," the glorious Antitype in whom Melchizedek himself is absorbed; but apart from him Melchizedek is unique. I shall leave you to that consideration; for my business this morning is not with Melchizedek, but with a greater than he. I shall take my text in its connection, but lift it up to a higher application. Beloved friends, if Melchizedek was so great, how much greater is that man whom Melchizedek represents! If the type is so wonderful, what must the Antitype be! I invite you to consider "how great" is He of whom it is written, "The Lord swore and will not repent, Thine are a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek." I will not say "Consider how great this man was," for there is no verb; the "was" is inserted in italics by the translators. We are to consider "how great this man." Say "was" if you will, but read also "is," and "shall be." Consider how great this man was and is, and is to be.

1. First, then, let me exhort you to consider how great this man, the Lord Jesus Christ, is. This subject claims your consideration. I do not think it should be a matter of option with you whether you will now consider the greatness of your Lord or not; and right that you should consider His greatness. For He of whom we speak—"this man"—is one well known among us. If you be true to your profession He is one most dear to you, to whom you owe all things, aye, owe your very selves. He is one between whom and you there is a troth plighted; you are espoused unto Him, your hearts are His, even as His heart is yours. If you do not consider Him, who will? He has loved you, and given Himself for you. Strangers may listen to our teaching at this time, and in vain we may cry,

IT IS HIS DUE

"Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?
Is it nothing to you that Jesus should die?"

But you are no stranger, you are not even a guest in His house, but you are a child living at home with Him. He is your brother, and much more; for He is bone of your bone, and flesh of your flesh. All your interests are wrapped up in Him. You are one with Him; by an endless union, one. I claim, therefore, and I am sure you assent at once to the claim, that you should often consider your Lord, and the greatness of His nature, person, office, and work.

Certainly the subject needs consideration; for, dear friends, we shall never gain an idea of how great He is unless we do consider, and consider much. When the Apostle Paul had known Christ for many years he wrote to the Philippians, and he then expressed himself as desiring to know Christ; for though he knew Him to his own personal salvation, yet he felt that he did not know Him to the full. He owned that he knew the love of Christ, but he added, "it passeth knowledge." In these days of science, falsely so called, determine with the apostle to know nothing among men save Jesus Christ and Him crucified.

Follow out this meditation, I pray you, because there is an exceeding great reward for any man who will "consider how great this man was." I find for myself that the only possibility of my living is living in Christ and unto Christ. Look you about and try to live by

THE WISDOM OF MAN.

Unstable as water and fickle as the wind is the product of human wisdom. The history of philosophy, from the beginning until now, is the history of fools; and never was folly so self-evident as in the philosophy which is now dominant. I believe that within a century it will be found impossible to make men believe that educated men were ever so degraded as to accept the philosophy of the present hour; it will seem to be so altogether absurd and contrary to all reason and common-sense, that it will be rejected with scorn as a popular delusion of a dark age. Even to-day this generation is kicking about like footballs the philosophies of preceding ages, and we may rest assured that future generations will do the same with the dotings of to-day. I find, therefore, that I must come back to the revelation of God. Here is a rock beneath my feet—"God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them."

II. Let me next assist you to consider how great this man was. And first, lest the very use of the expression, "this man," should leave anybody for a moment in doubt as to our faith in His Godhead, I bid you consider how great this man was in

HIS RELATIONSHIP TO GOD.

For though He was man, He was not merely man. He was assuredly and truly man in all respects, "man of the substance of his mother," bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh; and yet He was indeed and of a truth very God. Do not think of Him as a divine man, or as a human God; He was neither the one nor the other. He was perfectly man, yet He was infinitely God. Think, then, into what a position of honor and dignity His manhood was uplifted by union with the Godhead in one person.

You, my brethren, are not in doubt upon this vital matter; let me, therefore, ask you to consider "how great this man was" as to His relationship to men. Christ Jesus is the second man, the Lord from heaven. Adam, our first father, was the head of the race, and all men were in him as their representative; in him they stood in the garden; in him, alas! they fell when he broke the divine command, and the Lord took up the quarrel of His covenant, and cast him out of Paradise. "Oh, what a fall was there, my brethren! then you and I and all of us fell down." But now comes in the Lord Jesus Christ as the greater man, in whom none are made to fall, but multitudes arise. In this man the Lord is again well pleased with men. Time was when God looked on rebellious man, and it repented Him that He had made him; but now that He turns His eye to this perfect man He feels no such repentance; but, on the contrary, we read that "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself." For the sake of the man Christ Jesus He deals with the innumerable race of sinners in a way of long-suffering and pity, and does not destroy them. It has sometimes happened that the illustrious deed of one man has served to elevate a class, or even a nation into honor. A grand, heroic deed has welded you not only to that one person but to all His kith and kin. Consider, then, how great this man was, that the divine mind which cannot look upon sin without indignation, nevertheless was so charmed to look upon the person and character of this glorious Man, that an amnesty was proclaimed to the race, and a message was sent to the sons of men bidding them repent and turn to Him and live. "Consider how great this man was."

THE REPRESENTATIVE MAN,

Let me help you a little further, dear friends, to "consider how great this man was," by reminding you of the surroundings of

HIS FIRST ADVENT.

Thousands of years before His birth holy men had been speaking of Him. Prophets and seers all pointed to Him as The Coming One. That was an august Person toward whom all the past had been laboring, and for whom all the present was agonizing. "How great this man was," that when He came the saints were watching for Him; Simeon and Anna could not depart till He appeared. Angels stood on tip-toe ready to descend and sing, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will toward men." Humble shepherds, as they watched their flocks, did but wait for the signal to hasten to adore Him; and wise men from the East forgot the fatigues of a long journey that they might lay their gold and incense at His feet. "How great this man was," when, being born and laid in a manger, the whole earth was moved by His appearing.

Consider, too, "how great this man was," not only as to the outward circumstances of His coming, but as to the secret mystery of His birth. For this man was not "born in sin," as we are; neither was He "shapen in iniquity." This is a thing to be thought of and considered in our privacy, but it cannot be omitted here. Think of that word of old: "When He bringeth in the firstborn into the world, He saith,

* The first sermon after his return from Mentone.

And let all the angels of God worship Him." Let us, therefore, worship. Reverently forbearing all idle intrusion into the deep things of God, let us go to Bethlehem, and "consider how great this man was."

Now, let us look at

HIS LIFE.

After He emerged from the obscurity of His childhood, what a life was that of our Lord! His greatest adversaries, unless they have been mad, have never dared to speak against His character. If the Christian religion were supposed to be an invention, the existence of the narrative of the life of Jesus would be more wonderful than the facts themselves. The conception of a perfect character requires a perfect mind, and a perfect mind would never have prepared a fiction and imposed it upon men as a veritable history. If the life of Jesus be a fable, then a perfect being has deceived us; and this it is not possible for us to imagine.

The life of Jesus Christ is great throughout. It is so tender and so gentle that it is never little and mean; it is so unselfish that it never ceases to be majestic; it is so condescending that it is pre-eminently sublime. Look at Alexander; he is a great conqueror, but what a pitiful creature he appears when the drunkard's bowl has maddened him! What a poor thing is Napoleon as seen in privacy! In his captivity he was as suppliant as a spoiled child. Consider the Lord Jesus, and it does not matter where you view Him: in the wilderness He is over temptation; in the crowd He is greatly wise in answering those who would entrap Him. Behold Him in His agony in the Garden; was there ever such an Agonizer? Behold Him as the crucified; did ever cross hold such a sufferer? When Jesus is least He is greatest, and when He is in the direst darkness His brightness is best revealed. In death He destroys death; in the grave He bursts the sepulchre. "Consider how great this man was," the field of His life is ample; do not be slow to investigate it.

Beloved, I cannot speak as I would of Him. The blaze of this Sun blinds me! Yet consider how great this man was for then He appeared as the great Sin-offering, putting away the sin of His people. The Lord had made to meet in Him the iniquity of us all. What a weight was on Him, yet He sustained it! He bore in Himself all that was necessary to vindicate the divine justice until He could truly say, "It is finished." "Lama Sabachthani" is the most terrible word that ever came from human lips; and therefore "It is finished" is the greatest utterance that tongue ever gave forth. The work was colossal; what if I say it was infinite; and therefore our Lord Jesus when He cried "It is finished," had reached the summit of greatness. "Consider how great this man was."

But He has gone up on high, and has led captivity captive. Think of the gifts which were showered down from heaven in consequence of this man's ascent into the highest. For the Holy Spirit descended never to return till the close of this dispensation, and now all the gifts that rest in the church of God, and all the works of regeneration, illumination, sanctification, and the like, which are wrought by the blessed Paraclete, are the effects of the entrance of this man into the secret place of the tabernacles of the Most High.

"Consider how great this man is," and then remember that He shall shortly come to be our Judge! Possibly, while I am yet speaking to you, He may appear; no man knoweth the day nor the hour; but "how great this man is" will be clearly seen when, in flaming fire, He shall take vengeance upon those that will not obey Him. How "great" will He be when in the manifestation of His glory all believers shall be glorified! I think I hear, even now, sounding out of my theme, shouts of "hallelujah, hallelujah," from assembled worlds. I have but reached the fringe of my subject. We see but the skirts of our Lord's garments; His actual glory is unspeakable, unsearchable. Oh, the depths! Oh, the depths!

III. This in a few words is the practical improvement of the whole subject, with which we must wind up. Consider how great this man was, and as you consider, believe in His infinite

POWER TO BLESS MEN.

He is full of blessing as the sun is full of light, that He may shine upon His needy creatures. Christ is full of blessing that He may bless poor, needy, empty sinners. Dost thou say, poor sinner, "I am so great a sinner that He cannot save me"? Consider what this man did when He was here on earth; He went about and laid His hands on the diseased, and they were cured; He looked at devils, and they fled; He spoke to fevers, and they disappeared. Believe in the infinite blessedness treasured up in Christ for every believing soul, and come and take your share of it this morning.

And then let us ascribe to our Lord Jesus Christ all the honor that our thoughts can compass. Let us give to Him this day our very selves over again. Consider how great this man was, and go away feeling how greatly you are indebted to Him, what great things you ought to do for Him, and how little your greatest thing is when you have done it as compared with the greatness of His deservings.

"Let Him be crowned with majesty

That bowed His head to death;

And be His honor sounded high

By all things that have breath."

Do not you feel that question pressing upon your heart?

"Oh what shall I do

My Saviour to praise!"

Do something; and having done it do more, and yet more. Give up your whole being to the showing forth of how great this Man is!

Once more, considering how great this Man is, do not be afraid, nor troubled, nor tumbled up and down in your thoughts about anything that is happening, or is yet to happen. "Consider how great this man was." Our wise men are going to do away with the old faith; modern culture means to stamp out old-fashioned orthodoxy. Christianity itself is getting to be effete, and something better is to supersede it. Listen! "Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the Lord, and against His anointed. He that sitteth in the heaven shall laugh; the Lord shall have them in derision. Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion." One said to me the other day, "The current of thought does not seem to run in the direction of evangelical religion." Well, I said I should not believe in evangelical religion an atom the more if the current of thought did run that way. We do not believe according to the counting of heads. The currents of men's thoughts are so uncertain that you can better tell the flight of birds, or the changing of English weather. The gospel is perhaps the surer to be true because there are so few who believe it. It is according to our expectation that God's revealed truth should be abhorred and of every generation. I shall not believe the gospel any the less if I am left alone, nor shall I believe it any the more if the whole world shall cry it up. Let God be true and every man a liar. He whose faith stands upon the consensus of popular opinion has placed his feet upon the sand, but he who has read His Bible and has been taught of the Spirit of God what truth is, will hold to it, come what may.

When you consider how great this man is, it seems to me that to be a fool for His sake is the highest wisdom, and that to cling to what He says is the best philosophy, and to believe Him, and none beside, is not alone a duty but a necessity of every Christian spirit. Be of good cheer, dear friends! Let no man's heart fail him because of modern doubt. Let no man be troubled because of the fierceness of the fight. I can hear already the sounding of the trumpets of the Lord's coming. He is not far away; even if thousands of years intervene before His feet shall touch the Mount of Olivet the victory will never be doubtful. All is done that is required for winning the battle, His blood has been shed, His life has been accepted as a ransom. The eternal decree has settled it, nothing can change it! "He shall see of the travail of His soul, and shall be satisfied." Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

ASSYRIOLOGY.

Its Use and Abuse in Old Testament Study. By Francis Brown, Associate Professor of Biblical Philology in the Union Theological Seminary, New York. This volume contains, with slight amplifications, an address delivered by Professor Brown to the students of the seminary. It is the sensible, practical advice of a man of profound learning and wide experience to young men, who, being valiant for truth, are liable to take up hastily weapons which may do harm to themselves rather than to their adversaries. There has been undue haste, the professor thinks, in Bible students catching at the dicta of the Assyriologists. The investigation of the history, literature, and art of the Babylonians and Assyrians, as they have been revealed through excavation, has yielded valuable fruit to the defenders of the Bible. Unexpected confirmations of the Biblical records have been found in the cuneiform inscriptions on the clay tablets of the unearthed library; but in accepting the translation without question, and in resting a defence upon it, the zealous advocate may find his standpoint crumble beneath him, as it has already done in one or two instances in which the translators were mistaken. Another mistake has been the summary rejection of the testimony of Assyriology when it apparently conflicts with the Biblical account. This is not the attitude of the truth-seeker, who will rather wait to see if the apparent contradiction be not apparent only. These and other cautions of a like character Professor Brown gives, accompanied by illustrations such as that of George Smith's "Chaldean Account of Genesis."

Of the uses of Assyriology he speaks fully, and shows what are the aids it renders to the Bible student, and the directions in which it is most likely to prove useful in the future, as the work of deciphering proceeds. One illustration will serve to show the line of Professor Brown's treatment. It is the case of Ahab's treatment of Benhadad. There was nothing in the Biblical narrative to explain the magnanimity Ahab displayed toward his fallen foe. It could not be explained on the ground of mercy in Ahab's character, nor in any of the circumstances narrated; it was inexplicable. The tablets reveal the cause. The power of Assyria was then becoming a menace to the West; and as Benhadad's territory lay between Assyria and Ahab's territory, it was Ahab's policy to show leniency toward Benhadad, who would then act as a buffer between himself and Assyria, and, as a matter of fact, the collision, when it did come, took place on Benhadad's land. It is in such information, illuminating obscure points in the Biblical narrative, that Assyriology in one way renders valuable service. The closing words of the book give the key to the author's system of employment of these wonderful records. He says: "It is for us to catch these messages and understand them, that we may fit them into the great fabric of apprehended and acknowledged truth, to the enrichment of ourselves and those who shall be reached by our ministry and to the glory of our common Lord." Pp. 96. Price, $1. Published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

RED-LETTER DAYS:

A Memorial and Birthday Book. By Frances Ridley Havergal. A tastefully prepared little volume is this American edition of the late Miss Havergal's compilation. There is for every day of the year a passage of Scripture and a verse of original poetry, three days to a page, and on the opposite page three blank spaces for the corresponding days. These, as Miss Havergal suggested in her preface, may contain "a record of our red-letter days; for when a day of any special light and gladness comes, whatever may be the occurrence which makes it such to us, we may well call it a red-letter day—that is, a day of holy festival, and thenceforth of hallowed remembrance." Each month has at its commencement a poem by Miss Havergal's father, the Rev. William Henry Havergal, selected by his gifted daughter. The book is prettily bound in cloth, with red edges. Price, 85 cents. Published by Messrs. Anson D. F. Randolph & Co., New York.

STATESMEN and generals who study history, as they should do, will find it advantageous to give careful attention to the record of the British campaign against the Mahdi, if they have at any future time to decide whether they will undertake to make war in the Soudan. Certainly, if they do, they will not engage in such a war as M. Ollivier engaged in in the Franco-German struggle, "with a light heart." The difficulties that were encountered and overcome by the British in the Soudan were prodigious. With the patience and dogged perseverance that characterize the Anglo-Saxon race, they toiled on, meeting each difficulty as it arose, grappling with it, and surmounting it. Pity it was that so much toil and unwearied effort should have been wasted. The Soudan campaign accomplished nothing: The Mahdi was practically victorious, and Gordon, and Stewart, and a host of other brave men laid down their lives to no purpose.

The illustration given here represents one of the difficulties which had to be dealt with. To the leisurely Arabs it did not matter how much time a journey consumed, and a long delay was philosophically endured; but the British forces, to whom every day's delay in reaching Khartoum was a source of well-founded anxiety and another day of suffering, hardship, and death from disease, every obstacle was maddening. Two thousand camels in all were required for the transport service, and at one stage of the march they had to be ferried across the river. It was found impracticable to convey more than four of these beasts in any one boat, and so the number of boats and voyages necessary can be calculated. But it is not so easy to reckon how much precious time was lost at this one point. The artist has conveyed with marvellous skill an idea of this vexatious business. His picture indicates, as no words could do, the efforts needed to get each camel from the boat to the land. Ropes attached to the head, other ropes to one leg, and persuasion applied to the rear, men to drag at the ropes and to assist in other ways—all needed to get one camel landed. And there were two thousand of them!

AN AMATEUR EVANGELIST.

AMONG the dispersing congregation of a city church, one Sunday morning in summer, was a sturdy Christian man, a builder in a small way, who had, after a long and hard struggle, succeeded in accumulating a little fortune. Mr. Oliver's life had been a busy one. Six days' hard work, often with hand as well as brain, left him on Saturday night quite ready and thankful for a day of rest, and much disinclined for a day of active service in Christ's cause. But he meant to take things a little more easily now, and he meant, too, to give more time and effort to Christian work. "I've neglected it too long, that's a fact," he said. "I've been selfish, looking after my business all the week and taking the Sunday for rest and recuperation, that I might begin again on Monday with fresh strength." The Lord has had an unprofitable servant in me.

Mr. Oliver's thoughts had been turned in that direction with new energy by the sermon to which he had been listening. "I'll begin at once, this very day," he said to himself, with the energy and decisiveness which characterized him and to which he owed his business prosperity. The question was how he should begin, and as he wended his way to his bachelor home he considered the question. His fellow-pedestrians were church-goers like himself, and the avenue was full of them; but as he crossed a street his attention was called to it by the fierce yelps of a dog, and looking down the street he saw several men watching with delight a dog-fight then in progress. It was a low, degraded-looking street, in startling contrast to the avenue out of which it turned. Here was a neglected field of operations, and Mr. Oliver's self-questioning was answered.

Mr. Oliver walked up to the group of loafers lazily loitering against a convenient wall, and said, indicating the side door with his thumb, "Going in there, eh?"

"It ain't open just now," said one of the men; "the cop's around. We'll go in as soon as they open it. Perhaps you'll set 'em up."

"I would not mind standing 'treat if the liquor was right," Mr. Oliver said, "but I don't like the kind they sell here. It's bad."

"That's so," said another of the men, "but what can you do? The man's a ward boss, and he can adulterate to suit himself. Horrid fiery stuff you get here, but it's handy and it's cheap."

"I think it's dear at any price," Mr. Oliver remarked; "a man's better without it, even if he could get it for nothing, and when it comes to paying for it, why, he don't understand his own interest when he pays. I know a carpenter who spent half his earnings last week in such stuff, and he lost two days' pay beside; and if the foreman hadn't sent him home when he did he'd have lost his life. He nearly fell off the roof of a house, as it was. As good a workman as any man in the city when he has his senses. Let the liquor alone, I say."

"Say," said the first speaker, removing his pipe to ask the question, "didn't you talk of standing treat?"

"Yes; and I'm going to, and I'll give you something that'll do you good and won't send you to work to-morrow with a headache. See here"—and Mr. Oliver took some cards out of his pocket—"that's where I live. Now you three come and see me to-night, and I'll give you something like a drink."

"I guess our clothes ain't fit for that location," said one of the party, as he took the card and read the address; "we ain't aristocratic parties, boss, with a go-to-meeting suit at home."

"Well, it's my own place," said Mr. Oliver; "I guess I can have who I like to see me, and I invite you. You aren't too proud to come, I presume. I'm a workman myself, though I've done well and got on a bit. You come and see me, and I'll tell you how I did it."

"We'll come, boss. It's a new racket. No charge, you know; that's understood."

"Quite right. No charge. I'll expect you, say at five o'clock."

Mr. Oliver walked home with new energy in him. He had found some work to do for the Master, and only those who have worked for Him know how the spirit is invigorated and the life brightened by that service. Five o'clock duly brought the three invited guests. They had smartened up a bit, but they looked a little out of place in the comfortable, well-furnished room. Mr. Oliver had a good substantial meal spread, with excellent tea and coffee, to which the guests did justice, smiling a little grimly at the beverages, but obviously enjoying them after the first disappointment was over.

After the table was cleared Mr. Oliver noticed symptoms of uneasiness and an inclination to break up the party, but that was not his plan. "Now I know what you want," he said; "you want to smoke. I'm not a smoker myself; it does not suit me; but I've no objection to tobacco, and you'll feel more comfortable, I dare say, if you smoke; so light up. I want to have a talk."

Pipes were quickly lighted, and Mr. Oliver began by asking each man about his home and his work. It was a sad story he heard of wasted time, unhappy homes, and general hopelessness. A little sound advice was all he dare venture upon at their first meeting, but at the close he said it was his habit to have a few words of prayer at night, and if they did not object he would like them to join him. In their present mood, softened by his kindly sympathy, they consented, and a brief prayer ended the conference.

Mr. Oliver's Invitation.

"Now," said Mr. Oliver, "I've had a pleasant evening, and I'd like another. What say you?"

"Well, boss, you're kind. Nobody seemed to take much interest in us before. We're new to it, but what you've said is sensible. If Tom and Will are willing, I am."

Tom and Will were willing, and Saturday night was fixed for the next meeting. There was some demur about the day, Sunday being evidently a more suitable day; but Mr. Oliver knew they would not be at work on Saturday night, so he pressed it, and they consented. He meant to have them all three at church on the Sunday night, and he succeeded. He sat with them and saw that they were moved by the service.

That was the beginning of a work of grace in the degraded locality. The weekly teas were continued. The three men brought their wives once. Then they asked permission to bring a friend or two, and Mr. Oliver had the pleasure of seeing a marked change in many families originate in his effort. His kindly sympathy had won their hearts; he was recognized as a real friend, and many souls were won for Christ through his instrumentality.

THE JEW'S WARD.

SUMMARY OF THE PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

In a poor district in London Matthias Levi, a Jew, earned his living by mending shoes. Part of the house he occupied was let off to an aged, bed-ridden woman, who drank gin continually, and her granddaughter, a pretty child named Carola Fielding. The Jew tried to keep Carola from the vice surrounding her, taught her the commandments, and used his influence over her to restrain her from acquiring bad habits. Carola grew up in ignorance, ran about the streets with vicious companions, and learned to drink gin. A depraved young man, George Basset, tried to become her lover, but Carola resisted him. At last her grandmother died, and that night Carola, who happened to be looking out on the river, saw a struggle on a boat which afterward proved to have been a murder. At her grandmother's funeral a Testament was given her, and then, for the first time, she read of Jesus. She received further instruction and was converted. The Jew held in trust for her a little fortune safely invested, and on the proceeds of that she was sent to school. The Jew, vexed that she had become a Christian, held no further communication with her. She became a school-teacher and lived at a little village called Hazelmount, where the children and the villagers were won by her gentleness to love her. Philip Arnold, the son of the chief man of the place, rescued her from a fire and became engaged to marry her. The murder Carola had witnessed in London was discovered, and Carola was needed as a witness at the trial. She told the Arnolds the story of her early life, and they judged her unfit to be Philip's wife or any longer a school-teacher. She went back to London, was heartily welcomed by her old protector, the Jew, and gave evidence at the trial of Basset which led to his conviction. From this point the story proceeds.

Again an Outcast.

From the moment when she had given her evidence there had been no doubt of what George Basset's sentence would be; and his comrades had only lingered to hear the sentence of death pronounced upon him, and see how he bore it. There was a deep-seated feeling of resentment and indignation at Carola's treachery, as they called it. Both men and women were angry; the more so as the murder had taken place so long ago that justice seemed, after all these years, to be merely vengeance. If George Basset had been caught red-handed, and she had given her unfavorable testimony at once, the animosity excited by it would have been less. But that he should have escaped for over four years, and been taken at last, magnified the dreaded power of the law too much for them.

Carola had borne no part in his duty to give; but his sentence of death weighed upon her terribly. She knew that she could not in any way have avoided it, for he had motion to discover her. But none the less, as the slow days crept by, the oppression of his fatal doom almost effaced the remembrance of Hazelmount and Philip Arnold. In her little garret there was nothing to occupy her, and for hours together her busy hands were forced to be still, and her yet busier brain was filled with bewildered and almost hopeless thoughts. This was, indeed, the valley of the shadow of death to her.

During those days she did not venture to show herself abroad; for the first time she went out into the street she met none but scowling faces, and even those who had been in bygone days most friendly turned away from her without speaking. Soon after she returned to her garret a young policeman entered Levi's shop.

"Just keep Carol in-doors a bit," he said; "there's spite against her, and she'd hardly ha' got back safe if I hadn't bin followin' her all the time."

But Carola was scarcely aware of the ill-will that prevailed against her, and Matthias took care not to speak of it. The only resource her active brain had, and the only relief for her sad thoughts, was in planning schemes of help and good-will for her old neighbors in their degradation and misery. The cries of little children rang in her ears, and her whole heart yearned over them, as if she could gather them all into her arms and soothe their childish griefs. She was impatient for the hour to come; but until it was known whether the government would show mercy to the condemned man she must wait, weeping and praying—the common lot of women.

Some languid efforts were being made to get the death-sentence commuted for penal servitude for life; but there were no extenuating circumstances, unless the length of time between the crime and its penalty could be considered one. Knots of angry men and women discussed George Bassett's chances at the street corners, and laid bets upon them in the gin-palaces. The women were still more bitter against Carola than the men. She had come back to them a lady; she, Carola, who was no better than themselves, and she had come to betray her sweetheart instead of saving him. The old Jew had never been popular with them—chiefly because he was a Jew. They cursed him and his house as they passed by his little shop, and Matthias, with the traditions of centuries of persecution behind him, grew more timid and affrighted as the days went by.

So long as there was any hope of a reprieve the fury smouldered. But at length the morning came when many of them made a pilgrimage to the open space lying about Newgate, in order to see the black flag unfurled against the gray sky as the signal that all was over. The rest of the day was spent in drinking, until, as the January night drew in, the street was thronged from end to end with savage, half-drunken men and women, and with idle lookers-on, who ran in from other streets to see what would happen.

The old Jew, with his instinct of coming peril, closed the little shop at a very early hour, and made the door secure with its heavy bar. He sat within, still working at his bench, and listening to the growing tumult in the street. He said nothing to Carola, for why should the girl be alarmed or grieved when, perhaps, the disturbance would pass over, or the police come in sufficient force to protect them and control the threatening crowd? She could hear the soft, regular tapping of his hammer as she prepared supper in the room overhead, moving to and fro with sad and listless steps, for her heart had been very heavy all day, and the springs of life had been troubled to their depths. But suddenly, as her shadow fell across the window, a willow rose from the street below, and a stone, crashing through the panes, just missed striking her. She heard Matthias calling, "Carol, Carol!" in a voice of agony, and the instant after his white head and scared face appeared at the top of the narrow staircase.

"Put the lamp out, my darling," he cried; "quickly now, and say nothing. Make no noise, my daughter. Hush! Listen to the noise the Christian dogs are making."

It was a sound so awful that Carola never forgot it—those mingled yells and groans and hisses of cruel hatred. More missiles were crashing through the window, and the mob was battering against the shop-door below. There was no light in the room, except that which came in from the street lamps and a faint glow from the fire; but in it she could see the old Jew's haggard face scowling with a hatred as bitter as any that could be felt by the enraged crowd outside. He was anathematizing them, too—they and their God. Carola turned swiftly away and hid herself in the garret. The uproar was somewhat muffled here; she could not distinguish the uttered curses; but still she could hear the brutal roar of man's cruelty and hate.

She stood by the window looking down upon the river spangled with many lights, as she had so often seen them when she was a child. Sorrowfully yet resignedly, she had been thinking of making this garret her permanent home, while she took care of Matthias, and devoted herself to the help and comfort of her old companions. Perhaps it was for this, she thought, to serve them in this way, that God had first taken her away to teach and train her, and then brought her back again in such a manner as to leave no other career open to her. "Not my will but Thine be done," she had said amid her tears. But these were the people to whom she was willing to give up her life—these who were clamoring madly against her. She had never witnessed any outbreak like this in her girlhood among them, and the uproar was against herself and old Matthias.

"All right, Carola!" he shouted at last; "the police are come. I couldn't believe there'd be much damage done here in London."

The onset had lasted less than half an hour; but every pane of the window was broken, and stones and bricks were scattered about the floor when Carola went down into the room below. Matthias was gone to admit the police as soon as they should knock at the door. The fire was smouldering in the grate, but she did not dare yet to stir it into a blaze; but she could see the broken table on which she had laid the supper, and the shivered fragments of the lamp and dishes she had placed upon it. Presently two policemen came up-stairs, and lit up the room with their bright lanterns.

"We partly guessed what work there'd be," said one of them. "You'd better not have stopped here, Carol; it isn't safe for you. What made you come back here?"

"I didn't know they hated me," she answered, with a sob.

"They hate you like poison now, at any rate," he said; "it's what was to be expected, and, if you'll take my advice, you'll make yourself scarce here. Your life's not worth a brass farthing if you will stay in this place; for we can't be always watching after you. The old Jew had better go, too, for he's not over pop'lar. George Bassett had his friends, and his friends has their feelings, and what's the good of staying in a place where you'd be open to an attack like this any night o' the week? They'll never forgive you or forget you."

"I thought I could do them good," cried Carola; "it's only because they don't know that they do such things. I thought I could teach them better."

"They'll never learn anything good from you now," answered the policeman.

"We'll go away, Carol," said Matthias, tremulously. "I didn't see any of them, and I couldn't give any one in charge. It isn't worth while to try to get revenge. It's hard on us; but we had better go, if the police 'll let us get away. It'd kill me if you went away and I lost you again; and if you must go, I'll go. Don't forsake me, my dear. I'm a poor man and very old; but I can work yet. Only take me away with you."

"Yes," she answered, drawing his shaking hand through her arm, "you and I must be together always now. I shall never leave you again, Matthias—never."

"Then you steal away quiet somewhere," said the friendly policeman; "it 'll save murder, maybe. We've taken two or three of them; but if you're not here to appear against them, why, they'll come off easier, and you'll be safe. It's only natural, after all's said and done."

The next day an old Jew marine-dealer, well-known to Matthias Levi, came to the house to value and buy the scanty furniture it contained, leaving it to be fetched away after Matthias and Carola were gone. A policeman guarded the door all day; but late at night, when he was gone, all the neighborhood being quiet, they stole away from the house, which had been Carola's birth-place and his home for thirty years. The old Jew, trembling as if stricken with palsy, clung to Carola's arm as they walked slowly down the silent street, and looked back before they turned the corner which would shut it forever from their sight. They did not know where to bend their steps; but Matthias was willing to go anywhere, so that he was with Carola.

They were not short of money, for Carola had received her last year's salary, and the interest was due upon the money in the government bonds; Matthias also had the money his furniture and stock had brought to him. There was nothing to keep them in London, for neither of them had a friend there, and there would be, moreover, some danger for them in staying, even at a distance from their old abode. But they had no friends in any part of the country, for Carola could not return to that distant hazel-elm, which was as a closed Garden of Eden to her. She would not even go into the same county for fear of giving pain to Philip Arnold and his parents. She chose rather to seek a home as far off as possible, and as that lay northward, she turned her face to the south.

They found what suited them in a wide, straggling parish, part of which lay in the New Forest. It was a cottage containing four little rooms, with a garden, run wild, behind it, while before it stretched a wide, rounded sweep of partially cleared land, with here and there a pollard-tree standing. It had probably been a charcoal-burner's cottage, and no other dwelling was within sight. Carola was attracted to it by its stillness and the broad field of sky which brooded over the wild landscape. She was longing to be tranquil for a time, and to knit up the ravelled threads of her life.

As for Matthias, he was in a haze of bewilderment, leaving everything to Carola, and not unhappy as long as she was in his sight. Yet the solitary little house, with its tangled and overgrown garden, lying under the wintry skies, was totally different from anything that had hitherto come into his life's experience. But he made himself busy under Carola's direction, and by-and-by the place became more comfortable and home-like, and their quiet country life together began. A new cobbler's bench was set for him under the cottage window, with its diamond panes, and he sat down to it, while Carola went about the work in the house and the garden, as, if her very existence depended upon having no idle moments.

But there was no cobbling for Matthias to do. Most likely if there had been any he could not have done it, for the handle of his new hammer did not fit into his hand as the old one he had grown used to, and he missed the worn old bench with its familiar notches. But often whole days passed by with no human being coming in sight of their lonely dwelling.

It was February, a rainy month, and the lanes were heavy with mud, and the trees overhanging them were dripping with moisture. The nearest hamlet was more than half an hour's walk away, with no road to it except these wet and winding lanes. The old man, who for thirty years had worked with the ever-changing and busy spectacle of a London street passing before his eyes, would often sink into a half-dream as he sat listlessly at his useless bench; he seemed to see the fitting to and fro of many forms, and hear the constant tramp of unnumbered feet. Then he would wake up suddenly to the fact that in this strange place there was neither form nor sound—no presence save the beloved presence of Carola.

"Matthias," she said to the dreaming old man on the second Friday evening after they had entered their cottage, "have you forgotten that it is the Sabbath?"

The sun had set behind the rounded outline of the half-cleared land before them; yet he had not left his seat at the cobbler's bench. He had forgotten; there was nothing to remind him that his day of rest had come round again. Carola brought to him the Polish cap he had been used to wear, and set his face eastward, that he might pray toward Jerusalem. But though he began his prayers in his quavering voice, he soon broke off again, and a few heavy tears stole down his furrowed cheeks.

"I've forgotten the words, Carol," he cried, lifting his shaking hand to his forehead; "it is the Sabbath, but I have forgotten how I can pray to the Lord my God."

For a minute or two she stood beside him, with her brows knit and her dark eyes looking pityingly into his saddened face. With all her might she was striving to recall the few Hebrew words she had uttered as prayers when she was a child.

"Listen!" she said; "was it this?"

Matthias smiled his gentle, pleasant smile, and repeated after her what she could remember. But she could recollect little, and again his face grew troubled.

"I am cut off from His holy temple," he cried.

"Let me say a prayer for you," she said, softly; "it was made by one who was a Jew; but I only know it in English. The Lord God will hear it in English as well as in Hebrew."

Standing beside him, her hand in his, and with her face toward Jerusalem, Carola repeated the Lord's Prayer in her sweet, clear, tender voice. The simple sentences were such as the old man's clouded mind could partly comprehend; and when she said reverently "Amen!" he joined in the familiar word.

"It is a good prayer," he said; "but I shall recollect my own before next Sabbath comes."

CHRISTIAN CONTENTMENT.

S. S. Lesson for May 17, Phil. 4: 1-13. Golden Text, 1 Tim. 6: 6. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Rejoicing in the Lord—Faith Rejoicing in Trial—A Reason for Exultation—When Burdens Crush—Three Sons Converted—The Spring of Real Contentment—A Common Temptation—The Abolition of Grumbling.

"GODLINESS with contentment is great gain." Yes, all gain and no loss. Therefore Paul says, Rejoice in the Lord always. He does not say, "Rejoice in your experience," or "Rejoice in your progress," or "Rejoice in your work or in your success." He does not say, "Rejoice in your feelings, your circumstances, or your knowledge," but "Rejoice in the Lord." Paul at Philippi, Daniel in the lion's den, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego rejoiced, not in their circumstances, but in the Lord who was with them to deliver. Joshua with the children of Israel, when marching round the walls of Jericho, rejoiced in the Lord, who had given them the city, and the walls came tumbling down. Paul, in writing this and his other epistles from Rome, rejoiced in the Lord, who, while he himself was a prisoner, carried on the glorious work of salvation in the world, and he knew that the Word of God was not bound (1 Tim. 2: 9).

God always permits His children's faith to be tried. He tells us that the trial of our faith is more precious than of gold which perisheth. Faith would fail if it were not kept in exercise, and faith can always and in all circumstances rejoice in the Lord. While we measure only ourselves against circumstances which are difficult or trying, we may well mourn and grieve, for we are powerless. But faith credits God with the love which careth for us (1 Pet. 5: 7), and measures His strength and His faithfulness against the difficulties. What could Paul have done to liberate himself from the Philippian prison? What could Daniel have done against the lions, or the three children against the heat of the fiery furnace? But God; what could God not do? and what can He not do now in the very circumstances in which every one of my readers is placed? It was at the very time when Paul was a prisoner, and when many were preaching Christ "of strife and contention" for the very purpose of adding affliction to his bonds (Phil. 1: 15, 16), that he himself rejoiced, and taught generations of men since, Rejoice in the Lord, "and again I say rejoice." And he gives the best of reasons for his exhortation.

"THE LORD IS AT HAND."

Not far away, not needing to be urged by much prayer, not difficult to arouse, but at hand. How near? Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobed? How many there are who think and say, "I do not feel worthy that God should undertake for me; I don't think my prayers are good enough; I do not work enough for Him, and I have not the pleasure in reading His Word that I should like to have." Dear friend, God's eye is not so much upon what you are as on what Christ is. No one surely can have the conceit to think, "My Christian experience is so good that I merit special favor of God; my prayers, my Bible knowledge, are so superior that I have a claim upon God." No; the very thought is abhorrent. Rather would we say, "My Lord, who has redeemed me from death, and who has made my body His habitation, for His own sake, out of regard for His own habitation, will surely succor me." By dwelling in me He has made my interests His. My Lord is at hand. And because of this "let your moderation [or gentleness, or forbearance] be known unto all men." Rejoicing in the Lord at hand, we can be still in all circumstances, however much they might goad us, worry us, crush us, if we had to meet them in our own resources.

"Be careful for nothing" or "In nothing be anxious," but in everything, by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, "let your requests be made known unto God." Nothing is so crushing as a burden on the heart which has no outlet. God has made an outlet Godwards, unlimited and unrestricted. Anxiety is unavoidable when experience has taught us that a certain result must come from the indications which we see, unless we have at hand the Controller of all the forces in the spiritual and in the natural worlds. For instance, a child may be on the high road to ruin; all his surroundings tend to make that ruin certain. Now, can his parents refrain from anxiety? By prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God. Why thanksgiving? Because anything really put into God's hands has passed out of our hands into His, and is most surely undertaken by Him, so that we can give thanks as though we saw taking place before our eyes that for which we have been praying. God is so sure that we can thank beforehand for what is coming from Him, even while we see before our eyes that which appears the exact contrary.

A CHRISTIAN LADY.

who three years ago was almost distracted with anxiety about her unconverted sons, was led to trust them over into the Lord's hands, and give thanks for their conversion as a thing certain, because she believed that she received, and therefore knew that she had the petition she desired of Him (Mark 11: 24; 1 John 5: 14, 15). The result of her trust was first the fulfilment in her own soul of God's promise, "The peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds [or thoughts] through Christ Jesus." Soon after one and another of her sons became converted. One, however, continued to be a great trial, and her faith was sorely tried. But through all, even when the news which reached her was more and more sad, and when at last no news at all came, she could still thank God that her prayer was heard, and that God had undertaken his conversion. While thus kept in peace, this son returned to England, soon after became converted, and is now an earnest winner of souls.

springs out of the certainty that God has taken in hand that which we have trusted to Him; we think no more of our prayer, but of God's answer; no more of our faith, but of Him in whom we believe; no more of our difficulty, but of the infinite resources of Almighty which undertake it. How, then, can we but rejoice? how can we be other than content? David sung, I will bless the Lord at all times (Ps. 34: 1), and Paul wrote to the Ephesians, "Giving thanks always for all things." This would be impossible if we did not believe in the overruling Hand, which may indeed try our faith, but which holds winds and waves and all the powers of the universe in His control. Discontent and unbelief are twins, and so are faith and contentment. It is a common temptation of Satan's to set us thinking that, as man has a free will, therefore the trials which come to us through the tyranny, the injustice, evil temper, or jealousy of men are things in which we must deal with them, and not with God. But surely this is limiting the Holy One of Israel, without whose permission nothing can be either said or done, and without whom even Satan cannot bring evil upon His children.

After commending to the Philippians all things that are true, honest, just, pure, lovely, and of good report, Paul says, "Those things, which ye have both learned, and received, and heard, and seen in me, do; and the God of peace shall be with you." Paul did not fear to cite himself as an example of the Holy Ghost's teaching through him; in a graceful, courteous, and Christian way he acknowledges the liberality of the Philippian church to him. They had evidently sent him some present, and his comment is most teaching, "Not that I speak in respect of want; for I have learned, in therewith to be content. I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound; everywhere and in all things I am instructed how to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need. I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." What a revolution would be made in the Christian church if every believer followed Paul's example! If all the grumbling and murmuring and complaining were confined to the world, oh, how glorious would the Church of Christ be! If every Christian turned a shining, happy, peaceful face upon the world, what a testimony it would be of the reality of the presence of God! If a man who had known "how to abound" by giving away to God's work the chief part of his income knew how to suffer need by accepting joyfully even a crust of bread, without a sigh after his lost comforts, finding Jesus made up for all, worldings could not but be struck by it. When one who has abounded in usefulness knows how to be abased, as Paul was, and while put aside from active service yet rejoicing in the Lord, such an unusual phenomenon strikes all who behold it. Paul was never at a loss, "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." God has power either to satisfy hunger or to take it away, either to give warm clothes or quicken circulation. There is no such independence as to live in the perpetual recognition of God with us, God dwelling in us. We may be continually disappointed with ourselves, but never, never disappointed with Him. If we are content with God, agreed with God about everything, we shall not be troubled about anything that can possibly happen to us.

WHEN HE COMES.
If I were told that I must die to-morrow—
That the next sun
Which sinks should bear me past all fear and sorrow
For any one;
All the fight fought, all the short journey through,
What should I do?
I do not think that I should shrink or falter,
But just go on Doing my work, not seek to change, nor alter
Aught that is gone,
But rise and move, and love and smile and pray
For one more day.

And lying down at night for a last sleeping,
Say that I am
Which heaven's ever—'Lord, within Thy keeping,
How should I fear?
And when to-morrow brings The nearer still,
Do Thou Thy will."

I might not sleep for awe; but peaceful, tender,
My soul would lie
All the night long; at dawn the morning splendor
Flashed o'er the sky.
I think that I could smile—could calmly say,
"It is His day."

But if a wordless hand from the blue yonder
Held out a scroll,
On which my life was writ, and I with wonder Beheld unroll
To a long century's end its mystic clue,
What should I do?

What could I do, O blessed God and Master,
Other than this:
Still to go on as now, not slower, faster,
Nor fear to miss
The road, although so very long it be,
While led by Thee?

Step after step, feeling The close beside me,
Although unseen;
Through thorns, through flowers, whether the tempest hide Thee.
Or heaven's serene—
Assured Thy faithfulness cannot betray
Nor love decay.

Let me keep on, abiding and unfeeling
Thy will always,
Through a long century's ripe fruition,
Ora short day's

ABDURRAHMAN KHAN, the Ameer of Afghanistan—Herat, the Key of India.

THE AMEER OF AFGHANISTAN.

Personal Appearance—Birth and Family—Political Career—The War of 1880—Appointed Ameer—The Recent Durbar at Rawul Pindi.

His Highness the Ameer Abdurrahman Khan, whose portrait appears on our first page, is a man of some importance in the world at the present time. That importance has been rather thrust upon him than achieved, and probably does not conduce to his happiness or peace of mind, for he occupies that unenviable position metaphorically described as being between

THE HAMMER AND THE ANVIL.

The country he governs has Asiatic Russia on the one side and British India on the other. If England and Russia come to blows—a contingency which has during the past few weeks seemed constantly imminent—Afghanistan would probably be the scene of the conflict. With neighbors, both of whom are noted for their acquisitive propensities and intensely jealous of each other, the man, who wears the crown of Afghanistan has need of all his prudence, and should be an adroit diplomatist if he would retain his throne.

Abdurrahman is a man of fifty-five years of age, having been born in 1830. He has a stout, unwieldy figure, with broad heavy features wholly distinct from the Jewish type possessed by Shere Ali's branch of the family. When he visited the Viceroy of India four weeks ago, he was dressed in a blue undress military coat of European pattern, with a gray sheepskin Turkestan hat, and wore two stars on the left breast. He was suffering from the gout, and walked lame.

HIS FAMILY

is the royal family of the country, and Abdurrahman's branch is in the direct line of succession to the throne. His grandfather was Dost Mohammed, who ruled Afghanistan until his death, in 1863. When that event occurred a dispute arose about his successor. The dead king left three sons, Afzul Khan, the eldest, Shere Ali, the second son, who was Dost Mohammed's favorite, and Azim Khan. Dost Mohammed made his second son, Shere Ali, his heir, and immediately on the father's death Shere Ali was proclaimed Ameer. The eldest son and rightful heir, Afzul Khan, was absent at the time from the capital, governing Balkh in Turkestan, to which duty he had been assigned by his father, probably with the design of having him out of Shere Ali's way when the critical moment should come. But Afzul Khan was not inclined to submit tamely to his brother's usurpation. He gathered his friends together to enforce his rights, and his youngest brother, Azim Khan, supported him. A civil war ensued, which lasted four years, in which the leading generals were the two cousins, Abdurrahman, the son of Afzul, and Yakob, the son of Shere Ali. In the decisive battle Yakob was victor, and Abdurrahman fled into the northern provinces, which are now part of Asiatic Russia.

This family quarrel was closely but it was fought out without interference, and when Afzul Khan's forces were finally and decisively beaten, England recognized the usurper, Shere Ali, as de facto Ameer of Afghanistan. The fugitive prince found a refuge in the home of his wife's father, who was Ameer of Bokhara, in Northern Turkestan. Shere Ali, however, felt uneasy while Abdurrahman was so near, and seized his wife, mother, and sister, whom he held as hostages for his nephew's good behavior. Finally he prevailed on the Ameer of Bokhara, by coaxing and menaces, to withdraw his protection from the fugitive, and then Abdurrahman continued his flight northward until he met the advancing army of the Russians.

IN THE RUSSIAN CAMP

Abdurrahman was safe. General Kaufman, who was directing the Russian movements in Central Asia, was sufficiently far-sighted to know the advantage of having in his hands the rightful heir to the throne of Afghanistan, and he gave him a cordial welcome. He went further, and procured for him from the Russian Government a pension worth $15,750 a year, and gave him a residence at Samarcand.

While residing at Samarcand, in 1873, the American traveller, Mr. Eugene Schuyler, visited him, and had several interviews with him, from which he formed a high opinion of his character and intelligence; and he seems to have always been a man of industry in public business, working some hours daily with his secretaries, and attending punctually to all details of administration. His face, manners, and conversation are described as very pleasant, frank and dignified; and Sir Lepel Griffin, who was political agent of the British Government at Cabul in 1880, after the Afghan war, found no difficulty in coming to a good understanding with Abdurrahman.

Shere Ali meanwhile was getting into trouble with his British neighbors. The was of Russian instigation. The Czar, in 1877, sent a minister to Cabul, who was graciously received by the Ameer. English jealousy was immediately excited, and a representative, with a large suite, was promptly sent to circumvent the Russian diplomatist. Scarcely had he crossed the border when he was stopped by an Afghan official, who would not permit him to proceed until he had obtained the consent of the Ameer. The question was submitted to Shere Ali, who, having consulted with his Russian adviser, declined to receive the representative of the British Government.

The rebuff aroused English indignation, and Lord Lytton, who was then Viceroy of India, sent an expedition to Cabul. The Afghans made but a feeble resistance, and as the English approached the capital, Shere Ali fled. He found a refuge with the Russians, but died in their camp shortly afterward. Yakob Khan, his son, promptly entered into negotiation with the British, offering to receive a resident at Cabul. As this question had been the cause of the war, the concession was considered a sufficient triumph, and the treaty of Gandamak was signed on May 5th, 1879. The British retired, leaving Sir Louis Cavagnari as the representative of England at Cabul.

On September 30—of the same year 1879—there was a popular rising, in which Sir Louis Cavagnari and all his suite were massacred. A second invasion followed to take vengeance on the murderers, and on December 24th, 1879, Sir F. Roberts, the British general, captured Cabul. Yakob Khan was suspected of conniving at the massacre, and was sent a prisoner to India. He was probably innocent of the crime, but he had proved himself an incapable ruler, and he was deposed. The inhabitants, however, were sullenly hostile to the British, and though for the time overawed, they were not subdued. It was evident that if Afghanistan was to be annexed by England, a large force would be required to hold it, and therefore it was decided to withdraw as soon as a ruler acceptable to the Afghans was established. Among many claimants to the throne was Abdurrahman, who, emerging from his retreat at Samarcand, collected a considerable army of supporters, and the British recognized him as Ameer, and having settled a pension upon him they retired. They also ceded to him the city of Candahar, which was originally part of Afghanistan.

THE PRESENT TROUBLE

arose out of the Russian advance and absorption of Merv. This brought the frontier of Asiatic Russia in contact with Afghanistan. The English Government watched the Russian movement with apprehension, and demanded that a limit to the aggression should be fixed. It was accordingly agreed between the two powers that the frontier should be defined by two commissioners, a Russian and an Englishman. Sir Peter Lumsden was appointed by England, but Russia has delayed on several pretexts to send a commissioner to meet him. She did, however, send a commissioner, M. Lessar, to London with a proposal. There was a strip of country which includes Penjeh, lying between Afghanistan and Turkestan. The Ameer claimed it, but has never occupied it, and it was this tract of country that was the subject of dispute. M. Lessar proposed that the boundary line of Afghanistan should be drawn south of Penjeh, thus giving Russia the whole of it. Before England had given a decisive answer to the proposition, Abdurrahman sent an expedition, and seized Penjeh. Russia claims that the act was instigated by the English, and was a violation of an agreement entered into between Russia and England that neither party should enter the disputed territory during the progress of the negotiations. The Russian general made an advance in retaliation, and finally, on March 30th last, the Afghans were attacked and severely beaten by the Russians. The question now in dispute, and which it is reported, is to be submitted for arbitration to the King of Denmark, is as to the advance of the Russians and the Afghans respectively. It is left for him to decide who was the aggressor and whether the advance was a violation of the agreement.

Abdurrahman, in spite of his ancient friendship with Russia and his obligations to her for hospitality during his exile, evidently desires to maintain friendly relations with England. It is clearly his interest to do so. England has shown no disposition to encroach on his dominions. On the contrary, she voluntarily surrendered Candahar to him after conquering it. On the other hand, the slow, stealthy approach of Russia is a menace to him, and he court English protection from

HIS POWERFUL FOE.

He recently paid a visit of ceremony to India the Viceroy, Lord Dufferin, going northward to meet him. The Ameer was sumptuously feasted and entertained in eastern fashion, and Lord Dufferin, held at Durbar, a grand reception in his honor on April 8th, at which the Ameer was treated with the utmost respect. A large number of costly gifts were bestowed upon him among which were a jewelled sword, five thousand rifles, a battery of artillery, and six horses. During the proceedings the Afghan monarch made a speech, in which he said: "I am deeply sensible of the kindness which I have received from his Excellency the Viceroy and of the favor shown to me by her Majesty the Queen-Empress. In return for this kindness and favor, I am ready, with my army and my people, to render any services which may be required of me or of the Afghan nation."

There appears to be little doubt entertained of Abdurrahman's sincerity, but it is uncertain how far he can pledge his people. Their loyalty to him is not assured, and their hatred of the English is well known. It is said that they have a fiercer hatred of the Russians, and would welcome English aid to drive them out; but that fact there is no reliable evidence. It is gratifying to notice the disposition evinced to submit the dispute to arbitration. Every successful adoption of this principle is a step in humane direction, for which the world has cause to be thankful. The selection of the King of Denmark as arbitrator was doubtless due to the fact that he is the father-in-law both of the Czar of Russia and the Prince of Wales.

HERAT.

The city to which the title of "the key of India" has been given is situated near the boundary line which divides Afghanistan from Persia on the west and Turkestan on the north. (A picture of a portion of it, with one wing of the fortress that commands it, appears on our first page.) Its strategic importance is, therefore, immense, and its possession is essential to any invader of India from the land. It is this fact which has alarmed England. Russia has been drawing near to Herat, and if she once gained possession of it she would command the road through which she might at any time pour her hordes of Cossacks into England's treasure possessions.

Colonel Malleon, who vainly endeavored some years ago to arouse the English Government to realization of the importance of seizing Herat, has described the advantages it would confer on the power which held it: "A glance at the record of the past will show that from time immemorial the city was regarded as an outlying ulwark, the possession of which was necessary prior to attempting the conquest of India; the holding of which by India or by quasi-vassal powers dependent on India would render impossible an invasion of that country. It was so considered by Alexander, by Mahmud and his successors, by Chingiz Khan, by Taimur, by Adir Shah, by Ahmad Shah, and by Muhammad Shah, the Persian prince who attacked it in 1837. In the cases of all but the last the possession of Herat led to the conquest of India; in the case of the last the successful defence of that city rendered invasion impossible.

ITS STRATEGIC VALUE.

"The hasty reader may object—what can the possession of one city signify? A question of its nature touches the real point of the argument. Herat is called the gate of India, because through it, and through it alone, the valleys in be entered which lead to the only vulnerable part of India. Those valleys, running nearly north and south, are protected to the east by inaccessible ranges, to the west by impracticable deserts. Not in-ading army could dare to attempt to traverse the great salt desert, and the desert immediately south of it, the Dasht-i-Naud, while a British army held Herat. As long as that army should hold Herat, so long would an invasion of India be impossible. The possession of Herat by Russia means the possession of that one line by which India can be invaded; the possession of Herat by England means the annihilation of all the Russian hopes of an invasion of India. Let the reader imagine that Candahar is the frontier British station; that between Herat and Candahar is a long lane, so protected on both sides that the man who must wish to traverse any part of it to Candahar must pass by Herat. Is it not obvious that the power which shall hold Herat will completely dominate the lane? It is this which makes the possession of Herat by England a matter of vital consequence.

"Another fact illustrates the enormous value of Herat. Place an army there, and nothing need be brought to it from Europe. Within the limits of the Herat Territory all the great roads leading on India converge. The mines of the Herat district supply lead, iron, and sulphur; the surface of many parts of the country is laden with saltpetre; the willow and the poplar, which make the best charcoal, abound; the fields produce in abundance corn and wine and oil. From the population, attracted to its new fields by good government, splendid soldiers might be obtained.

"Such are the military advantages presented by Herat to the power that shall occupy it, should that power be an enemy. Herat would be to him an eye to see and an arm to strike;—an eye to pry into every native court of Hindustan, to watch the discontents and the broodings of the rulers, the heart burnings of their subordinates. From watching and noting to fermenting and stirring up there is but one short step. Every court, every bazaar, in India, would note the presence on the frontier, in a position not readily unassailable, but becoming every day more and more capable of assailing, of a first-class power, the secret enemy of England, and professing the most unselfish anxiety to relieve them of their distress. An arm to strike, because a few years of intelligent rule would render the valley of the Hari Rud capable of supporting and equipping an army strong enough even to invade India.

"In a third sense, likewise, the possession of Herat by an enemy would not be less dangerous to England. The roads converging on it, already alluded to, are traversed by caravans to which no other route is available. We may be sure that the city which successfully resisted the rivalry of Meshed, when Meshed was backed by all the influence of the Shahs of Persia, will take a still higher position when supported by the might either of England or of Russia. The European power whose influence shall be paramount in Herat will rule the markets of Central Asia."

Mr. Charles Marvin, in his excellent work recently reviewed in this journal, thus describes the city as he saw it: "Herat stands on the right bank of the Hari Rud, from which water is brought by several channels. It is built in the form of a rectangle, the north and south faces being about fifteen hundred, and the east and west faces sixteen hundred yards in length. Enclosing the city is about fifty feet high, surmounted by a wall ranging from twenty-five to thirty feet, with a deep moat, which can be easily flooded from the Hari Rud. The citadel is situated in the centre of the city, and is also surrounded by a moat. There are five gates, of which one, however, is closed up, and each is flanked by two bastions. The city is bridged at each of the four gates by a wooden drawbridge, which is raised and lowered by mechanical appliances worked from inside the walls. Each face of the four walls is furnished with from twenty-five to thirty bastions. On the exterior slope of the embankment, supporting the walls, are two lines of shelter trenches, one above the other, carried all around the city, except where the gates are. A correspondent with Lumsden's mission describes the mounted armament as some 'twenty guns of varied calibres, besides numberless others lying dismounted on the ramparts.' 'Twenty guns to defend three and one quarter miles of wall! The garrison consists of four thousand or five thousand troops, exclusive of irregulars.

THE PEOPLE.

"The estimates of the population show considerable divergence. The first during the present century was Christie's, who visited the place in 1809, and reckoned the population at 100,000. Burns and Shakespeare called at Herat on their way north. Connolly was there in 1828-30, and gives 65,000 as the figure; while Pottinger, in 1837-38, states the number at about 40,000; and Ferrier, in 1843, estimated it as low as 22,000. Whether any of the numbers, or all of them, were correct, is impossible to say; but since Herat is a rendezvous for the country people when threatened by the enemy, each estimate may be quite correct for the year stated. Later, in 1865, Pollock again gave 100,000; and in 1878 General Godekoff thought the approximate number was close on 50,000. The latter figure is now generally accepted by geographers."

Herat has had a chequered history. A Persian geographer says: "The city has been fifty times taken, fifty times destroyed, and fifty times has it risen from its ashes." The last capture was in November, 1856, when the Shah of Persia seized the city. He was, however, compelled to relinquish it by a British force which threatened his empire with annihilation if he refused to evacuate Herat. Russia has at present laid no claim to the city, but she has drawn so close to it that she could take it before England or any other power could interfere, and once there could not be easily dislodged. Six hundred and sixty years ago it contained, according to the records, 12,000 retail shops, 6000 public baths, caravansaries, and water mills, 350 schools and monastic institutions, and 144,000 occupied houses, and was yearly visited by caravans from all parts of Asia.

INCIDENTS OF BIBLE DISTRIBUTION.

Some years ago an association was formed for distributing Bibles in the dark places of Europe, principally where the Roman Catholic Church is the nominal church of the people. In a recent report of this society, the following incidents are mentioned:

A FRENCH SINGING GIRL'S CONVERSION.

One of our distributors was in the east of France last August, where he held two meetings in a hall near to where some chanteuses were giving a soirée. Being very much struck with their lightness and frivolity, he determined to administer reproof and warning, though feeling great difficulty in doing so. However, the opportunity presented itself, and he at the same time gave a copy of the Scriptures. Some months after, being in the west of France, a number of peasant girls got into the same compartment of the railway carriage. Almost directly one of them uttered a cry of joy, coming up to him and taking his hands, which she bathed with tears. It was the singer of the month of August. She had read the parable of the prodigal son; had returned to her family, resumed her work in the fields, was pardoned, and saved.

AN AGED JEW LED TO CHRIST.

Mons. le Pasteur Hirsch, of Paris, says: "A Jew, to whom I offered a Bible, said angrily to me, 'You are a converter!—a wretched occupation.' 'You are mistaken; it is a glorious privilege to make the Redeemer known to men.' 'You won't convert me, however.' 'That which I cannot do God will do; He is powerful and good. I remember the time when I used to talk like you; now I talk differently. Accept this book; you will not compromise yourself in any way.' He accepted it with a sarcastic smile on his lips. He has just written as follows: 'To change one's religion is to change one's whole life. That is what conversion is. God can perform what is impossible to man; all the glory be to Him. I am a new man in Christ.'

A MARSEILLES SHOEMAKER'S DISCOVERY.

A friend in Marseilles writes: "One fact struck me lately. A poor shoemaker, having just changed his lodgings, found on the floor of his new dwelling a Gospel, covered with dust. In the evening he began to read this Gospel, and found in it such good things that he continued to read it through the night, then daily, until he became deeply touched and was converted. One of our colporteurs passed through the little village, and offered him a Bible. With tears in his eyes he said to him, 'It is the Lord who has sent you.' They conversed a long while and prayed together, and the shoemaker received a Bible. Now all his family are converted to the Lord, and every Sunday this man holds meetings in his house."

THE GOSPEL AMONG THE ROMAN SOLDIERS.

Signor Capellini, of Rome, observes: "Joseph Poggiali, a sergeant-major belonging to a village near Imola, was an example to the church for his activity and faith. He received his discharge, and returned home, where he resumed his occupation as a miller. As long as his health continued good his parents never troubled themselves about his Bible-reading; but he fell ill, and his life was despaired of, and they immediately sent for the priests to confess him, and to administer the sacrament. It was then that Poggiali was constrained to testify for Christ, saying that He only was his Confessor and Saviour. Seeing him remain firm in his convictions, the priests used every means in their power to persuade him to recant. He died, refusing their visits, and praying aloud to the Lord."

"One day I went to the Artillery Barrack, but hardly had I opened the packet, when a guard chased us away like dogs, threatening the soldiers if they should accept a single book; but a corporal, Canton of Vicenza, secretly got us to give him one, and we heard no more of him or of the Testament. But a fortnight after he came to the church at the head of ten of his companions. He said to me, 'I wished to persuade myself of the truth of the Word of God before coming to you, and now that I know what it is, I have come myself and brought my friends with me.' I gave them each a New Testament, and to Canton a Bible. They continue most regular in their attendance, and bring others with them. In church they are examples; in quarters they speak to their companions, and by their means many have turned to the Lord Jesus."

WHY ARE SATAN AND SIN PERMITTED?

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached last Sunday Morning, May 10, 1885.

"Wherefore do the wicked live?"—JOB 21: 7.

POOR JOB! With tusks and horns and hoofs and stings, all the misfortunes of life seemed to come upon him at once. Bankruptcy, bereavement, scandalization, and eruptive disease so irritating that he had to re-enforce his ten fingernails with pieces of earthenware to scratch himself withal. His wife took the diagnosis of his complaints and prescribed, profanity. She thought he would feel better if between the paroxysms of grief and pain he would swear a little. For each boil a plaster of oburgation.

Probably no man was ever more tempted to take the bad advice than when, at last, Job's three exasperating friends came in, Eliphaz, Zophar, and Bildad, practically saying to him, "You old sinner, serves you right; you are a hypocrite; what a sight you are! God has sent these chastisements for your wickedness."

putting down the pieces of broken saucer with which he had been rubbing his arms, and with swollen eyelids looks up and says to his garrulous friends in substance, "The most wicked people sometimes have the best health and are the most prospered," and then in that connection hurls the question which every man and woman has asked in some juncture of affairs, "Wherefore do the wicked live?"

They build up fortunes that overshadow the earth. They confound all the life-insurance tables on the subject of longevity, dying octogenarians, perhaps nonagenarians, possibly centenarians. Ahab in the palace, Naboth in the cabinet. Unclean Herod on the throne, consecrated Paul twisting ropes for tent-making, Manasseh, the worst of all the kings of Juda, living longer than any of them. While the general rule is the wicked do not live out half their days, there are exceptions where they live on to great age and in Paradise of beauty and luxuriance, and die with a whole college of physicians expending its skill in trying further prolongation of life, and have a funeral with casket under mountain of calla lilies, the finest equipages of the city jingling and flashing into line, the poor angle worm of the dust carried out to its hole in the ground with the pomp that might make a spirit from some other world suppose that the archangel Michael was dead.

Go up among the finest residences of the city, and on some of the door-plates you will find the names of those mightiest for commercial and social iniquity. They are the

VAMPIRES OF SOCIETY

—they are the gorgons of the century. Some of these men have each wheel of their carriage a juggernaut wet with the blood of those sacrificed to their avarice. Some of them are like Caligula, who wished that all people had only one neck that he might strike it off at one blow. Oh, the slain, the slain! A long procession of usurers and libertines and infamous quacks and legal charlatans and world-grabbing monsters. What apostrophe of despoliation! Demons incarnate. Hundreds of men concerning all their energies of body, mind, and soul in one prolonged, ever-intensifying, and unrelenting effort to scald and scarify and blast and consume the world. I do not blame you for asking me the quivering, throbbing, burning, resounding, appalling question of my text, "Wherefore do the wicked live?"

In the first place, they live to demonstrate beyond all controversy the long-suffering PATIENCE OF GOD.

You sometimes say, under some great affront, "I will not stand it;" but perhaps you are compelled to stand it. God, with all the batteries of omnipotence loaded with thunderbolts, stands it century after century. I have no doubt sometimes an angel comes to Him and suggests, "Now is the time to strike." "No," says God; "wait a year, wait twenty years, wait a century, wait five centuries." What God does is not so wonderful as what He does not do. He has the reserve corps with which He could strike Mormonism and Mohammedanism and Paganism from the earth in a day. He could take all the fraud in New York on the west side of Broadway and hurl it into the Hudson, and all the fraud on the east side of Broadway and hurl it into the East River in an hour. He understands the combination lock of every dishonest money safe, and could blow it up quicker than by any earthly explosive. Written all over the earth, written all over history are the words, "Divine forbearance, divine leniency, divine long-suffering."

I wonder that God did not burn this world up two thousand years ago, scattering its ashes into immensity, its aerolites dropping into other worlds to be kept in their museums as specimens of a defunct planet. People sometimes talk of God as though He were hasty in His judgments and as though He snapped men up quick. Oh, no! He waited one hundred and twenty years for the people to get into the ark, and warned them all the time—one hundred and twenty years, then the flood came. The Anchor Line gives only a month's announcement of the sailing of the Circassia, the White Star Line gives only a month's announcement of the sailing of the Britannic, the Cunard Line gives only a month's announcement of the sailing of the Oregon; but of the sailing of that ship that Noah commanded God gave one hundred and twenty years' announcement and warning. Patience antediluvian, patience postdiluvian, patience in times Adamic, Abraham, Mosaic, Davidic, Pauline, Lutheran, Whitefieldian. Patience with men and nations. Patience with barbarisms and civilizations. Six thousand years of patience! Overtopping attribute of God, all of whose attributes are immeasurable.

Why do the wicked live? That their overthrow may be the more impressive and climactic. They must pile up their mischief until all the community shall see it, until the nation shall see it, until all the world shall see it. The higher it goes up the harder it will come down and the grander will be

THE DIVINE VINDICATION.

God will not allow sin to sneak out of the world. God will not allow it merely to resign and quit. This shall not be a case that goes by default because no one appears against it. God will arraign it, handcuff it, try it, bring against it the verdict of all the good, and then gibbet it so high up that if one half of the gibbet stood on Mount Washington and the other on the Himalaya, it would not be any more conspicuous.

About fifteen years ago we had in this country a most of how God lets a man go on in iniquity, so that at the close of the career his overthrow may be the more impressive, full of warning and climactic. First, an honest chairmaker, then an alderman, then a Member of Congress, then a supervisor of a city, then school commissioner, then State Senator, then commissioner of public works—on and up, stealing thousands of dollars here and thousands of dollars there, until the malfeasance in office overtopped anything the world had ever seen—making the new Court House in New York a monument of municipal crime, and rushing the debt of the city from thirty-six million dollars to ninety-seven millions. Now, he is at the top of MILLIONAIREDOM.

Country seat terraced and arbored and palatial clear to the water's brink. Horses enough to stock a king's equerry. Grooms and postilions in full rig. Wine cellars enough to make a whole Legislature drunk. New York finance and New York politics in his vest pocket. He winked, and men in high place fell. He lifted his little finger, and ignoramuses took important office. He whispered, and in Albany and Washington they said it thundered. Wilder an mightier and more baleful his influence, until seemed as if Pandemonium was to be adjoined to this world, and in the Satanic realm there was to be a change of administration, and Apollyon who had held dominion so long, should have a successful competitor.

To bring all to a climax,

came in the house of that man. Diamonds as large as hickory nuts. A pin of sixty diamonds representing sheaves of wheat. Musicians in semicircle, half-hidden by a great harp of flowers. Ships of flowers. Forty silver sets, one of them with two hundred and forty pieces. On wedding dress that cost five thousand dollars. A famous libertine, who owned several Lord Island Sound steamboats, and not long before he was shot for his crimes, sent as a wedding present to that house a frosted silver iceber with representations of Arctic bears walking on icicle-handles and ascending the spoon. Was there ever such a convocation of picture of bronzes, of bric-a-brac, of grandeur, soci grandeurs? The highest wave of New York splendor rolled into that house and recoiled perhaps never again to rise so high. But just that time, when all earthly and infernal observation was concentrated on that man, impersonated by that wonder of the American bar, Charles O'Connor, got on track of the offender. First arraignment, then sentence—twelve years' imprisonment under twelve indictments, then penitentiary on Blackwell's Island then a lawsuit against him for six million dollars, then incarceration in Ludlow Street jail, then escape to foreign land, to be brought back under the stout grip of the constabulary, the dying of broken heart in a prison cell. God allowed him to go on in iniquity until all the world saw as never before that "the way of the transgressor is hard," and that dishonesty will not declare permanent dividends, and that yet had better be an honest chairmaker with a day wages at a time than a brilliant Commissioner Public Works, all your pockets crammed with plunder.

What a brilliant figure in history is the intimidator of France, of Anjou, of Brittain victor at Hastings, snatching the crown of England and setting it on his own brow, destroying homesteads that he might have a larger game forest, making a Domesday Book by which I could keep the whole land under despotic espionage, proclaiming war in revenge for a jot uttered in regard to his obesity. Harvest field and vineyards going down under the caval hoof. Nations horror struck. But one day while at the apex of all observation he is riding out and the horse put his hoof on a hot cinde throwing the king so violently against the pommel of the saddle that he dies, his son hasten to England to get the crown before the breaker has left his father's body.

THE IMPERIAL CORPSE

drawn by a cart, most of the attendants leaving it in the street because of a fire alarm that might go off and see the conflagration. As just as they are going to put his body down the church which he had built, a man stepping up and saying, "Bishop, the man you praise is a robber. This church stands on my father's homestead. The property on which this church is built is mine. I reclaim my right. In the name of Almighty God I forbid you to bury it ing here, or to cover him with my glebe." Go up," said the ambition of William the conqueror. "Go up by conquest, go up by ane, go up in the sight of all nations, go up y cruelties." But one day God said, "Come own, come down by the way of a miserable eath, come down by the way of an ignominious besuikes, come down in the sight of all nations, come clear down, come down forever." And ou and I see the same thing on a smaller scale any and many a time—illustrations of the fact hat God lets the wicked live that He may make heir overthrow the more climacteric.

What is true in regard to sin is true in regard o its author, Satan, called Abaddon, called the rince of the Power of the air, called the serent, called the dragon. It seems to me any ntelligent man must admit that there is a COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF OF ALL EVIL.

The Persians called him Ahriman, the Hindus alled him Siva. He was represented on canas as a mythological combination of Thor and erberus and Pan and Vulcan and other horible addenda. I do not care what you call im, that monster of evil is abroad, and his one rk is destruction. John Milton almost orified him by witchery of description, but he s the concentration of all meanness and of all lespicability. My little child, seven years of age, aid to her mother one day, "Why don't God ill the devil at once, and have done with it?" n less terse phrase we have all asked the same uestion. The Bible says he is to be imprisoned and he is to be chained down. Why not leave the old miscreant into his dungeon now? Does it not seem as if his volume of infamy vere complete? Does it not seem as if the last ifty years would make an appropriate peroration? No; God will let him go on to the top of all bad endeavor, and then when all the earth and all constellations and galaxies and all the niverse are watching with a violence and ghastliness enough to per- uade five hundred eternities that a rebellion gainst God must perish. God will not do it by leccameal. God will not do it by small skirmish. He will wait until all the troops are massed, and hen some day when in defiant and confident mood, at the head of his army, this Goliath of hell stalks forth, our champion, the son of David, ill strike him down, not with smooth stones from the brook, but with fragments from the Rock of Ages. But it will not be done until this giant of evil and his holy antagonist come out within full sight of the two great armies. The tragedy is only postponed to make the over- throw more impressive and climacteric. Do not fret. If God can afford to wait you can afford to wait. God's clock of destiny strikes only once in a thousand years. Do not try to measure events by the second hand on your little timepiece. Sin and Satan go on only that their overthrow may at last be the more terrific, the more impressive, the more resounding, the more climacteric.

GOD WILL HURL HIM DOWN

Why do the wicked live? In order that they may build up fortresses for righteousness to capture. Have you not noticed that bad men, and accomplishes good through them? Witness Cyrus, witness Nebuchadnezzar, witness the fact that the Bastille of oppression was pried open by the bayonets of a bad man. Recently there came to me the fact that a college had been built at the far West for infidel purposes. There was to be no nonsense of chapel prayers, no Bible reading there. All the professors there were pronounced infidels. The college was opened, and the work went on, but, of course, failed. Not long ago a Presbyterian minister was in a bank in that village on purposes of business, and he overheard in an adjoining room the board of trustees of that college discussing what they had better do with the institution, as it did not get on successfully, and one of the trustees proposed that it be handed over to the Presbyterians, prefacing the word Presbyterians with a very unhappy expletive. The resolutions were passed, and that fortress of infidelity has become a fortress of old-fashioned orthodox religion, the only religion that will be worth a snap of your finger when you come to die or appear in the Day of Judgment. The devil built the college. Righteousness captured it.

In some city there goes up a great club-house—the architecture, the furniture, all the equipment a bezzazement of wealth. That particular club-house is designed to make gambling and dissipation respectable.

DO NOT FRET.

That splendid building will after a while be a free library, or it will be a hospital, or it will be a gallery of pure art. Again and again observatories have been built by infidelity, and the first thing you know they go into the hand of Christian science. God said in the Bible that He would put a hook in Sennacherib's nose and pull him down by a way he knew not. And God has a hook to-day in the nose of every Sennacherib of infidelity and sin, and will drag him about as He will. Marble halls deserted to sinful amusements will yet be dedicated for religious assemblage. All these castles of sin are to be captured for God as we go forth with the battle shout that Oliver Cromwell rang out at the head of his troops as he rode in on the field of Naseby: "Let God arise and let His enemies be scattered." After a great fire in London, amid the ruins there was nothing left but an arch with the name of the architect upon it; and, my friends, whatever else goes down God stays up.

Why do the wicked live? That some of them may be

MONUMENTS OF MERCY.

So it was with John Newton, so it was with Augustine, perhaps so it was with you. Chieftains of sin to become chieftains of grace. Paul, the apostle, made out of Saul the persecutor, Baxter, the flaming evangel, made out of Baxter the blasphemer. Whole squadrons, with streamers of Emmanuel floating from the mast head, though once they were launched from the dry docks of diabolism. God lets these wicked men live that He may make jewels out of them for coronets, that He may make tongues of fire out of them for Pentecosts, that He may make warriors out of them for Armageddons, that He may make conquerors out of them for the day when they shall ride at the head of the white horse host in the grand review of the resurrection.

Why do the wicked live? To make it plain beyond all controversy that there is another PLACE FOR ADJUSTMENT.

So many of the bad up, so many of the good down. It seems to me that no man can look abroad without saying—no man of common sense, religious or irreligious, can look abroad without saying, "There must be some place where brilliant scoundrelism shall be arrested, where innocence shall get out from under the heel of despotism." Common fairness as well as eternal justice demands it.

We adjourn to the great assizes the stupendous injustices of this life. They are not righted here. There must be some place where they will be righted. God cannot afford to omit the judgment day or the reconstruction of conditions. For you cannot make me believe that that man stuffed with all abomination, having devoured widows' houses and digested them, looking with basilisk or tigerish eyes upon his fellows, no music so sweet to him as the sound of breaking hearts, is at death to get out of the landau at the front door of the sepulchre and pass right on through to the back door of the sepulchre, and find a celestial turnout waiting for him, so that he can drive tandem right up primrose hills, one glory riding as lackey ahead and another glory riding as postillion behind, while that poor woman who supported her invalid husband and her helpless children by taking in washing and ironing, often putting her hand to her side where the cancerous trouble had already begun, and dropping dead late on Saturday night while she was preparing the garments for the Sabbath day, coming afoot to the front door of the sepulchre, shall pass through to the back door of the sepulchre and find nothing waiting, no one to welcome, no one to tell her the way to the King's gate. I will not believe it. Solomon was confounded in his day by what he represents as princes afoot and beggars ahorseback, but I tell you there must be a place and a time when the right foot will get into the stirrup. To demonstrate beyond all controversy that there is another place for adjustment God lets the wicked live.

Why do the wicked live? For the same reason that He lets us live—to have

TIME FOR REPENTANCE.

Where would you and I have been if sin had been followed by immediate catastrophe? While the foot of Christ is fleet as that of a roebuck when He comes to save, it does seem as if He were hopped with great languors and infinite lethargies when He comes to punish. Oh, I celebrate God's slowness, God's retardation, God's putting off the retribution!

Do you not think, my brother, it would be a great deal better for us to exchange our impatient hypercriticism of Providence because this man, by watering of stock, makes a million dollars in one day, and another man rides on in one bloated iniquity year after year—would it not be better for us to exchange that impatient hypercriticism for gratitude everlasting that God let us who were wicked live, though we deserved nothing but capsize and demolition? Oh, I celebrate God's slowness! The slower the railroad comes the better, if the drawbridge is off.

How long have you, my brother, lived forgiven? Fifteen, twenty, forty, sixty years? Lived through great awakenings, lived through domestic sorrow, lived through commercial calamity, lived through providential crises that startled nations, and you are living yet, strangers to God and with no hope for a great future into which the next moment you may be precipitated. Oh, would it not be better for us to get our nature through the grace of Christ revolutionized and transfigured? For I want you to know that God sometimes changes His gait, and instead of the deliberate tread He is the swift witness, and sometimes the enemies of God are suddenly destroyed, and that without remedy.

MAKE GOD YOUR ALLY.

What an offer that is! Do not fight against Him. Do not contend against your best interests. Yield this morning to the best impulse of your heart, and that is toward Christ and heaven. Do not fight the Lord that made you and offers to redeem you.

Philip of France went out with his army, with bows and arrows, to fight King Edward III. of England; but just as they got into the critical moment of the battle a shower of rain came and relaxed the bowstrings so that they were of no effect, and Philip and his army were worsted. And all your weaponry against God will be as nothing when He rains upon you discomfiture from the heavens. Do not fight the Lord any longer. Change allegiance. Take down the old flag of sin, run up the new flag of grace. It does not take the Lord Jesus Christ the thousandth part of a second to convert you if you will only surrender, be willing to be saved. The American Congress was in anxiety during the Revolutionary War while waiting to hear news from the conflict between Washington and Cornwallis, and the anxiety became intense and almost unbearable as the days went by. When the news came at last that Cornwallis had surrendered and the war was practically over, so great was the excitement that the doorkeeper of the House of Congress dropped dead from joyful excitement. And if this long war between your soul and God should come to an end this morning by your entire surrender, the war forever over, the news would very soon reach the heavens, and nothing but the supernatural health of your loved ones before the throne would keep them from being prostrated with overjoy at the cessation of all spiritual hostilities.

REMINISCENCES OF THE LATE GENERAL GORDON.

THE Rev. Cunningham Geikie, D.D., author of "Life and Words of Christ," who is now in Egypt, in a recent communication, says:

"I have heard many things respecting General Gordon from friends who knew him in his last residence in the East, and your readers will be glad to know them. One told me that his eyes had been affected, and the only doctor being at Jerusalem, Gordon, without his knowledge, hired a carriage to take him there, he being himself unable to bear the expense. He always expressed a wish to die, if it pleased God. 'Here,' he would say, 'I can only have the society of my fellow-creatures, but beyond death I will be ever with the Lord Jesus forever and ever.' In conversation, you would at one moment see the humble Christian; at another the quick and resolute soldier."

He always told his friends in Palestine, when about to leave it for the Congo, that he never should return from Africa. He felt a presentiment that he would die there. "He used to come in at that door," said a lady to me, "go over to the baby's chair, and taking that red cushion out of it, sit down on the door-step and smoke his cigarettes. Then we would all gather around him, and he would talk so beautifully." "He was so humble," said the Jaffa hotel-keeper; "he carried his own luggage upstairs, and when his nephews were here, got their horses ready with his own hand." To this worthy man he gave a copy of "The Imitation of Christ," on leaving for Europe. It is full of his private marks to the end. No money would buy it, for, like every one who knew Gordon, the hotel-keeper worships his memory.

"I always loved God," said he to a friend, "from my childhood, but it was not till I was a young man that I was converted in the true sense. Then, there came a time when I felt as if a veil had been drawn aside from before my heart, and God had entered in to dwell with me, henceforth." He would often say "Oh! to be with Christ in heaven, forever." He used to say also that he would greatly like to go about everywhere and preach the Gospel, if he could do so without being known. He wanted to go to the East of London and work there without letting it be known, but he was persuaded past this.

He was so modest that he shrank from company, and was timid and silent before ladies. He drew back from any gathering where introductions were needed. Having offered to become godfather to a missionary's child, he attended its baptism, but wished to leave as soon as the ceremony was over. It was only from two or three friends having come that he stayed a little while. "He was too sensitive to be able to see fresh faces."

Having called on the parents of his little godson, about three weeks after it was born, he was astonished to find that it could not crawl round yet. "Was I such a duffer as that when I was as old?" Then it had no teeth! "Are babies really born without teeth?"

In the Soudan, he said, he had $30,000 a year, as Governor, but he brought nothing out of the country when he returned to England. He spent his income in adding to the insufficient salaries of the officials, to keep them from accepting bribes, and thus to secure justice for the people at large. He had no right, he held, to make money out of these poor people.

A poor dragoman told me that General Gordon used to come often to his house in Jerusalem when he and his wife lay ill, and that he would take any cushion or mat and put it on the floor as a seat, there being no chairs or furniture, and sit down with his Testament to read and speak to them about Christ. But his zeal did not end with such easy philanthropy. Ascertaining that a doctor's account had been incurred to the amount of fifteen dollars, he went off secretly and paid it. Far away at Khartoum, he still thought of one whom he had thus striven to lead into the fold of Christ, and sent a letter to him which reached Jerusalem almost at the same time as the news of its writer's death. "That letter," said the poor Copt, "I would not part with for all that is in the world." General Gordon was a real Christian. He gave away all he had to the poor in Jerusalem and the villages round, and the people mourn for him as for their father."

Such was the man who perished in Khartoum!

THE PREDICTED UNIVERSAL KINGDOM.

By Professor H. Lummis, of Monson, Mass.
The Doctrine in Daniel—The Circumstances—The Dream and Signification—A Parallel Dream Picture—The Dream and the Key—The Forcible Reduction of all Power—Smiting its Foundation—Sudden and Swift—A Pure Government.

If there were but a single Old Testament prophecy of this kingdom, one made definite by passing from its picture form in which it was at first given to the great King of Babylon, and afterward to that prince among the seers, Daniel, of the Children of the Captivity, it would establish on a foundation, not to be shaken, the doctrine of the kingdom, a kingdom in this world, a kingdom embracing the globe and to be possessed by the saints. A king, a realm, a multitude of subjects are requisite to a kingdom in the strict sense. I give

THE OUTLINE.

Nebuchadnezzar dreams a dream. It troubles him. He wishes to know its signification, but before he can state it to his magicians and astrologers and sorcerers, and to the Chaldeans, it escapes his memory. He requires these men to tell the dream and its interpretation. With good reason they reply to this strange demand, that the requirement is beyond human power. In anger the monarch gives orders that all the wise men of the kingdom be slain. As one of them, Daniel is threatened by the decree. He seeks the king and asks time, giving assurance that both dream and interpretation will be given. God reveals the dream to the prophet, and he, acknowledging the Most High as the source of his wisdom, states before the king the dream and its signification. In the dream is seen a great image of gold and silver, and copper, and iron, and clay. A stone cut out of a mountain without hands smites the image upon the feet. The shock pulverizes the image, and the dust is carried away by the wind, like chaff blown from the summer threshing-floor. The stone becomes a mountain and fills the earth.

In telling the meaning of the dream, Daniel declares that the different parts of the image represent successive kingdoms, the four metals and the clay signifying the strength, and at the same time the weakness of the last of the four sovereignties. Daniel closes his interpretation with these remarkable words:

"And in the days of these kings, shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never (to eternity) shall not be destroyed, and the kingdom shall not be left (transferred) to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume (grind up and make an end of) all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever. Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, the copper, the clay, the silver and the gold; the great God hath made known what shall come to pass hereafter, and the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure, or trustworthy, rendered "faithful" in Dan. 6:4.

The prophet declares to the king that God has made known to him (not that something shall come to pass, but) what shall come to pass.

to this dream picture and its simple prophetic meaning is given us in the first Book of the Bible. Pharaoh dreams of seven fat and of seven very lean kine that come up out of the great river of Egypt. The lean kine, after devouring the fat kine, are still as lean as before. In his perplexity Pharaoh summons Joseph, the Jewish captive, who at once interprets the dream. The seven fat kine mean seven years of great plenty. The seven lean kine, seven following years of very grievous famine, which shall exhaust the abundance of the years of plenty, and leave the people greatly straitened by want.

One advantage is found here. The history in which the prophecy is fulfilled is recorded, no complete evidence could be given that the prophetic meaning given to the dream was the strictest and most literal sense of the word realized. Any intelligent grammar-school-boy could understand Joseph's interpretation, and could understand that the succeeding history records the fulfilment of what Joseph foretold what Pharaoh understood; and therefore appointed Joseph to superintend the storing of the abundance of the years of plenty to provide for the coming famine.

Just so the interpretation given by Daniel to Nebuchadnezzar. It avails not to say the passage occurs in a confessedly obscure and difficult book—this part of the book is no more obscure than the following chapter which tells of the image of gold set up on the Plain of Dura, and of the three Hebrew children thrown into the fiery furnace. Nebuchadnezzar's dream, like that of Pharaoh, was a picture prophecy, and without a key could not be understood, could not be explained. The God of heaven gives to its meaning to Daniel, and Daniel gives them to the king. If the king understood what kingdom meant when applied to his own empire and sovereignty, he understood what it meant when applied to the kingdom that the God of heaven should set up.

The implication in the interpretation, and this has been generally admitted by commentators is, that these great empires represent universal world empires, each successive one merging its predecessor in its own sovereignty.

With even greater force, the explanation of Daniel implies the forcible reduction of all other political power to nothing, and the occupation of absolutely

UNIVERSAL WORLD DOMINION.

Albert Barnes, in his notes on Daniel, remarks, here: "The language would seem to imply some violent action; some positive crushing force, something like that which occurs in conquests when nations are subdued." This is evident, even in a close translation. Adam Clarke uses even stronger language. "Here He (Christ) is represented under the notion of a stone projected from a catapult, or some military engine, which smote the image on its feet—that is, smote the then existing government at its foundation, or principles of support, and by destroying these, brought the whole into ruin." It is true that, with astonishing incongruity, the stone from the catapult is represented as smiting Constantine into a Christian. (The dust in that case has surely blown away very slowly.) It is represented as still smiting by the circulation of the Bible and by missionary societies. Gentle crushing this! Exceedingly gradual pulverizing! Most tender breaking in pieces, consuming slower than the consuming of iron rust!

Britain," writes the venerable, charming, but most inconsequent commentator, "is Christian without the altering of her Magna Charta or her Constitution," and I might add (if it did not shade on sacrifice in such a connection) without diminishing aught of her rapacity in the expansion of her vast domain, without lifting her heavy heel from the necks of subject or intimidated nations. Alas for my ideal, if even England, is, or typifies, the kingdom of God!

It cannot be! There is to be—it has not yet come—a breaking with a rod of iron—a shivering to pieces as a potter's vessel is shattered. The clang of the stone of the huge image has not yet been heard; the crumbling of dynasties and the sweeping away of their debris as with the breath of a tempest has not yet been seen. But it approacheth! When the history, whether it be seen but not written, or seen and then written, shall transpire, there will not be need of fifteen hundred and fifty years to know whether the crushing stroke from the catapult missile has smitten temporal thrones out of existence. He who witnesses the downward sweep of that stone cut out of the mountain, will hear under human oppression before its shivering shock takes place, and see every shackle that human greed has forged and locked on the limbs of cringing slaves shattered forever under the earthquake convulsion of that approaching hour. Thereafter, under the sway of the Son of God, will the gates of commerce be forced by the enginery of war to thrust into a resisting nation's throat and against a monarch's loud protest a drug that dwarfs and poisons the body and degrades the soul? Will liquor-leagues control legislators and bribe judges, after a mightier bolt than Vulcan ever forged or Jove ever brandished shall have been hurled? Reason answers No; and prophecy, from the shores of the Euphrates, thunders down along the centuries, over crumbling dynasties and regal dust, an authoritative No. Christ's kingdom established, iniquity cannot triumph!

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Duke Becomes a King.—At a recent Meeting a stranger said: "A former Duke of Hamilton, when he found that his end was drawing near, called his brother into his bedroom, and said: 'Charles, bring me the coronet and the insignia of the dukedom!' At his request the things were brought and placed upon a table before him. Addressing his brother, and pointing to the articles which lay on the table, the good duke said: 'Charles, you will soon be a duke; but oh, brother, I shall soon be a king.' 'If children, then heirs, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Jesus Christ.'"

A Jew Drawn to the Cross.—Mr. Jack, the well-known evangelist, said: "By some means a Jew was led into an evangelistic meeting, and there he was so mightily impressed that he sought pardon and received forgiveness of all his sins, through faith in Christ. A friend subsequently asked him the circumstance of his conversion, and he replied: 'As I sat in the meeting, I saw the pole with the serpent upon it being lifted up, and as I looked it melted away and the cross took its place. I felt the drawing power of that cross, and there and then I passed from death unto life.' Oh, dear friends, have you, like the Jew, felt the drawing power of the Cross? If not, get right down below the thief on the cross, and Jesus will lift you up."

Swimming without an Air-Collar.—A Christian minister remarked: "There are a great number of people who, when they have given themselves to the Lord, seem to stand still, fearing to move or do anything for their Master. I asked the bath-master where I reside one day how my little girl was getting on with her swimming, and he said, 'Oh, she can swim very well, but her timidity keeps her back. She will not venture into the water without the collar about her neck.' One day I put on the collar, but did not put in the air-pipe, and she went into the water quite confidently, and when she came out she found that she had only a piece of leather about her neck. This is like the timid Christian—afraid to go out to fight the enemy unless they have some one at their side."

A Drunkard's Deliverance.—A man, now a Christian, said: "Seven years ago in a mission hall a man came to me in the after meeting, and kindly said, 'I have had my eye upon you for some time. I desire your salvation. Jesus died to save you!' Smitten to the heart, I bowed my head and wept, but I went home and struggled with the Lord, for the drink was never twenty hours out of my head. I had a slender hope that the Lord would somehow deliver me, and from that night I resolved to serve Him as He might give me opportunity. I was in a meeting shortly after that, and the speaker chose for his text: 'He shall be called Jesus, for He shall save His people from their sin.' From that address I learned that Christ was able to keep me from sin; I at once put my whole trust fully in Him, and in His strength I am able to stand. ... Jesus only can do helpless sinners good."

An Unsuccessful Battle.—Mr. Rodgers, a well-known Christian worker in the North, speaking on the subject of want of divine strength, remarked: "I know a man in a good position, who occupies a large house, and his great besetting sin is the love of strong drink. He has tried again and again to overcome this terrible evil, and he may stand for a few days at the time, but soon breaks out again as bad as ever, because he is without strength. Many times I have pitied him struggling against this sin in his own strength, but he has never overcome it, and he never will until he seeks divine assistance. O poor sinner, whoever you are, you who have been trying to fight against evil in your own strength, give it all up, and seek divine aid; otherwise you will not succeed."

What a Black Book Did.—Mr. Simpson, the well-known evangelist, said: "A young man was brought up in the strictest Roman Catholicism, but he was not satisfied; he had a longing for something better. There was a priest who came upon a parcel of Bibles, and his ire was kindled, and at a meeting he said: 'The Bible is the blackest book on the earth; and it must have been printed by the devil; and this young man was present, and he said to himself, 'That is just the very book for me. I will read it and then go in the opposite direction.' On his way home he met a man with a basket of Bibles and New Testaments. He bought one of each, and studied them well. When he came to John 3:16, he exclaimed: 'This seems as if there were salvation for the whole world, and I must be included.' And at once this young man turned from his former faith to serve a risen and glorified Christ."

A Freethinker's Happiness.—An Earnest evangelist said: "One Sunday morning I was hurrying along a country road to a meeting, when a man overtook me. Entering into conversation with him, I asked him if he were happy, to which he at once replied, 'Oh, yes, I am always happy.' And I, sincerely believing him, answered, 'Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.' 'Oh,' he said, 'I am not one of that sort, I am a Freethinker.' I opened up to him as clearly as I could the way of life through Jesus Christ, whether he would or not, and his attention was arrested. I cannot but believe that the Lord has found and saved him. He had a false happiness which the world gives, but true happiness comes only from the Divine giver of all good and perfect gifts. But there must be first of all the pardon of sin through the precious blood of Christ, or it is impossible that peace can follow."

Too Simple to Understand.—The Rev. Mr. McKee said, at a noonday prayer meeting: "When we were holding a week's meeting lately, souls were saved at every service; but there was one case of a particular kind, which I will mention. It was that of a young man who stayed to be spoken to on the last night of our meetings. I said to him, 'Are you willing calmly and deliberately to make a full surrender of yourself to the Lord?' And in very earnest tones he answered, 'God knows I am willing.' I then said to him, 'Come, let us kneel, and tell God so,' and we knelt down, he praying, I putting the words into his mouth. After the prayer was finished, before rising from our knees, I asked, 'Do you mean what you have said?' 'God knows I mean it,' he answered. 'And has the Lord taken you?' I asked. He hesitated, and then replied, 'I cannot tell; I am not quite sure.' 'Christ says,' 'Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out,' I remarked. 'I see it now,' he enthusiastically exclaimed; 'it was so simple I could scarcely believe it.' Meeting a gentleman on his way out, he remarked, 'It is so very simple!' Yes; 'a wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein.'

GOSPEL WORK AMONG CHINESE WOMEN.

DR. E. H. EDWARDS, who is laboring for Christ in the Si-ch'uen Province, under the auspices of the China Inland-Mission, thus writes:

A great number of women at Chen-tu visit Mrs. Riley nearly every day, and already three have given good evidence of being truly converted, and have been received into the church. One of these is a woman who had been helped to give up opium-smoking, for unfortunately in this province of Si-ch'uen a great number of women are addicted to the habit. A second case of conversion is that of

AN OLD LANDRESS.

Before she came under the influence of the Gospel, she was a devoted idolater and strict vegetarian. In order to be the better able to attend to her idolatrous rites she lived in a temple with a number of nuns, and was considered by her friends and neighbors to be a most exemplary old lady. On Mrs. Riley's arrival she with a number of other women went to see the foreign lady, and then for the first time heard the Gospel! She was interested in what was told her, and went again and again, and at last expressed a desire to give up her idolatry and become a Christian.

In order to give an opportunity to her to abandon her idols, and to us at the same time to instruct her more fully, she was allowed to occupy a room in 'Ye-su T'ang' (Jesus' Hall); but she still went out to do her washing. By this means she was enabled to attend worship at least once a day. Being nearly blind she was quite unable to read, but having a very retentive memory, learned many of the hymns. In this she was helped by two Christian boys who are being educated and trained by Mr. Riley. She would wash their clothes and comb their hair, and they in return would repeat the hymns to her.

After a while she was able so distinctly to give a reason for the hope that was in her, that no hesitation was felt in receiving her into fellowship. She continued to follow her usual calling, 'speaking for Jesus' wherever she went, and thus carrying the good news into many a home, where but for her it would never have been heard. When I saw her she was, though poor, remarkably neat and clean, and with a bright and happy face that was of itself a recommendation of the Gospel.

MRS. NIX, A BUTCHER'S WIFE.

is another case. When she first consented to be a Christian she had to endure a good deal of persecution from her mother-in-law, as well as impudence from her own son, a boy of only fifteen. At last her husband, though apparently himself not interested in the Gospel, spoke in her favor, and said she was not to be molested, but allowed to do what she thought right. Not long afterward she was baptized. Her neighbors bear testimony to the fact that she had a very bad temper before she joined the 'Jesus religion,' but that since then there has been a decided improvement. Her son, too, who formerly helped to persecute her, has expressed a desire to become a Christian, and with his father's consent is living at the Jesus Hall to be instructed.

A POOR BLIND GIRL.

frequently visits Mrs. Riley, who, though not a Christian, might well be an example to many who go by that name. When quite young, both her eyes were destroyed by small-pox. When she grew up, a lady who was a scholar, did 'good deeds,' and for three years instructed the girl, teaching her a number of poems and songs. These she now sings or chants in the houses of the well-to-do, being invited by them on the occasion of feasts, etc., and thus she is now able to support her aged father and mother. But she does more, for she cooks their 'rice' and washes and mends their clothes. She is very cheerful, and has a bright, intelligent face."

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Democratic Dissatisfaction with the President's course has begun to show itself in unmistakable form. A leading Democratic journal states that a conference of prominent members of the party at Washington, among whom are Messrs. Randall, Beck, Voorhees, and Smalley, have intimated to Mr. Cleveland that the policy of making more rapid and sweeping changes in the offices, and of making them in accordance with the wishes of the leaders, is demanded by his party, and that he "has been kindly and plainly told that on no other policy can his Administration hope for success, and that by going ahead on a line displeasing to the representatives of the Democratic sentiment of the country, he will speedily come to the parting of the ways." This trouble was expected, and it would doubtless have occurred if a Republican President had been elected, if he had failed to make as many removals as were expected of him. In both parties there are unfortunately men of powerful influence, who have no other idea of the offices than that they are spoils to be divided among the victors. The influence of such men is wholly mischievous. So long as they rule American politics will continue to be a by-word for corruption and degradation.

Three Diplomatic Appointments of Importance were made on May 8th. The first was that of Minister to Russia, the position for which General Lawton was originally nominated, but which he honorably declined, when it was found that there was a doubt whether he was constitutionally eligible. The President has now nominated Mr. George V. N. Lothrop, of Michigan, for the mission. Mr. Lothrop is a lawyer of much distinction in his State. He was born in Easton, Conn., in 1817, but removed to Detroit at the conclusion of his college course. He has been attorney-general of the State, and was subsequently elected City Recorder of Detroit. His appointment to the Russian mission gives great satisfaction in Michigan, where Mr. Lothrop is popular with both political parties. The post of Minister to Hayti is given to Dr. John E. W. Thompson, a colored physician of New York. He was strongly recommended for the office by the faculty of Yale, where he studied. He is twenty-five years of age, and has already attained eminence in his profession.

He is said to be an excellent linguist. Mr. Boyd Winchester, of Kentucky, has been appointed Minister to Switzerland. He is forty-nine years of age, and is a native of Louisiana. Since he removed to Kentucky he has attained eminence as a lawyer and politician. He has twice represented Louisville in Congress. It is stated that our present minister to Switzerland, who is a Methodist clergyman, has made himself unpopular by identifying himself with the Salvation Army in that country during their troubles. If Mr. Winchester should become unpopular, it is not likely to be through imitating the example of his predecessor. His record shows unhappily that his sympathies are not in that direction at all.

The Trial of Short, the Man who Stabbed Captain Phelan in the office of O'Donovan Rossa, on January 9th last, was concluded on May 6th. The prisoner did not deny inflicting the twelve stabs, but claimed that it was done in self-defence. To the amazement of every one, the jury acquitted him. The judge expressed his surprise at the verdict, and added contemptuously to the jury, "You are discharged from any further service in this court." In a letter to a daily journal on the following day, he characterized the verdict as "a gross miscarriage of justice." That is the light in which it is regarded by the public. That Short escaped punishment for so brutal a crime is a direct encouragement to violence in the city. Phelan doubtless is himself a wrong-doer, but it is a dangerous lesson for a jury to teach that a man who is culpable may be carved up by an enemy with impunity. This trial and its result is a disgrace to the city. Some light has since been shed upon the action of the jury by the arrest of one of its members, who is charged with having visited Rossa's office while the trial was in progress.

The Scourge at Plymouth, Pa., Continued last week with unabated virulence. At the close of the week sixteen hundred people were reported sick. In one street, of one hundred and fifty houses, every house but three had in it one or more persons prostrate with the disease. In some cases whole families are down, and there is no one to attend to the sick. One particularly sad case was discovered on Friday, where every one in the house was ill in bed, and there was neither money nor food in the house. The family had been two days without food. An appeal has been sent out for assistance, which Wilkesbarre and Scranton responded to liberally and promptly. Money is now coming in from other quarters. It is sorely needed, for starvation is helping the disease in many families. The physicians are beginning to doubt whether the sickness is really typhoid, as that disease is not contagious, while the number of new cases occurring indicate that this scourge is contagious.

A General Indian War Appears to be Impending in Canada. Riel's successes have encouraged the Indians to rise, and large numbers of them have donned war-paint. Colonel Otter, on May 2d, marched across Poundmaker's reserve, with the object of recovering the captives taken at Fort Pitt. Colonel Otter's troops were attacked by Big Bear and his tribe almost as soon as they entered the reserve. The engagement which followed, at first reported as a victory for Colonel Otter, appears, from later reports, to be nearly a defeat. The Canadians retreated fighting their way through their foes, who hemmed them in, and after a desperate struggle reached Battleford, the Indians remaining in possession of the field. General Middleton at last accounts was moving against the insurgents at Batoche.

The Cable Reports from England Express doubt whether the proposed arbitration will take place. No definite announcement as to the state of the negotiations with Russia was made by Mr. Gladstone or his colleagues last week, but the events known to have occurred indicate that England has yielded on all points, and that there is nothing left to arbitrate about.

This, of course, is merely a surmise which future events may disprove. One of the most significant circumstances reported is that General Sir Peter Lumsden has been recalled. He is the officer who has been for several months on the boundary of Afghanistan and Asiatic Russia awaiting the arrival of the Russian commissaire to define the boundary line. It was he that sent the report of the battle on the Kushk, and denounced the act of the Russians as one of wanton aggression. It is openly stated that he has been recalled at the demand of Russia. A mixed feeling is produced in England by the prospect of peace. To a large number of people it is a relief, but with others the prevailing feeling is one of humiliation. There is general regret that the Cabinet should have assumed the determined attitude it did on the matter if it was not prepared to fight. Dignity might have been preserved by refraining from opposing Russia's advance; but to threaten and not to fulfil the threats is regarded as a cowardly policy. Nevertheless, the Liberal party has confidence in Mr. Gladstone, and believes that the national honor is safe in his hands. If it should be found that he has yielded to Russia to a humiliating degree, the popular verdict will probably drive him from office.

The Responsibility for the Murder of General Gordon and the Khartoum garrison is charged upon Sir Charles Wilson by a newspaper correspondent who accompanied the futile Sudan expedition. Among other statements he makes is one that General Gordon might have been saved but for the dilatoriness of the officer in command of the contingent which crossed the desert to the Nile. He states that after General Stewart was incapacitated by the wound of which he subsequently died, the command devolved on Sir Charles Wilson, who had a conference with the captain of the steamers Gordon had sent forward from Khartoum to meet the British contingent. The captain informed Wilson that there was no time to be lost, as Gordon was in imminent danger. The conference was held on Wednesday, January 21st. Everything was ready to start at three that afternoon; the steamers had their steam up, and nothing remained to be done but to embark. The correspondent states that Wilson "dawdled," and on frivolous pretexts delayed starting, and it was not until noon on the following Saturday that he could be got on board. Then it was too late. Gordon was killed on Monday the 26th, and Wilson arrived at Khartoum on Wednesday the 28th. If he had started on the Wednesday he would have arrived on the Saturday, and Gordon might have been saved. It may be hoped that Wilson will be required to give an explanation of the delay which apparently cost a noble and heroic life.

Flattering Testimonies of Regard for Mr. Lowell are pouring in upon him from the English cities, now that his departure approaches. On May 6th, the corporation of Worcester presented him with an illuminated address bound in blue morocco, expressing regret at his departure from the post of United States Minister to England, and eulogizing his literary aid to the Worcester Library. Mr. Lowell, in replying to the presentation speech, spoke in high terms of his successor, and said he was confident Mr. Phelps would do all in his power to maintain the cordial relations existing between England and the United States. On May 7th Mr. Lowell spoke in Westminster Abbey. He unveiled a bust of the poet Coleridge, placed there by the beneficence of the late Dr. Mercer, of Rhode Island. The Dean of the Abbey, Dr. Bradley, in introducing Mr. Lowell, paid a high tribute to him, and said that he was eminently worthy to perform the duty of unveiling the statue. The ceremony, he said, would add another link to the many that already bound together England and America. Mr. Lowell, in the course of his address, said: "All the waters of the Atlantic cannot wash out of the consciousness of either nation that we hold our intellectual property in common."

Subscriptions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers and others with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD were received last week to the amount of $23, in the following sums: From Parnassus, Pa., $5; Philadelphia, Pa., $5; Cincinnati, O., $1; Danbury, Conn., $5; Berlin, Wis., $1; Cincinnati, O., $1; Philadelphia, Pa., $5. One of these subscriptions is to pay the cost of the paper for three years to one person whose urgent desire for the paper we mentioned a few weeks ago. The whole amount of $23 thus enables us to restore twenty-one names to the list. Only a few names—about twenty in all—are now dropped. If the owners of them will be patient, it is possible that the kind friends who are contributing to this fund will enable us to send to them too. We assure them that the names are being taken in their regular order. We are pleased to hear how useful the paper has been in the past, and pray that God will continue to bless it in the future. The new applications from the Southern States have been duly noted, and will be attended to as far as it is in our power.

The Missionary Harvest of Consecrated Corn is among the incidents reported from Connecticut; it shows how much good may be done at small cost. In 1883 the Sunday-schools of Farmington and New Hartford, Conn., planted six ears of corn for missionary purposes, the harvest of which realized $120. From this seed-corn six new and flourishing Sunday-schools have grown, and five others have been aided. One has already become a church, and in a revival in another forty persons have joined the church.

A Blessing in Disguise Appears to be the proper name for the present "hard times" among the miners of Pennsylvania. The Miner's Journal testifies as a result of its observations, that since the distress set in "there has been a steady falling off in the consumption of every popular variety of intoxicating beverage, which has at last reached a stage that is arousing the anxious concern of the manufacturers." It may be hoped that the principles of total abstinence adopted now out of necessity may be adhered to by choice when prosperity returns. It is a good sign which does not often accompany a cessation from work. Too often when men are idle they drink more than when they are busy. The Pennsylvania miners are to be congratulated on their good sense.

Perservering Prayer for Many Years has been answered in the case of a Christian father. Rising last week in the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting, he reminded those present how often for many years he had periodically presented the case of his son for the supplications of the people of God. The son has been the slave of the dreadful appetite for strong drink. His seemed to be an incorrigible case, and his misdeeds when under the influence of drink were such as to cause his father and mother the deepest sorrow. After some more than usually aggravating escapade on the part of the son, following closely upon promises and vows to do better, the father would come with the terrible story to the noon-meeting. Deepest sympathy was ever aroused by a recital of the case, prayers full of importunity were offered in the son's behalf, but seemingly without avail. But now the father came with the good news of his son's surrender to the Lord Jesus Christ. He believed the boy, as he called him, had been truly saved. The happy father could not restrain his tears as he spoke of the boy once lost, but now found; once dead, but now alive.

A Camp Meeting on the Allegheny Mountains is to be held, according to present arrangements, at Mountain Lake Park, Garrett County, Maryland, on July 11th. This is a favorite resort for sufferers from hay-fever and others who need pure mountain air. Here Miss Jennie Smith has her home for Christian workers, and it is in this vicinity where her labors have been so signally owned of the Lord in the conversion of railroad employes. By way of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, Mountain Lake Park is about twenty hours' ride from Philadelphia and about eight hours' ride from Washington. The camp-meeting will be in charge of Dr. Dugan Clark and D. B. Updegraff, well-known Quaker preachers. They will be assisted by ministers and evangelists of other Christian denominations. Christians, and especially Christian workers, will unite in this meeting and wait together for such an endowment of power as will more thoroughly prepare them for winning souls for Christ. It is hoped that this will be a latter-day pentecost, and that while believers are receiving baptisms of power many souls will be saved. Further information can be had by addressing Rev. John Thompson, 2002 Brandywine Street, Philadelphia.

Too Lonely to Live was the Reason a Child gave in New York last week for poisoning herself. A physician was summoned hastily to visit a girl of about sixteen years of age who was dying. She told him that she had swallowed Paris green, and knew she could not recover. When asked why she had done so wicked a thing, she said her mother was dead and her father was away from home all day at his work and she was so lonely that she would rather be dead. The physician was unable to save her, and she died with a smile on her face. It is impossible to refrain from pitying the poor demented child, in spite of her wickedness. Pity it is that no Christian knew of her misery, and told her of One who loved her and had promised to be with her always, even to the end of the world. But she was a foreigner, and we never show any attention or friendliness to foreigners, unless they are princes or people of distinction, and then we toady them until we make ourselves ridiculous. How many miserable lives might be lightened and made joyous if Christian people would only tell out what they know of Christ's love for men! (Matt. 28:20.)

Electricity is being Employed to Tame Wild beasts. A series of experiments have had surprising results, as described by the Boston Youth's Companion. The idea has been adapted by a tamer himself, and his instrument is an apparatus shaped like a stick and highly charged with electricity. When the animals become unruly, he gives them shocks from this battery, and the effects are instantaneous. Three of his lions immediately showed signs of the greatest terror. They were seized with trembling, and growled fitfully. The tiger was more quickly subdued, became stupefied, and crouched in a corner of the cage. Bruin was more refractory to electricity, which seemed scarcely to affect him. He would growl and show his teeth, but was subdued after repeated discharges. The most astonishing effects, however, were perceptible in the boa constrictor, which it paralyzed and rendered helpless for six hours. Finally, the elephant, on being electrified by a touch of the stick upon the tip of his trunk, set up a series of wild cries, and became frantic. Thus the brutes, like brutal men, are being made acquainted with "the resources of civilization." It is necessary, in the interests of society, that savagery should be repressed by severe measures when kindness fails to subdue it. This is God's method, too, of dealing with men (Ps. 32:8-10).

Faith in the Madstone as a Cure for Hydro-phobia and snake-bites is more general than most people think. An evidence of it is given in a North Carolina journal, which states that fifty dollars was recently offered to the possessor of a madstone in Raleigh for it, and he refused to sell. Several of these stones are in existence. They are about the size of a hen's egg, and slightly flattened. They are of a buff color, very smooth, and present the appearance of having been sandpapered. The stones are porous, and possess strong absorbent qualities. In bites of snakes or dogs or other wounds of a poisonous nature the stone is applied to the wound, to which it immediately adheres, and as the virus is drawn from the flesh the stone turns black. It is then washed in tepid water or sweet milk, and is applied again. As long as the stone sticks to the wound there is poison in the blood and flesh. The poison must be withdrawn before there can be healing or safety. Men realize this in physical cases, but in spiritual things they appear to think that health may come by less radical measures. They try to stop swearing, drinking, and other vicious habits, and to reform themselves without eradicating the poison of sin in the heart. Such efforts are invariably failures. It is only when through Christ the poison is taken away that the life becomes right in God's sight (1 John 3:5).

How a Clergyman Unwittingly Invited a congregation to dinner is told by a Chicago journal. It states that a clergyman was preaching for a friend who was the regular pastor of the church. When the time came in the service for announcing the meetings, services, etc., that were to be held during the week, he took the paper his friend had prepared for him and read it throughout. The congregation were surprised by hearing him read as the last item on the programme: "I insist on your dining at my house, no matter who asks you." Both the preacher and the congregation were amused at the mistake, but it may be supposed that no inconvenience resulted from it, as the congregation would understand how it occurred. The clergyman should have read the notices over before reading them to the congregation; then he would have seen that the last item was a special invitation to himself, not a general one to the congregation. Happily, there would be no need for such discrimination when he came to the more important reading from the Bible. The invitations there are to whosoever will (Rev. 22:17).

An Interesting Natural Curiosity may be seen on a farm near Kingston, N. Y. The Utica Herald says that on the Gardener Smith farm there is a chestnut-tree, the trunk of which is eight feet in diameter. Four feet from the ground a white elm-tree a foot in diameter projects from the trunk. It is supposed that there was once a cavity or depression in the side of the chestnut-tree, which became filled with decayed vegetable matter, into which a seed from an elm had lodged, and from which sprang the present elm. The latter has spreading branches, which mingle their foliage with that of the chestnut every year. Both trees are sound. The chestnut was an important landmark in the ancient Indian trail, and is mentioned in many old legal documents of Ulster County. The tree is about six hundred years old. It is a significant fact that the elm derives its life through the chestnut, yet does not partake of its nature; its trunk and branches and leaves are still those of the elm. It is not so in the metaphor Christ used (John 15:5); no man whose life is not Christ-like is rooted in Him (Matt. 12:33).

A Convicted Prisoner Seldom Presumes to give advice to the judge who is trying him; but an instance of it is reported in a Texas journal. The case was one of chicken-stealing, in which the thief had shown much boldness. He and the judge were old acquaintances, as this was not the first time the prisoner had been tried in the same court for such offences. Addressing the prisoner, the judge said: "I do not comprehend how it was possible for you to steal those chickens when they were roosting right under the owner's window, and there were two vicious dogs in the yard." But the prisoner would not enlighten him. He said: "Hit wouldn't do yer a bit of good, Jedge, for me to 'splain how I cotched dem chickens, for yer couldn't do hit yerself if yer tried hit forty times, and yer might get yer hide full ob buckshot de berry first time yer put yer leg ober de fence. De bes' way for yer to do, Jedge, is fur yer to buy yer chickens in de market, and when yer wants ter commit any rascality do hit on de bench, whar yer am at home." Unhappily, as the prisoner intimated, a man who is disposed to sin need not go out of his calling to do it; every man is surrounded by temptations. Christ knew this, but He showed how men might be in the world and yet be delivered from the evil of it (John 17:15).

FIRST HEALING AND THEN SERVICE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And when Jesus was come into Peter's house, he saw his wife's mother laid, and sick of a fever. And he touched her hand, and the fever left her: and she arose, and ministered unto them."—MATTHEW 8: 14, 15.

OUR Lord Jesus Christ had been having a heavy day. He had been to the synagogue, and He had preached and had wrought miracles; He had moved in the midst of a great throng, and now the Sabbath was drawing to a close. He needed refreshment, and it was most convenient that Peter had a house into which the Lord could go. I do not suppose it was a stately mansion; probably it was little better than a hut, for Peter was only a fisherman; but the Lord Jesus made it honorable enough by entering it. Where the king is there the palace is.

Though our Lord went to Peter's house to rest, He did not find it free from trouble. It was a hospital before He made it a palace. Peter's wife's mother was on her bed prostrate with "a great fever." Typhus of the worst kind was burning out her life. However good a man may be, he will not escape trial in the flesh. You may have a house full of

at the same time. We find it true while we are here, that "the body is dead because of sin, but the spirit is life because of righteousness." The regenerated spirit has risen into life, but the body lingers under the power of death and its attendant pain and weakness. Certain persons attribute all sickness to the devil, and impute special sin to those who are grievously afflicted. This teaching is

AS FALSE AS IT IS CRUEL.

"Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth." I can bear witness that some of the saintliest persons I have ever known have been bed-ridden for years together; and others in whom the very image of Christ was conspicuous, from whose lips all the country round gathered up the choicest sentences of holy experience, have been invalids for twenty or thirty years at a stretch. Our sicknesses are of the Lord's appointing, however painful they may be, and we may without doubt say, as David did, "The Lord hath chastened me sore." "Lord, he whom thou lovest is sick" is still a truth. Even Peter's house, though it be the abode of a chosen saint and a leading apostle, whose very shadow would one day heal the sick, had a terrible fever in it which threatened death.

What glory Jesus casts upon common things! With what grandeur He invests a room in a poor man's house! A fisherman's hut becomes the headquarters of the captain of our salvation. He heals a woman within its doors, and before long "all the city was gathered together at the door." Oh that we may see the like—our own dear ones saved, and then the whole city roused to seek divine healing! We will arrange our discourse under the headings of four observations.

I. First, let us observe that it may be we have in our house of the Lord Jesus. One in Peter's house could not as yet minister to Christ, for she needed that Christ should minister to her. She was sick of a great fever, and quite prostrated by it, so as to be altogether unable to rise. Let us think whether we have not some about us who are spiritually sick, in a way which may be likened to a great fever.

SOME WHO NEED THE MINISTRY

What would the fever represent? Those who are in a fever represent spiritually those who are on fire with sin. Have we not seen some whom we dearly loved afflicted with this fierce distemper? Touch upon certain points, and we discover that they are diseased in reference to them; they are in they cannot be made to think coolly or judge calmly, but they grow excited and angry. Their touch is that of a fevered hand; their whole nature is burning with the fire of sin. Such persons are not always alike inflamed; they are frequently gentle and tractable—so much so that we are filled with hope concerning them. Often fever is intermittent; the patient is hot at one time, and cold at another; and in many sinners the fever of sin is intermittent in its symptoms. They are not always drinking; sometimes they are sober for a long period, and express themselves as deeply penitent for former falls. What pleasant company, what fine, genial spirits they are at such times! The fever returns, and nothing can restrain them, they drink even to delirium. Alas, the misery which is thus caused! Others are gentle and loving for a season, and then they suddenly give way to anger, and there is no knowing what they will say or do. When once the fever is on them they become as inflamed as ever. We know persons from whom the heat of the fever is so long gone that we think surely they are healed; but, alas! their cool times are only a pause between the attacks, and the evil returns with increased energy.

These fevered people are frequently

VERY RESTLESS.

It is one effect of the fever that the man cannot lie long together either on this side or on the other, but turns to and fro. Even his sleep is broken; neither by day nor by night can he find rest. He is dried up, and feels as weak as if he were brought into the dust of death and utterly dissolved.

We know young men with happy homes who cannot be content; they seem resolved to break their mothers' hearts, and their fathers know not what to do with them. Nothing pleases them, they are always unsettled. They have been put to half-a-dozen businesses already, and have left each one of them; they are now longing for a foreign country, or for enlistment in the army, or for anything other than their present calling. We have known them go to the colonies and come back again, finding nothing there; a sea voyage was to cure them, but, alas! a sinner on land is a sinner at sea. The malady is inward, and needs change of self rather than change of place. Such persons often become irritable toward their friends when checked in their wrongdoing, and even become at last, like Pashur in the book of Jeremiah, a terror to themselves and to their friends.

One symptom of a fever is that a man for that which would be good for him. Some of our unconverted friends have no taste for the Gospel; we cannot easily induce them to come to hear it. If you could get them under the sound of the Word, you would sit and pray and even agonize for them, all the while the truth was being preached; but, alas! they will not come near; they have no taste, no liking, no care for heavenly things; the thing they most require is that for which they have the least desire. Yet, fear not; Jesus can give them appetite, and everything else which is necessary to a perfect cure.

On the other hand, a fevered patient often feels a great thirst, which he cannot by any means allay. He longs to drink and drink again, and with all his drinking the heat is not abated. Sometimes the sick man has an appetite for what he must not taste; he craves after the most injurious and even unnatural things; foods which would be most pernicious he prefers. So is it with unconverted ones when under the full power of sin; they are eager enough to hear a godless lecture, or to listen to opinions which are the opposite of truth; they would go through any hardship to indulge their passions, and sacrifice any amount to be allowed their desires. As the horse-leech crieth, "Give, give," so is sin insatiable.

But the worst point in the case of the sinner is this, that this fever of his

WILL PROVE FATAL.

This son, daughter, husband, or wife of yours will perish through the fever of sin, if it be not cured. A great fever is a great danger, and so is sin. I have thus described the disease; what shall we do with it? Let us see what the disciples did.

Mark says, "Anon they tell Him of her." I would earnestly persuade you to do the same. Tell the case to Jesus just as you would mention a physical case to a doctor. He is ready to hear it all, and to consider it. Make a confidant of Jesus. Do not go and complain all over the neighborhood, "My boy does this," or "My husband does that," for you may increase the evil in that way by incensing the person against yourself and your religion. You may tell Jesus all about it, without restraint. No harm can come of such a relation. It will be a relief to your own mind, and it will be the most proper way of engaging your Lord to help you.

Bring unto Jesus all your sinful ones; lay them at His feet; leave them in His presence. When you have done all this—when you have told Him of her, and besought Him about her, and brought Him to the house to look upon her—then you may expect His healing touch and saving word.

II. Secondly: The ministry of Jesus must precede the ministry of the saved ones. We anxiously desire that these friends of ours who are now sick of the fever of sin should yet become the servants of Christ, and should minister to Him. I can imagine the joy of that anxious mother over yonder if she should ever be privileged to hear her boy preach the Gospel—that boy who has even been known to swear. This is but do not indulge it unwisely. Do not ask them to do anything for Jesus while they are unregenerate. Healing must come before serving. When a person is "laid, and sick of a fever," do not ask her to rise and wait upon the Lord Jesus Christ. No; His ministry to Peter's wife's mother preceded her ministry to Him. She was "laid," that is, prostrated by the terrible malady. Thus it is with the sinner. What can he do for Christ? Out of a foul spring no clean waters can come, and out of a corrupt heart no acceptable works can proceed. Christ must give us strength, and cause us both to will and to do of His own good pleasure, for without Him we can do nothing.

Moreover, this sick woman was utterly for Jesus and His disciples with a great fever upon her. Everywhere she went she would spread the contagion of her malady. Everything she touched would be infected; any food she prepared would be nauseous even to think upon. Let her keep her bed, by all means, and let none go near her unless they are compelled to do so; for fever soon seizes upon fresh victims. So you that are ungodly cannot serve Christ, for everything you do is defiled; you cannot lay your hand even upon holy things without polluting them.

What is more, a person sick of a fever, if in her feverishness she were to arise and wait upon guests would get no good, but run terrible risks. Persons in fever must not be exposed to draughts, or be driven to exert themselves. Every doctor would judge it to be most injurious to a person in a high state of fever to attempt to work. I solemnly believe that unconverted people get hurt when they attempt religious duties. To preach with an unrenewed heart must be to pronounce one's own death-warrant. If unrenewed men come to the sacramental table they eat and drink condemnation to themselves; and if they in any way make a profession of faith they are enacting a falsehood in the sight of high heaven, seeing they have no such faith.

Listen to me, any fevered ones who are here, while I briefly describe how the Lord Jesus Christ ministered to this woman.

He ministered to her by His presence. His being in the room with her meant that salvation was come to her house. Beloved, believe that Jesus Christ is here. The next thing that blessed this woman was His look. "Jesus saw her." Not only is Jesus near at hand, but He is present with His eyes open, observing all that ails you, seeing it with a mind which is deeply sympathetic, and a heart quick to relieve.

The next thing the Lord Jesus Christ used was His touch. This is

THE HEALING POINT.

He "took her by the hand, and lifted her up." There was a contact established. If thou believest in the Lord Jesus, He is in contact with thee; His cool hand is grasping thy fevered hand; and as thy fever dissolves into Him—for "He himself bare our sicknesses"—His health flows into thee, so that there was, beside the contact, another form of power: our Lord spoke to the fever. His word is a word of might. Oh that thou, poor sin-sick sinner, may hear the Word of the Lord with thine inner ears, for such hearing is eternal life! God help thee so to hear. There is healing for thee, and I warn thee again that thou must have this healing before thou canst work for Jesus.

III. Thirdly, it is plainly taught in the text that comes with healing. "Immediately she arose and ministered to them." Fever causes extreme weakness, and when it leaves the patient, he is for a considerable time greatly debilitated. The cures of nature are slow; but when Jesus cures. He does it at once. Though He uses only a touch and a word, yet He cures so perfectly that no weakness remains. The woman did not lie in bed a week or two, and feed upon nourishing diet, and so recover her strength; but there and then she arose from her bed, girt her garments about her, and went about the duties of the household. The moment the Lord Jesus Christ saves a soul He gives that soul strength for its appointed service.

I want to call your attention to this: that her service was immediate service, rendered on the spot, without delay. Some of you have been converted during our late special services; let me bid you serve the Lord at once, even as the Lord has served you. "What get to work directly?" Yes, immediately; for there is something very beautiful about that which is done by new converts. The firstfruits are in some respects the best fruits. I would not have a converted person wait a week before trying to do something for Jesus. Run as soon as you find your feet.

But notice that what this good woman did was very appropriate. Peter's wife's mother did not get out of bed and go down the street and deliver an address to an assembled multitude. Women are best when they are quiet. I share the Apostle Paul's feelings when he bade women be silent in the assembly. Yet there is we read of Peter's wife's mother that she arose and ministered to Christ. She did what she could and what she should—she arose and ministered to Him. Some people can do anything that they are allowed to do, but waste their energies in lamenting that they are not called on to do other people's work. Blessed are they who do what they should do. It is better to be a good housewife, or nurse, or domestic servant, than to be a powerless preacher or a graceless talker.

When healed of her fever, Peter's wife's mother had strength to perform a suitable ministry, such as the peculiar occasion required. She did for Jesus and the three companions that which was needful there and then. Jesus had had a hard day's preaching, and that is hungry work; He had spent a heavy day in healing, and that is exhausting work; and now He wanted somewhat to eat, and therefore He came into Peter's house. "She arose and ministered to them." Now, dear friends, you that are converted may minister to Christ in a way which is as necessary as the service of His eldest preachers and pastors. There is something for you to do which will be a refreshment to Him and to His servants. He condescendingly permits it, and will graciously accept it. You can personally minister to a personal Christ. You cannot do everything, but you can do something that will be acceptable to Him. You may, you can, and you ought.

IV. The desire to minister always ARISES OUT OF HEALING.

Here was a woman, a poor woman, an old woman, a widow woman, one who had just been sick, and she desires at once to minister to Christ, and she can do it, and she does do it. How think you—was she moved to this? Was not it that strength naturally suggests activity as soon as ever you get it? When you are very prostrate as you must lie still—do anything. You feel as if you must lie still—there is no power in you, and there is no industry in you; but persons who have recovered want something to do. Sometimes they try to do more than they can. Now, if the Lord has given you spiritual strength, that life will want to work; if He has given you light, that light will shine.

And then the gratitude for this strength impels you to activity. How can a man be still when Christ has spoken for him and delivered him? We read in the paper some time ago that to his great honor, appeared in a court of law on behalf of a man brought up under charge of causing a death. The King had seen the accident, and he came forward as a common witness in the court to say that the horse had mastered the driver, and the man was not to be blamed. I do not know the name of the man, but I feel pretty sure that Jacobi or Antonio, whoever he may be, if ever King Humbert wants somebody to speak up for him will find a friend in him: he will say, "My king came into court and spoke for me, and I will as long as ever I live speak up for him." Now, the Lord Jesus Christ is an advocate for you, therefore be an advocate for him.

Once more, I think I may say that those who are healed by Christ are sure to do something for Him of the right sort, because their former habits will assist them. I do not mean by this that sinful activity can ever help us into holy activity, but I do mean this: that we can turn our old habits to account for Jesus. I believe that Peter's wife's mother was a particularly nice old lady. There is rather a prejudice against a wife's mother, and if Peter found it the proper thing to have her living in the house, I am sure she was a specially good woman. I have a picture of her in my mind's eye—a dear old soul, always busy and happy. When she had the fever she did not like to be laid aside; and so the moment she is restored, there she is at it.

THE RULING PASSION

is strong now that death has been removed. She begins to serve Jesus, for she had always been serving somebody. You people who, when you were not converted, were always active, ought to be doubly active now.

As for you, young men who have been so restless, so vigorous, so dashing in sin, it seems to me that this habitual energy ought to be placed under consecration to Christ. A horse that has no mettle in it is easily managed; still, a horse with a little mettle, though he may kick and plunge and do a great deal of mischief, is all the better horse when he is broken in. If he be under proper management, if he answers to the bit, you like the mettle. So it is with a man when he is converted. If he had mettle in him that led him to kick and plunge when he served the devil, if he did so much mischief and damage against the kingdom of Christ, he is the very man to pull well in Jesus Christ's chariot. I pray the Master, therefore, that He will come and heal that young man of his feverishness and make his blood cool within him this day, and restore him by His grace. Oh that the Lord would touch all sick folk and make them healthy! Then when all are healed let us rise to serve Him who has served us, and unto Him be glory for ever and ever. Amen and amen.

NEW BOOKS.

A DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE.

THIS is an abridgment of the well-known work of Dr. William Smith. It has been revised and edited by the Rev. F. N. and M. A. Peloubet, with the special view of aiding Sunday-school teachers whose means are not equal to the purchase of the larger work, which is an expensive book of four volumes. The experience the editors have had of Sunday-school work, and the sagacity they have displayed in their "Select Notes on the International Lessons," render them especially qualified for the task they have undertaken here. While omitting the more abstruse questions which clergymen and theological students need to examine, but which Sunday-school teachers have seldom the time or the occasion to study, they have carefully retained all the information which is of practical utility in Sunday-school work. A few additions have also been made, which the issue of the Revised Version suggested, and also the latest results of Palestinian research. The larger work of Dr. Smith is to be found in all good reference libraries, and is, therefore, well known to the public. We need say nothing about that, as its merits are generally appreciated. Of this condensation it is sufficient to say that it is a marvel of editorial skill, which must surprise every one who knows the original work and examines this. So little has been omitted that is generally needed, and so much is retained in briefer form, that, except for special purposes and advanced students, the condensation seems the more useful work of the two. It contains eight colored maps and four hundred and forty illustrations. Pp. 818. Published by Messrs. Porter & Coates, Philadelphia.

RUSSIA UNDER THE TSARS.

by Stepnjak. A more terrible exposure of the horrors of despotism has never seen the light than this vivid narrative of the Russian exile, who under the assumed name of Stepnjak, is now well known to the English-speaking nations. The Russian Government never committed a more stupid blunder than when it drove this brilliant writer out of the country. His pen has been very busy in his enforced exile, and it has in his Underground Russia, in numerous short articles in the reviews and the daily journals, and now in his "Russia Under the Tsars," given pictures of Russian life which excite liberty-loving peoples to indignation and loathing. It is not difficult to understand, as we read his pages, why Nihilism has taken root among the people, and why men of intelligence and patriotism have cheerfully resigned wealth and station, and have gone down among the masses to earn their own livelihood and use their opportunities to enlighten and organize the sections. A prison and an ignominious death generally, almost invariably await such men, but they accept that fate willingly, if, before it falls upon them, they can do something toward the work of delivering the land they love from the autocracy that is crushing out its life.

This book will come upon many people as a revelation. It is easy to see from comments in the public press and remarks made in ordinary conversation that the American public knows next to nothing of Russian life. To such people the fact that in Russia the spies of the government enter into the privacy of the home, that a man may be seized on the secret accusation of an enemy and flung into a loathsome prison without redress, that a citizen may be arrested and acquitted upon trial, and the very same day may be secretly seized and carried off to Siberia, while his family and friends are left in suspense, not knowing if he is dead or alive—all this is unknown. The writers who are endeavoring to arouse American sympathy for the Russian Government should read this book. If they are worthy the name of American citizens they will blush to think they have unwittingly engaged in so unnatural an undertaking. It is no fiction. The writer speaks throughout with evident moderation. He gives names of men, of places and dates, and he states where confirmation of his narrative may be found. He tells of women beaten, kicked by guards wearing heavy military boots, women stripped of their clothes before a company of soldiers by the searcher for compromising documents, their mouths forced open so roughly that their teeth are broken, to see if any scrap of paper is hidden there; of prisoners confined in cells which the Neva floods at every tide, and which the rats haunt through holes purposely left that they may enter to worry the prisoners. A woman who was confined in one of those cells was forced to keep awake night and day lest the rats should eat her newborn babe, and she innocent and untried. It is this government, this hateful despotism, that free American citizens are asked to admire—a government false, cruel, unmanly, and brutal. We hope that this work will be widely read, that the public may learn the eminent ignorance of the men who, through their editorials, are trying to trick our citizens into a course which will disgrace them. A SUNDAY SERVICE IN THE DESERT.

AMONG the sketches drawn by the artists who accompanied the expedition for the rescue of General Gordon is one of which the illustration here given is a copy. It was in strange contrast to the Sunday service in barracks at home. Around, the dry, arid waste of sand; above the scorching tropical sun, and close at hand the herd of camels, instead of the well-groomed horses of the regiment. It was noticed, however, that the men seemed to pay closer attention and to be in more sober, solemn mood than at service at home. That fact is easy to understand. It was serious business in which they were engaged. No man could tell what might occur on the morrow. It might be that those very men to whom the chaplain was speaking of the life beyond the grave would in a few hours be lying on the sand which their life-blood would dye in crimson hue. Some soldiers were reckless, apparently careless whether they lived or died, but with the majority death was evidently a serious matter.

It is gratifying to learn through the reports of the chaplains and through the letters sent home by the men themselves that there has been a marked change for the better in the character of the troops. Not a few of those who have fallen in that fruitless struggle have been men over whose lifeless bodies the familiar words "a sure and certain hope," spoken as they were buried in the sand, have been no meaningless formula. There has been good ground for the hope in the testimony they gave in life of their faith in Christ. Noble ladies, whose names will never be forgotten, have, during the past ten years, left the scenes of frivolous pleasure to devote their lives to the work of educating and saving the soldier. Soldiers' reading-rooms, soldiers' schools and chapels have been built and supported, and many souls have been saved. It is also known that General Wolsey's temperance principles have done much to improve the morals of the men. He has steadily discountenanced the drinking customs formerly in vogue, and has firmly refused to have the wagons laden with barrels of beer follow the regiments in their march as they used to do.

THE MODERN PASSOVER.

THE correspondent of a contemporary recently visited an orthodox Jewish family and witnessed the celebration of the Passover. From his description of the ceremonies we extract the following:

"At the head of the table sat the master of the house, round the table sat the family and guests, and all were dressed in their holiday garments, inasmuch as the occasion was a festive one. The furniture of the table was never used, except at the Paschal Feast, and was of the best quality, to remind all by contrast of the poverty and slavery in Egypt. In the centre of the table was a brazen dish, on which were first placed three Passover cakes (called 'Mitzvoh'), thin circular biscuits of unleavened bread about six inches in diameter, which were 'hidden' or covered in a white linen cloth. Upon this cloth were placed the following: a large glass jug filled with sparkling wine—this was taken from a bottle, on the cork of which was the seal of the chief rabbi, guaranteeing that it was unfermented wine—the shank bone of a shoulder of lamb and an egg, both of which had been religiously roasted, not boiled, the former representing the paschal lamb, and the latter a festive sacrifice which was offered while the Temple was still standing. The bitter herbs—a memorial of the bitterness of Egyptian bondage—consisted of lettuce finely cut into shreds, and a stick of horseradish.

The feast commenced by filling the glasses with wine, and then saying many words of blessing, commencing thus: 'Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God! King of the Universe, who createst the fruit of the vine.' This, I was afterward given to understand, was called the 'Sanctification of the Passover.' When this sanctification of praise was ended all the company drank. After that the father broke one of the three cakes in two pieces, and took one half from under the linen cloth and laid it aside for 'Afcomen.' He then elevated the dish containing the bone and egg, and all present took hold of the dish and said, 'This is the bread of affliction which our ancestors ate in the land of Egypt; let all that are hungry enter and eat; let all that are in want come hither and observe the Passover. This year we celebrate it here; but we hope next year to celebrate it in the land of Israel. This form of words is said to have been first used during the Babylonian captivity.

"A second time the glasses were filled with wine, and the little Jewish maiden began to ask questions respecting the Passover, which brought vividly to my mind the words of Moses, 'It shall come to pass when your children shall say unto you, What mean ye by this service? That ye shall say, It is the sacrifice of the Lord's Passover,' etc. (Ex. 12: 26, 27). It was very clear to me that the ceremony was arranged so as to interest the children and to encourage in them the spirit of devout and earnest inquiry. The various forms of the service and the things on the table were really object-lessons by which the junior members were being taught religious truths of the greatest importance. 'Wherefore,' said the child, speaking fluently in Hebrew, 'is this night distinguished from all other nights?' The head of the family replied to the child's questions, and explained by 'chanting a condensed history of the descent of God's people into Egypt, their sojourn and suffering there, and their glorious deliverance by the hand of God. Now and again the company lifted and put down the wine, accompanying the action with words expressive of gratitude and faith in God.

"After the second cup of wine had been drunk the host washed his hands as proxy for the rest. Then he took the whole cakes and the broken cake, and after uttering a few sentences of blessing he gave to each person a piece of each cake, which were then eaten together. Then followed 'the eating of the bitter herbs,' which consisted of slices of horseradish and a small quantity of the 'haroseth.' The elders of the company seemed to enjoy the bitter herbs, but I noticed that a little boy present indicated by unmistakable signs that he considered this part of the repast as anything but agreeable.

"The cups being filled with wine again, the 'Hallel' was chanted, which included Ps. 115 to 118. This was probably the song in which our Lord and His apostles joined in the supper chamber on the night of the betrayal, of which Matthew says, 26: 30. 'And when they had sung a hymn they went out into the Mount of Olives.' Other psalms and prayers succeeded the 'Hallel,' and in the closing prayer invoking the divine acceptance of the service, I was specially struck by what might be called the piteous pleadings for the rebuilding of the Temple and the restoration of Israel to the Land of Promise."

FOUND ON THE EDGE OF A PRECIPICE.

A EUROPEAN writer thus describes an incident which came to his knowledge during a tour in the Swiss Alpine region: "Early one morning I rose and stood outside the hospitable quarters in which I had spent the night. Brightly rose the sun over the snow-clad Alps, giving a roseate hue to the dazzling snow, and tinging the sleeping glacier with his radiant beams.

An Alpine Traveller's Narrow Escape.

"While admiring the beautiful prospect, I was suddenly aroused by the sound of many voices; and on hastening to the place from whence their cries proceeded, I saw a number of people looking anxiously at some men who were returning from an expedition to the higher crags. They appeared to be either English or Americans, for I heard the questions eagerly asked in English, 'Is he found?' 'Is the young man safe?' The answer could not yet be heard. Again, louder than before, rose the cry, 'Is the young man safe?' All waited in silent suspense for the reply; at last it came, 'Yes, we have found him; he is safe!' Then arose a loud shout of gladness and joy, which told of previous apprehension, and which reverberated along the mountains, and was repeated by many echoes.

"On inquiring what had happened, I was told that an English gentleman, who was travelling with a party of friends, had rashly ventured, the evening preceding, among the glaciers, without the knowledge of his companions and without a guide. When he was missed it was at first supposed that he had merely gone for a short walk and would soon return, but as it became dark the fears of the party were aroused, and a search-party started out in quest of him, with proper guides and many of the villagers. These were the men now returning. They said they had searched carefully all night for their friend without success, and were about to abandon hope, when, in the gray of morning, they found him near the edge of a precipice, benumbed, stupefied, and nearly dead. With the help of restoratives life was once more revived, and he was saved.

"After hearing this account, and rendering what assistance lay in my power, I pursued my way, musing on what I had seen and heard. I moralized on the heedlessness of the traveller; thought of his narrow escape from death; and prayed that his deliverance might lead him to fly to that Saviour who is able to save from spiritual death.

"How many times, thought I, have these mountains echoed words of anxious inquiry similar to those which so impress me! And should we not repeat the question as we travel along life's pathway? Might we not startle some listless wanderer in the broad road, by calling to him, and asking him if he is safe for eternity? Might we not say to the worldly man of business, Art thou safe? Hast thou made thy soul's salvation the great end of thy life? Thou art diligent in business, but hast thou attended to the great business of eternity? Might we not speak to that young maiden, who is now entering on the gay scenes of the world: Maiden, art thou safe here? Thou art surrounded with snares—hast thou taken Christ for thy Guide? To the young man leaving college to enter on the business and cares of life we might cry, Thy way is over the mountains, where there are precipices and slippery places; art thou trusting in God's guidance to keep thee from falling? The world, bright as it looks to the young who are just entering upon it, is a scene of moral and spiritual peril. The old man, as he looks back over his course and thinks of those who were his companions in early years, is saddened by the recollection of the number of them whom he has seen fall and perish by the way. They were the brightest and the best, but they are gone, and most of them perished through their own self-confidence."

THE JEW'S WARD.

THE TWO EXILES.

To Carola the utter stillness and monotony of her new dwelling was at first a relief. There were so many things to think of and ponder; and here there was no call upon her attention, except for her few household duties. The last two months had exhausted her strength, and she needed time and leisure to recruit it. Her love for Philip Arnold had scarcely made itself known to herself before the terrible shock of hearing of George Bassett had roughly shaken it—possibly had uprooted it altogether. The whole course of events had been bitter and antagonistic to her. She had been tossed to and fro upon a sea of troubles, and this lonely cottage was a safe and quiet haven to her.

The hatred of her old companions preyed upon her and haunted her as she strove to weary herself with hard work in the neglected garden. It was this unexpected and undeserved hate that was her crowning sorrow. She felt no bitterness now against the people at Hazelmount, making careful allowance for them and their pride in their forefathers. She thought of Philip Arnold with a patient grief, resigned to having lost him, and the home that had seemed so happy to her. But to think of herself as a creature abhorred and hated by her own people, those whom she had pitied with a great and yearning pity, was, indeed, to be crucified with her Lord. The sharpness of it must wear off a little before she could mingle again with her fellow-creatures.

There was no one to notice in those days that Carola left off singing. Matthias did not miss it, for she had not sung in the poverty-stricken old garret, with her bed-ridden grandmother living in it. It had been one of the delights of her new life. Often, when her heart ached sorely, she would sit down by the old man and chat with him; and at these times he felt that it was well with him to be here with Carola. If she could only talk to him of Christ, and read His wonderful life aloud to him, the consolation of it would have been greater than anything else to her.

But that name, which was literally dearer to her than any other name, could not pass her lips. To him Jesus of Nazareth was the God of the Christians, the persecutors of his people in all ages; robbers and murderers in the name of their God. He had known no Christians but the drinking, blasphemous and vicious crew who had driven him from his home, and whose jeers and mockings had followed him through thirty years of a just and honest and industrious life, spent in their midst. Carola knew that it was worse than useless to speak to him of Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews.

So the long weeks passed by, bringing no change to them. Now and then Carola had to go into the village to buy food; but she did not loiter there, for Matthias always piteously implored her to make haste home again. One dread had taken possession of his enfeebled brain, that Carola would some day go away and be lost to him forever. As long as she was absent he stood on the door-sill or at the garden wicket, his dim eyes fastened on the spot where she had vanished out of sight, and where he would catch the first glimpse of her when she came back.

His weary bent old shoulders and white head was the last thing she saw as she turned to wave her hand to him on going, and it was the first to greet her as she returned. It was in vain she carried a chair down to the gate; still, as if impatient to see a little further, he was always standing up and peering anxiously through his sunken eyes at the place which had hidden her from him. He was like a timid child forsaken of his play-fellows, and faint of heart lest every one had forgotten him.

Every Friday evening it was necessary for Carola to remind him that the Sabbath had begun; and his feeble memory failed him when he tried to repeat his Hebrew prayer. But Carola stood always at his side, and when the slow tears of old age came into his eyes, she was ready with her clear, quiet utterance of the Lord's Prayer. He learned the simple petitions easily, and as she said them his quavering tones joined in with hers.

Even during the week she would often hear him murmuring one or two of the short sentences. His solemn, gentle voice would cry, "Thy kingdom come!" Or when her whole heart was sick and her head bewildered, "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven!" came to her as a message direct from heaven. Matthias would himself brighten up, and smile as he caught the sound of his own voice, and then he would turn fondly toward Carola. "That's a good prayer, my dear," he would say, "but I shall recollect my own by-and-by, before the Sabbath comes again."

Often Carola thought of Hazelmound and the Arnolds, and sometimes, with a faint blush mantling her cheeks, which no one saw, she wondered if Philip had forgotten her. But she not have wondered; it was not in Philip's nature to forget.

The excitement produced by the trial and execution of George Bassett for the murder of one of the Lunleys of Market-Upton was partly dying away in the old village, though events were made the most of there, being few and far between. But the lambing season and the sowing of the spring corn were engrossing a good deal of thought and attention. A new mistress had been appointed to take Carola's place, and school had begun again. Nobody now mentioned Carola's name in the hearing of Mrs. Arnold or Philip, either from forgetfulness or from a feeling that it would give them pain.

A dark shadow had fallen upon the old homestead. There was always a consciousness in Mrs. Arnold and Philip that the other was thinking of Carola; it was no longer possible to them to resume their former happy and free intercourse of thought and feeling. Philip was even more reticent with his mother than with his father. He discovered to his own astonishment that he could not tear out of his heart his love for Carola. He admitted that it was his duty to his house to do so, repeating the time-honored formula that no stain must rest on the name of any person received into it. He reminded himself that for generations past every man and woman dwelling under the old roof-tree had been worthy of it. But then Carola's sweet face seemed to look at him wistfully, and he could hear her voice saying, "Am I then unworthy? I was where God had placed me. I did not choose my birthplace or my kindred." He knew her letter word for word. He thought of it as he rode about the fields, or stood in the market-place at Market-Upton; he dreamed of it at night. Never could he pass the field-gate where he had first seen her without seeing her again by the inward eye, as he had done then. The places were haunted by her, and the seasons. Words she had uttered—little, trivial words—seemed to spring up like seed which had been sown and forgotten months ago. No woman could ever be to him again what Carola had been.

Mrs. Arnold was not much less troubled. She had yielded grudgingly to Philip's love for Carola, but it had been sufficient to open her eyes to the charm there was in the girl. She understood now how the simplicity of her faith came to exist; she was in something of the same position as the early Christians, whose hearts had not grown dull with the frequent repetitions of the old, old story. It had been possible for Carola "to eat her meat with gladness and singleness of heart, praising God, and having favor with all the people." There had been none of the restrictions and limitations and accommodations of modern Christianity for her; she had contracted no habit of religious profession. Christ's teachings had come to her with the freshness and force they had in apostolic days, before there were divisions in the Church, or any grave questions as to their intrinsic meaning. She was in the childhood of the faith, and there was present in her none of that worldliness, which has become so subtly interwoven with modern Christianity that it seems impossible to separate them.

For in her heart of hearts Mrs. Arnold knew, even as Philip knew, that there was no valid objection to urge against his marriage with Carola, except a worldly one. It was only the dread of breaking one of the world's commandments that kept him from her side. They had seen her too long, and knew her too well, to think that any blame attached to her. The girl was pure, not from ignorance, but with the true virtue of one who knows evil and cleaves to good. Mrs. Arnold discovered that she could not pray about this trouble as she had done about others. The will of God was not fier desire, if it decreed that Carola should be her son's wife.

But Philip could not restrain his longing to know something more of Carola after a few weeks had passed by. His father had written a few lines to her immediately after receiving her letter, but they had come back to the Grange with "Insufficient address" written on the envelope. No other sign of Carola's existence had reached them, and this silence tended to fan Philip's desire to see her once more; perhaps to speak to her; to ask her if there was no help or friendship he could give her; possibly to tell her again how much he loved her, though there could be no hope of their marriage. He might even say to her that if he was himself a stronger man he would not give her up. God had joined them together; it was the world that was putting them asunder.

"Mother, I must run up to London," he said one day early in March.

"To find Carola?" she asked, with a look and tone of bitter disappointment.

"Yes," he answered. "I can bear it no longer. Who knows what trouble she may be in? But don't be afraid. I'm not going to ask her to be my wife, unless indeed we could go together to one of the colonies—"

She interrupted him with a cry of sharp and sudden pain, and clasped his arm between her hands as if she could forcibly restrain him.

"No, no," he said, "I did not think you would let me leave you and the old home. But, oh! mother, she is as good as gold, and I can hardly bear to lose her; and I ought to know what has become of her. Is she living among those wretches still? It will be like hell to her, though Carola will be happy in her religion. Well," he added, half-shyly, and in a lower tone, "she will be happy in Christ, wherever she may be, and whatever she may be doing."

"And you will only make sure she is happy?" said his mother. "You will do nothing rash?"

"I'll not make myself happy and you unhappy."

It was a bitterly cold evening, with a sharp east wind blowing, when Philip turned into the street where he expected to find Carola. There were fewer people than usual loitering about the pavements; but the spirit-vaults were full to overflowing, and through the constantly swinging door he caught glimpses of the haunts of Carola's childhood. Young girls with feverish faces and wild gestures, laughing and shouting amid the drinking crowd, looked as Carola might have looked. He shrank from the sight with a shudder of recoil and repugnance. Was it possible that a fair flower could spring from such a soil? Yet he could not give up his search for her. He paced the street slowly from end to end, but failed to find the Jewish cobbler's little shop. Then he stopped a haggard, broken-down woman, who was sinking along as if she was dogged by terror, and asked her if she knew a man Matthias Levi, or a girl called Carola Fielding.

"Is it Carola?" she said. "To be sure I know Carola; her as was George Bassett's sweetheart. Ay! she lived along with the old Jew shoemaker. Are you lookin' for her?"

"I want to find her home," he replied.

"That's it," she said. "There's where Carola and the old Jew used to live till the folks about here drove 'em away. And he were very good to my little ones, he were. He'd shoe 'em for nothing many and many a time. We've missed him sorely."

She pointed out the two windows with every pane broken and roughly barricaded with deal planks. The shop door was fastened with a padlock, and it was plain enough that nobody had been living there for some time.

"They stole away in the night," said the woman in a cautious undertone, and looking about her as she spoke. "Folks about here were mad against Carola for speakin' against her old sweetheart; and they'd have tore her to pieces almost, the day he were hanged. They smashed all the windows in; but hers was at the back, and they didn't hurt her, nor the old Jew, poor man! Only the next day but one a stranger came with a cart and took all their things away, and then we knew as they were clean gone, Matthias and all; and many a poor child 'll go bare-foot on the cold stones now, that he'd have put good shoes on. God bless him, I say, though he is only a Jew!"

"And does no one know where they are gone?" asked Philip.

"Nobody," she replied. "Bless you! they didn't want anybody to know. Why! they'd have murdered her if she'd ha' stopped here. I've known Carola a many years; she was always a spry child, but never did no harm; and she were like a angel to her old grandmother. I wish one o' my girls were like her. And she's quite a lady now; and spoke as humble and pleasant as one of us. She said to me, 'I'm comin' back to live at home again here, and I want to help all of you, and make you as happy as I am myself.' And she told me some beautiful words that Jesus Christ once said, 'Come to Me, folks that labor, and are heavy worked, and I will give you rest.' I often sing 'em to myself, and maybe Carola could ha' told me how to go to Him."

"That is like my Carol," thought Philip. In the midst of her own sorrow and anguish she had sought to carry comfort and light to those around her. He turned away from the house with all the hope of seeing her again fled. He had not quite resolved upon talking with her, even if he had found her. What good would it do? But she was gone away, no one knew whither.

He made inquiries at the police-station, but nothing was definitely known there of Matthias Levi and Carola Fielding. Every police-station in the kingdom could be communicated with if he desired it; but he did not see what could be gained by the investigation. He had not much to say to Carola. She was not destitute of money, and there was no fear of her failing to find employment wherever she went. Perhaps it was best for them both to lose sight of each other. At any rate it would be best for her; for some day, perhaps, she would meet with and love a better and a stronger man than he felt himself to be.

THE FAITHFUL SAYING.

S. S. Lesson for May 24, 1 Tim. 1:15-17; 2:1-6. Golden Text, 1:15. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Marrow of the Gospel—Power Given—And Understanding—Paul's Personal Testimony—The Law Fulfilled—Constraint for the Lawless, not for the Righteous—Credit Claimed by Sinners—The Freedom of Grace—How Paul Obtained Mercy—Prayer to be Offered For All Men.

PAUL has been speaking of "the Gospel of the glory of the blessed God, which was committed to my trust." (R. V.) The very marrow of this Gospel is, "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." If there should be one unsaved sinner reading these words, Brother or Sister, the purpose for which Jesus Christ came into the world was to save you. You may say, "I don't know whether I desire to be saved—I have no power over my own will." Christ Jesus came into the world that by His Holy Spirit He might "work in you both to will and to do of His good pleasure" (Phil. 2:13). You may say, "I cannot change my tastes, and turn from those things which naturally have charms for me, I cannot begin to pray and sing psalms when my heart is not in it." Christ Jesus came into the world to do for you what you could not do for yourself. He came to save you "from this present evil world" [or age] (Gal. 1:4). He does not expect you to change your nature, that is His province—"Behold, I make all things new" (Rev. 21:5). "But," you may say, "I cannot understand all these things which religious people speak of; I cannot make top or tail of what they mean." Christ Jesus came into the world to give us "an understanding, that we may know Him that is true" (1 John 5:20). "The things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God." "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2:11, 14). How, then, can a natural man be expected to understand the things of God? "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners," and part of His salvation is the precious gift of the Holy Ghost, who is now in the world to "convict the world in respect of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment" (John 16:8, R. V.). Claim the Holy Spirit to convict and teach you.

Paul, bearing personal testimony of this blessed Gospel, says, "And I thank Christ Jesus our Lord, who hath enabled me, for that He counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry; who was before a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious:

BUT I OBTAINED MERCY, because I did it ignorantly in unbelief." This was all; Paul did nothing to save himself, but "obtained mercy" through what Jesus had done. Satan drives souls almost to distraction with the thought of what they must do, and what they must be in order to be saved. He tells them how deeply they must feel their sins, how completely they must change their lives and break off from sin, which holds them as in a vice; and they struggle like a bird in a cage to get free, and cannot. Here is one who counts himself the chief of sinners, one who sees no other man's sin as reaching the heinousness of his own, but he tells us neither of his agonizing struggles nor overwhelming feelings. One thought absorbs him, "I obtained mercy." He never says, "I merited mercy," or "I won mercy." No, Paul only received at the hand of another. And dear unsaved one, that is all you have to do. Jesus is so in earnest for your salvation that He came down from heaven, He came into the world to save you, and all He wants of you is that you will let Him do it. All which seems so impossible to you is perfectly easy to Him. You say you don't know how to repent. Thank God He is exalted a "Prince and a Saviour to give repentance." You say you cannot believe; He is "the author and finisher of our faith." Yield yourself to Him as one hopeless and helpless in yourself, for Him to do all, to work in you repentance, or a change of mind and faith too; cast yourself upon Him and trust Him without reserve.

In the beginning of this epistle Paul speaks of the law, saying, "The end of the commandment is charity," or, R. V., "The end of the charge is love." When the law has come to an end because it has done its work, it brings us to love. "Love is the fulfilling of the law" (Rom. 13:10). "Christ (who is Love) is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth" (Rom. 10:4). "The law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith" (Gal. 3:24). When it has brought us to Him we have "another Master, even Christ," and we are in a position to understand the deep love of our God. And more than this, Christ dwelling in our hearts writes the law of God there, and fulfils it within us as He has fulfilled it for us, and thus our hearts become one with the law of God.

"The law is good," but its constraint is not for a righteous man. If we put ourselves under the law, and get into bondage by examining our own hearts and lashing ourselves up to obedience—if we condemn ourselves and doctor our own souls, we are not using the law of God lawfully. "The law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane," etc. So long as we are menacing ourselves, and attempting to come up to the requirements of the law, we come where God has placed the lawless and disobedient, murderers, unclean, perjurers, and liars. The law was made for those who were without God. The law says, "The man which doeth those things shall live by them" (Rom. 10:5). It is just marvellous how the most openly wicked of men will hide under the law, and cling to some little rag of righteousness, and credit themselves or think that others credit them with some right doing, which they imagine will counterbalance all the evil of their lives. Some terrible profil-gate will claim that he is a good kind of man because he treats his horses and dogs kindly, and all the misery he has brought on families in the ruin of their sons and daughters, both in soul and body, does not count, he thinks, because of this one redeeming quality. Another who is a terrible swindler goes to church once every Sunday, and imagines that all his frauds and thefts count for nothing because of this one good deed. Is it not to class themselves with such as these if God's children want to establish their own righteousness in any particular? The law always deals with what we are, and what we do, or ought to be and do. Grace deals with what Christ is and what He does, both for us and in us. The law can only bring us in guilty; grace sets us free and makes possible all the requirements of the law; but it is not we who fulfil its requirements, but Jesus Christ in us, and thus is it not we to whom credit is due, but He.

Paul disclaims any possible credit. He does not allow the idea for a moment that either the sincerity of his character or his after usefulness had induced the Lord to save him. "Howbeit

FOR THIS CAUSE

I obtained mercy, that in me as chief [of sinners] might Jesus Christ shew forth all His long-suffering, for an ensample of them which should hereafter believe on Him unto eternal life" (R. V.). Paul regarded himself as a beacon-light of God's unspeakable love to all generations. There was nothing remarkable in him as an unconverted man, except his insatiable hatred of Christ, even up to the very moment when the Lord met with him on the way to Damascus. What, then, did his complete conversion teach? Surely the perfection of the grace of God in Christ, how completely the work of conversion is all His own. Paul had only to let himself be overcome, to yield before the undeserved, unexpected love of God to the unworthy. He had to learn what he afterward taught, that God "will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth."

It is with this largeness of His heart and wideness of His salvation that God would have us co-operate. Thus Paul writes as His messenger: "I exhort, therefore, that first of all supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; for kings, for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour; who will have all men to be saved [or wills the salvation of all men], and to come unto the knowledge of the truth." "Are we, then, definitely to pray for the conversion of the world?" Some will ask. How, then, can we believe that "evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse," and how believe the prophecies concerning the coming of the Lord to take "vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ?" (1 Tim. 3:13; 1 Thess. 1:8.) Thank God, He gives us His Holy Spirit to guide us into all truth and to teach us what we should pray for as we ought (Rom. 8:26, 27). Generally, we shall find that as we follow the leading of the Spirit of God, we are led to pray with faith for those with whom we are in any way connected, in our nation, city, or family. We can only pray and give thanks when we believe; that we receive (Mark 11:24). But one thing is blessedly dear, no limitation of God's salvation comes from Him. He wills that all men should be saved. "The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all" (Isa. 53:3-6). "There is one God, and one Mediator between God and man, the Man [or Himself man] Christ Jesus, who gave Himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time." Man has, indeed, the choice to refuse so great salvation; he may, and oh, how often does choose for himself the terrible doom prepared not for man but for "the devil and his angels" (Matt. 25:41). Reader, in order to be lost, you must go against the wondrous provision of Infinite Love, and ignore that your God bore your sins Himself in order to save you.

The Late SERGEANT MARJOURAM, a Christian Soldier—Scenes in his Life.

WHILE sceptics and infidels are assailing the Bible on all hands and are laboring to prove the falsity of the Christian religion, unlearned men, and especially young people, sometimes find their faith wavering under assaults in which the enemy appears to have all the logic on his side. If they had more knowledge and more skill in argument they would see easily the flaws in the reasoning with which those who hate the Bible seek to overthrow it. But there is one argument that the most unlearned can feel and use. That is the argument of facts. How comes it, if the Bible is false and religion a sham, that we see lives changed by its influence alone? Every man knows how difficult it is to give up a bad habit; all men know the power of temptation and are aware that even the love of a dear mother, the pleadings of a beloved child, and the most powerful influences known to humanity often fail to turn the wrongdoer from the way to destruction. But he comes under the influence of the Bible, he believes in Jesus and looks to Him for salvation, and straightway his life is changed. What the strongest earthly motives failed to do is done by Christ and the Holy Spirit. If our young people realized this fact and got it firmly fixed in their minds, they would not be distressed by doubts. The fact of a life radically changing is the best evidence of the power which changes it. Once that is understood and realized, they would as soon doubt the power of Christ as they would doubt the power of steam with a moving locomotive before their eyes. For this reason we have given, from time to time, portraits and sketches of the lives of men not eminent in the world, but remarkable as illustrations of divine power in changing the lives of men who, humanly speaking, seemed least amenable to its influence. One such we give this week. A wayward boy, a wicked man, low, brutal, drunken, vicious, yet transformed by Christ into a good man and an exemplary citizen.

William Marjouram was born at Easton, England, on October 20th, 1828. His father was employed as gardener to the Duke of Hamilton. At the age of fourteen the boy went to sea. Rising early one morning, he left his home for the first time, and walked to Ipswich, a distance of fifteen miles. Here he found a master of a merchant vessel who was in want of a cabin-boy, and who at once engaged his services for a trial trip, prior to his becoming his apprentice for five years. This first experiment, however, sufficed to check his ardor for a sea-life, and on the return of the vessel, two weeks afterward, he returned to his parents' humble home.

ENLISTS INTO THE ARMY.

At the age of fifteen he enlisted in the army, but his first night brought repentance, and in the morning he was liberated on paying a fine worth about six dollars, technically known as "smart money." And now he once more returned to his home, yet only to repeat this last experiment, which in his waywardness he had attempted, and in his fickleness he had abandoned.

This time he joined the Royal Artillery, on June 3d, 1844, and was duly attested. In July, 1845, he was appointed acting bombardier. Step by step he made steady and well-assured progress, being appointed corporal in February, 1848, but, unfortunately, about this time he was given to excessive drinking and improper company. His bad conduct was not overlooked by his superiors, neither could it go unpunished.

He was consequently reduced from corporal's rank to that of gunner and driver.

CONVERSION IN NOVA SCOTIA.

Having married in June, 1850, he set sail with his company, on April 9th, 1851, for Halifax, Nova Scotia. Their vessel was the Birkenhead, a vessel which subsequently attained melancholy fame by being lost at the Cape of Good Hope with four hundred lives. They landed after a rough passage of twenty-one days, and not long afterward he was again appointed acting bombardier. In his diary we find the following entry relating to this period:

"Since I have been in Halifax, I have ceased to be an habitual drunkard; but still my mind was unchanged until March, 1852, when it pleased the Lord to alarm my guilty soul, and to show me that I was under the curse of the law." The circumstances leading up to this consummation were these: A revival having taken place at the Wesleyan Church at Halifax, one of the soldiers who was led to Christ was a sergeant belonging to Marjouram's own company, named Thompson. He had long been an open enemy to religion, and was looked upon as the very last man at all likely to "get religion." But the Holy Spirit opened his eyes; he saw his need of Christ, and became a happy and earnest believer.

A CHRISTIAN SOLDIER'S SOLICITUDE.

Sergeant Thompson now did all he could to lead others into the enjoyment of the great salvation he himself had found. Marjouram became an object of his daily solicitude, and at last he was prevailed upon by him to attend the evening meetings. "The first time I went," says Sergeant Marjouram, "I felt ashamed to mingle with those in the body of the church, so I stole into the gallery, and there, unseen by mortal eye, I listened to the invitations given by the ministers to come to Christ. I felt fully condemned; but the thought of meeting with my old companions as a disciple of Christ had almost sealed my doom, when, by an influence which I could not control, I was constrained to take the decisive step. I cast myself at the feet of Jesus, and pleaded for mercy and deliverance from the distracted state into which my soul was plunged. Next morning I felt that I was a child of God."

A PERSECUTOR'S CONFESSION.

As was to be expected, Sergeant Marjouram's companions soon discovered the change, and, for about six months, did all they could to humiliate, annoy, and irritate him, but, happily, he had grace given him to return good for evil, and rejoiced in doing it. Soon was the wrath of man turned to God's praise. One day, he was on his knees in a barrack-room, surrounded by about ten or twelve men. During the time he prayed, they vociferated into his very ears the most fearful curses; but he was enabled to pray for them, and experienced no desire to retaliate. The next morning, one of those same men, and one of the worst, too, went to Marjouram and said, "Bombardier, I hope you will forgive me for disturbing you last night; oh, I would give anything if I were like you!"

MEETING WITH HEDLEY VICARS.

At this period Marjouram joined the Bible-class held by the celebrated Dr. Twining, in which so many officers and men received valuable instruction. In a letter written in 1858, referring to the recently published life of Vicars, he says: "Do you know that Captain Hedley Vicars and myself used to meet in the prayer-meetings in Halifax? That Bible-class of Dr. Twining's, too, I know; and remember almost every meeting. Captain (then lieutenant and adjutant) Vicars attended, from the time he gave his heart to God. I came home from America in the same vessel, the Simoon, with him, but after we landed at Deal, I heard no more of him until his fate became known to the world; so you may think how much I value the written life of this good soldier; would to God the army were full of such men!" (The daily meeting on board ship is illustrated in the front picture.) He often spoke of the sound advice given in the Bible-class by Dr. Twining, with whom he soon became intimately acquainted.

EMBARKATION FOR NEW ZEALAND.

In May, 1853, Marjouram was appointed drill-master at Woolwich, and in July, 1854, was once more promoted corporal, and placed under orders for New Zealand, with a detachment of about forty men, who were going out accompanied by their wives and children. They embarked on board the Polar Star, at Gravesend, on August 4th, 1854. They set sail, and continued slowly making headway, until September 30th, when they encountered a heavy gale of wind, the sea running mountains high, and breaking over the vessel with a fury which defied resistance; but, happily, the storm subsided, and the ship proceeded on her voyage.

THE SHIP ON FIRE.

On Sunday morning, October 1st, the fearful cry of, "Fire! Fire! Fire!" was heard sounding through the ship; and in a few moments smoke, in dense volumes, was issuing from every hatchway. When the alarm was given, some of the passengers were in bed, others at breakfast, and Marjouram and his wife were just about to sit down to theirs. The scene was exciting to the last degree. "Every one," says the sergeant, "was seen running wildly to and fro; some with only a blanket round them, and others half dressed; women calling for their children, and wives for their husbands. The fire was evidently gaining on us, and we, who were pouring water down the hold, were in danger of being suffocated with smoke. So the captain gave the order to batten down the hatches; and as everything we possessed was below, our worldly all was lost. Despair was visible on every face, while all expected that death would soon put an end to their terror. A burning ship, and a thousand miles from land! A heavy sea also was running that would have swamped our boats the very instant they touched the water!"

SUNDAY SERVICE ON DECK.

After much labor, the long-boat was hung in slings over the side, ready to be lowered; but it was then that every one saw their helpless condition, for no boat could live in such a sea. Yet a drowning man will catch at a straw; and while they felt encouraged at the launching of the boats, they seemed to forget the uselessness of the operation. But in the midst of all the terror and fearful anticipation of worse to come, Sergeant Marjouram obtained the captain's permission to hold the usual Sunday service. The doctor had invariably performed this service, and Marjouram desired him to begin; but after he had read a few sentences from the Prayer-book, it was discovered that he was in a state of partial intoxication. Marjouram, therefore, read Psalm 107, and afterward engaged in prayer; and thus ended that solemn morning service with death staring them in the face.

A TIMELY RESCUE.

Three days afterward a ship named the Annamooka, from Callao for Cadiz, hove in sight, and, approaching within speaking distance, the captain promised to lie by the burning vessel all night; but, in the mean time, it was thought advisable, the sea having somewhat subsided, to remove the women and children. Marjouram volunteered his services as a boatman for the purpose, and, after three trips, had the joy of seeing them safe in the cabin of the Annamooka. "It was no easy task," says the sergeant, "to conduct the boat from ship to ship, for a very heavy sea was still running, and although the vessels were not more than half a mile apart, yet frequently neither was visible." The next day the doomed ship was abandoned, as it was evident she could not hold together much longer. The boats being all ready, the order was given to open the hatches, and it was then that the actual state of things was discovered. The pent-up flames raged and roared along the main-deck with great fury, and caught the rigging. Eventually all who were on board safely reached the Annamooka, thankful for such a timely and direct interposition of Provi-

ce. (The scene is illustrated in the picture on the first page.)

ends the record of a marvellous deliverance. Through his remaining life Sergeant Marjoram consecrated the anniversary of it by soliloquy, praise and prayer. In its terrible vicissitudes he was called upon to learn never-to-be-forgotten lessons of trust and dependence. As at learned in God's school is seldom learned easily; but, unlike lessons more cheaply learned, it is not only worth learning and remembering, but well worth the hardship the thing of it may have involved. A spirit at times rare treasure, dear at no purchase-money of experience. The key to it is found in the utterance of another pupil in the same school, "Because Thou hast been my refuge, before under the shadow of Thy wings I will be." See frontispiece picture.

And calm, and self-possessed."

ARRIVAL IN NEW ZEALAND.
The month of October Sergeant Marjoram, his company landed at St. Helena, where he received many acceptable deeds of spontaneous kindness from the inhabitants, and after a few months again set sail for England, which was safely reached in April, 1857. A month or two after Marjoram again quitted England, under orders from New Zealand, where he arrived on Christmas Day, full of gratitude and joy.

WORK AMONG THE SOLDIERS.
Having been promoted to the rank of sergeant in January, 1856, Marjoram directed his attention more than ever to the moral and spiritual condition of his men, and aspired to become a more perfect instrument in doing good. In 1858, before we find him in the midst of the soldiers, talking to them in plain language of the effects of drunkenness, and their too evident and too ready disregard of their soul's salvation. An institute was formed, a "Military Total Abstinence Society" was begun, day-schools were opened for the soldiers' children, and a school for the men, and much good was done.

ESCAPE FROM A FUGITIVE AXE.
Sergeant Marjoram realized again and again the truth of the Psalmist's statement, "Thou keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee, because he trusteth in Thee." One evening, one of the men was cutting up a log, and the sergeant was just behind him, looking down, collecting the chips for the fire. From some cause or other, the axe missed the log and flew out of the man's hand, passing close to Marjoram's head. Had it been any nearer, in a moment he would have been killed before God. (See frontispiece picture.) He says he felt no particular fear, but praised God for his deliverance, which he records with deepest gratitude.

THE PERILS OF ACTUAL WARFARE.
March, 1860, Sergeant Marjoram was engaged in actual warfare for the first time. The British had built a pa, or fort, near the British camp, and he received orders to attack it. He says: "As we passed it, we saw the natives eyeing us from the interior. On we went, however, and, lo! a thousand yards off. Taking up our position, we opened fire with three and one rocket tube. By and by our terrible work was done, but I could not make out the Maoris should remain in the pa so long. Ammunition being expended, and night coming on, we lay down in the fern while the Maoris kept up at intervals a directed fire, some of the shot striking my head and whizzing past my ears, others entering ground close at my feet; and yet, through God's mercy, I was spared." In the morning the pa was found to be deserted.

A THANKSGIVING SERVICE IN CAMP.
The same evening, which was Sunday, Marjoram assembled his comrades to give public thanks to God for their safe deliverance. The congregation consisted of four officers and about twenty soldiers. After a few opening remarks by the sergeant on the peculiarity of their position, all joined in prayer. Every one went down upon his knees, and Marjoram read the prayers from the Prayer-book. At the conclusion of the little service an officer said to Marjoram, "Let me know when you have any meetings, and I will attend them; and if I can assist you in any way, I will gladly do so." (The military Thanksgiving Service is depicted in the front picture.)

INVALIDED HOME.

At last, broken down in health, Sergeant Marjoram was invalided home in January, 1861. On February 3d, the Robert Lowe weighed anchor and proceeded to sea, but the very first day the devoted Christian soldier conducted service on board among a very motley crew, and day after day he was found talking and praying with the men, some of whom he was instrumental in leading to Christ.

Fifteen weeks passed away after leaving New Zealand, when, on May 18th, both mariners and military experienced the deep joy of beholding once again the shores of their own, their native land. "Nothing, in my opinion," says the sergeant, "can exceed the beauty of a vessel homeward bound, carried before the wind up the Channel, every heart on board beating with a desire to meet those they love, and some with gratitude to God for His sparing mercies." But though the long, long journey had been accomplished, Sergeant Marjoram had most manifestly come home to die. He himself was impressed with the same conviction. He desired to live only that he might be the means of bringing sinners to Christ, and was especially anxious about his unconverted relatives, who had long been the subjects of his earnest prayers.

THE CLOSING SCENE.

A very few days only passed away, when one Friday night, in the military hospital at Woolwich, the closing scene in the drama of his earthly life was enacted. His wife was by his side. He was unable to say much, but his joy in Christ was unmistakable. As the night wore on, Mrs. Marjoram thought her husband's mind was wandering, and asked him if he knew her. He answered very distinctly, "Why, yes, you are my dear wife." About three o'clock in the morning he spoke very calmly about "going home," and appeared very happy. His countenance seemed radiant with celestial glory. To his wife and some intimate friends he said, quite cheerfully, "Mind, you have promised you will meet me in heaven." A few minutes more, and he had uttered his last connected sentence, "I am on the Rock!" his countenance beaming at the same time with, if possible, a more heavenly expression than it had ever yet worn. "Happy!" "Rejoice!" "Amen!" he was heard to murmur, and when he had said this, he fell asleep, and in the early summer morning he passed away peacefully at the bidding of his Lord.

THE McALL MISSION IN FRANCE.

At a recent meeting in connection with this wonderful mission, the following remarks were made:

Monsieur Reveillaud said: "When Mr. McAll came to Paris he commenced his work in the most abandoned part of the city, and proclaimed the Gospel in the only French words he knew—viz., 'God loves you and I love you.' People thought him mad, and said it would soon come to an end. They did not then know that the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation, and this was just what France needed to learn. It seemed unlikely that God would cast off the land of the Huguenots, whose martyr-blood had stained the earth. God sent Mr. McAll at the right time.

"Two encouraging facts are these—religious liberty and willingness to listen to the Gospel. In our meetings I have never been interrupted but twice. The whole land is now open to the Gospel, which, indeed, has a freshness there that perhaps in some measure it has not here.

Mr. McAll has taught French Protestants successful methods of reaching the ear of the people—something suited to the peasantry, and something they can understand. They feel perfectly at home. The people sometimes say, 'We want a McAll Mission.' Indeed, it has become quite a generic term for evangelistic and aggressive work. All the French missions have received an impulse through it, and many of the churches contribute toward its support."

Dr. Beard, in giving a further description of the work, said: "When the mission commenced there were ten million persons in France who had never seen the inside of a New Testament. No sooner was the Gospel preached than the people began to say, 'This is good; this is just what I need.' Their ignorance until that time was deplorable. Some asked if Jesus Christ was a Frenchman, others thought He was one of the great Napoleon's generals, and others asked if He were living now. The deep hold on the people was recently seen at a meeting, when one of the workers was leaving Paris; the people came in large numbers to bid him farewell and present him with a tribute of their love. They were mostly poor people, but they loved him for his work's sake. Recently we opened a hall in a locality where the population are almost entirely atheists. Even Mr. McAll doubted its success; but the place is now crowded, and the work is being blessed. One of the hearers said, on leaving the service last Sunday evening, 'This is beautiful; I never heard anything like it before, but I'm sure it must be a true religion.'" In conclusion, Dr. Beard eloquently contrasted the life and work of Napoleon with that of Mr. McAll—the one having spent a life in destroying men, and the other in saving them.

Monsieur Reveillaud, in a second address, said: "To-day France is a tabula rasa, a nation without a religion. In that fallow ground, it is true, weeds grow. Frivolity and licentiousness abound, especially in Paris and in some other districts. But foreigners who have themselves contributed to make Paris what it is, must not judge of all France by Paris. And the day of grace for France has not passed yet. She has given more martyrs than any country in Europe. The sowing time in France has been a time of weeping. It often is so as the sower thinks of the risks that intervene between sowing and reaping. But in this case the harvest is certain, for God is faithful.

"The dawn of a new era of reformation has come. The churches after the Revolution were allowed to worship, not to evangelize; and they were chilled by a rationalism which wrought more havoc among them than the sabres of the dragonnades. Gradually they have been waking up. About the time of the Franco-German war they began to feel what a great work they had to do. Then God, who prepared the time, prepared the man. Mr. McAll came to teach us how to reach the people; how to preach not only from a high pulpit, but within the reach of the people. His success shows that the readiness to listen earnestly is not only found in particular districts. It is everywhere! I may say with confidence that if in every canton (a group of about ten village communes in France is so called) you could place an evangelist with the spirit of his Master, he would have a little church in a year; in two years he would have two, and a third the year after. The fields are white, as Dr. Bonar has correctly said. Pray ye the Lord of the harvest to send forth more laborers into His harvest."

The Gift of a Cathedral has been Accepted by the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of Long Island. Mrs. Stewart, the widow of the late Mr. A. T. Stewart, the dry-goods millionaire, has now completed the magnificent structure at Garden City, L. I., and has formerly transferred it to the Episcopal Church. With the beautiful cathedral she gives schools and a residence for the bishop, and also an endowment of $15,000 annually for their support.

TOBACCO AND OPIUM.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached last Sunday Morning, May 17, 1885.

"Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed."—GEN. I: 11.

Herbs Useful and Baneful—Tobacco—God Created it—The Uses of Poisons—Advice Regarding it—Produces Unhealth—Produces Cancer—Depresses the Nervous System—Promotes Drunkenness—Clergymen who Smoke and Chew—A Cuspadore in a Pulpit—An Insane Victim—Ten Cigars to Make One Sermon—The Money it Costs—A Merchant's Testimony—Why Governor Briggs Wore no Collar—Other Narcotics—A Victim of Hashesh—Opium—Six Hundred Thousand Victims—De Quincey's Confessions—Reflections by a Fireside.

The two first born of our earth were the grass-blade and the herb. They preceded the brute creation and the human family—the grass for the animal creation, the herb for human service. The cattle came and took possession of their inheritance, the grass-blade; man came and took possession of his inheritance, the herb. We have the herb for food as in case of hunger, for narcotic as in case of insomnia, for anodyne as in case of paroxysm, for stimulant as when the pulses flag under the weight of disease. The caterer comes and takes the herb and presents it in all styles of delicacy. The physician comes and takes the herb and compounds it for physical recuperation. Millions of people come and take the herb for ruinous physical and intellectual delectation. The herb, which was divinely created, and for good purposes, has often been degraded for bad results. There is a useful and a baneful employment of the herbaceous kingdom.

There sprang up in Yucatan of this continent an herb that has

BEWITCHED THE WORLD.

In the fifteenth century it crossed the Atlantic Ocean and captured Spain. Afterward it captured Portugal. Then the French ambassadors took it to Paris, and it captured the French Empire. Then Walter Raleigh took it to London, and it captured Great Britain. Nicotiana, ascribed to that genus by the botanists, but we all know it is the exhilarating, elevating, emparading, nerve-shattering, dyspepsia breeding, health-destroying tobacco. I shall not in my remarks be offensively personal, because you all use it, or nearly all! I know by experience how it soothes and rosesates the world, and kindles sociality, and I also know some of its baleful results. I was its slave, and by the grace of God I have become its conqueror. Tens of thousands of people have been asking the question during the past two months, asking it with great pathos and great earnestness: "Does the use of tobacco produce cancerous and other troubles?" I shall not answer the question in regard to any particular case, but shall deal with the subject in a more general way.

You say to me, "Did God not create tobacco?" Yes. You say to me, "Is not God good?" Yes. Well, then, you say, "If God is good and He created tobacco, He must have created it for some good purpose." Yes, your logic is complete. But God created the common sense at the same time, by which we are to know and how not to use it. God created that just as He created henbane and nux vomica and coperas and belladonna and all other poisons, whether directly created by Himself or extracted by man.

That it is a poison no man of common sense will deny. A case was reported where a little child lay upon its mother's lap and one drop fell from a pipe to the child's lip and it went into convulsions and into death. But you say, "Haven't people lived on in complete use of it to old age?" Oh, yes; just as I have seen inebriates seventy years old. In Boston, years ago, there was a meeting in which there were several centenarians, and they were giving their experience, and one centenarian said that he had lived over a hundred years, and that he ascribed it to the fact that he had refrained from the use of intoxicating liquors. Right after him another centenarian said he had lived over a hundred years, and he ascribed it to the fact that for the last fifty years he had hardly seen a sober moment. It is an amazing thing how many outrages men may commit upon their physical system and yet live on. In the case of the man of the jug he lived on because his body was pickled. In the case of the man of the pipe, he lived on because his body turned into smoked liver!

But are there no truths to be uttered in regard to this great evil? What is the advice to be given to the multitude of young people who hear me this day? What is the advice you are going to give to your children?

First of all, we must advise them to abstain from the use of tobacco because all the medical fraternity of the United States and Great Britain agree in ascribing to this habit terrific unhealth. The men whose lifetime work is the study of the science of health say so, and shall I set up my opinion against theirs? Dr. Agnew, Dr. Olcott, Dr. Barnes, Dr. Rush, Dr. Mott, Dr. Harvey, Dr. Hosack—all the doctors, allopathic, homoeopathic, hydropathic, eclectic, denounce the habit as

A MATTER OF UNHEALTH.

A distinguished physician declared he considered the use of tobacco caused seventy different styles of disease, and he says: "Of all the cases of cancer in the mouth that have come under my observation, almost in every case it has been ascribed to tobacco."

The united testimony of all physicians is that

that it takes away twenty-five per cent of the physical vigor of this generation, and that it goes on as the years multiply and, damaging this generation with accumulated curse, it strikes other centuries. And if it is so deleterious to the body, how much more destructive to the mind. An eminent physician, who was the superintendent of the insane asylum at Northampton, Mass., says: "Fully one-half of the patients we get in our asylum have lost their intellect through the use of tobacco." If it is such a bad thing to injure the body, what a bad thing, what a worse thing it is to injure the mind, and any man of common sense knows that tobacco attacks the nervous system, and everybody knows that the nervous system attacks the mind.

Beside that, all reformers will tell you that the use of tobacco creates an unnatural thirst, and it is in America to-day more than anything else. In all cases where you find men taking strong drink you find they use tobacco. There are men who use tobacco who do not take strong drink, but all who use strong drink use tobacco, and that shows beyond controversy there is an affinity between the two products. There are reformers here to-day who will testify to you it is impossible for a man to reform from taking strong drink until he quits tobacco. In many of the cases where men have been reformed from strong drink and have gone back to their cups, they have testified that they first touched tobacco and then they surrendered to intoxicants.

I say in the presence of this assemblage to-day, in which there are many physicians—and they know that what I say is true on the subject—that the pathway to the drunkard's grave and the drunkard's hell is strewn thick with tobacco-leaves. What has been on this subject? Is this a mere statement of a preacher whose business it is to talk morals, or is the testimony of the world just as emphatic? What did Benjamin Franklin say? "I never saw a well man in the exercise of common sense who would say that tobacco did him any good." What did Thomas Jefferson say? Certainly he is good authority. He says in regard to the culture of tobacco, "It is a culture productive of infinite wretchedness." What Horace Greeley say of it? "It is a profane stench." What did Daniel Webster say of it? "If those men must smoke, let them take horse-shed!" One reason why the habit got on from destruction to destruction is that many MINISTERS OF THE GOSPEL TAKE IT.

They smoke themselves into bronchitis, and then the dear people have to send them Europe to get them restored from exhausted religious services! They smoke until the nervous system is shattered. They smoke the selves to death. I could mention the names of five distinguished clergymen who died of cancer in the mouth, and the doctor said, in every case, it was the result of tobacco. The testimony of many a minister of religion has been covered all over with handsome eulogy, while the true epitaph had been written it would have said: "Here lies a man killed by too much 'cavendish'!" They smoke until the world blue, and their theology is blue, and everything is blue. How can a man stand in the pulpit and preach on the subject of temperance when he is indulging such a habit as that? I have seen into which the holy man dropped his cud before he got up to read about "blessed are the pure in heart," and to read about the rolling of a sweet morsel under the tongue, and to read about the unclean animals in Leviticus chewed the cud.

About sixty-five years ago a student at the Dover Theological Seminary graduated into ministry. He had an eloquence and a magnanimity which sent him to the front. Nothing could stand before him. But in a few months he was put and the physician said tobacco was the cause of the disaster. It was the custom in those days to give a portion of tobacco to every patient in the asylum. Nearly twenty years passed also and that man was walking the floor of his cell in the asylum, when his reason returned, and saw the situation, and he took the tobacco from his mouth and threw it against the iron grate the place in which he was confined, and he said "What brought me here? What keeps me here? Tobacco! tobacco! God forgive me! God help me, and I will never use it again! He was fully restored to reason, came forward, preached the Gospel of Christ for some years, and then went into everlasting blessedness.

There are ministers of religion now in this country who are dying by inches and they do not know what is the matter with them. They are being killed by tobacco. They are despising their influence through tobacco. They are malodorous with tobacco. I could give a paragraph of history, and that would be

MY OWN EXPERIENCE.

I took ten cigars to make one sermon, and I got very nervous, and I awakened one day to see what an outrage I was committing upon my health by the use of tobacco. I was about to change settlement, and a generous tobacco of Philadelphia told me if I would come to Philadelphia and be his pastor he would give me the cigars I wanted for nothing all the rest of my life. I halted. I said to myself, "I smoke more than I ought to now in these times, and when my salary is small, what would I do if I had gratuitous and unlimited supply? Then and there, twenty-four years ago, I quit once and forever. It made a new man of me. Much of the time the world looked blue before that because I was looking through tobacco smoke. Ever since the world has been full of sunshine, and though I have done as much work as any one of my age, God has blessed me as much to me, with the best health that a man ever had.

I say that no minister of religion can afford to smoke. Put in my hand all the money expended by Christian men in Brooklyn for tobacco, and I will support three orphan asylums as well as as grandly as the three great orph-lums already established. Put into my hand money spent by the Christians of America tobacco, and I will clothe, shelter, and feed the suffering poor of the continent. The merican church gives a million dollars a year the salvation of the heathen, and American ristians smoke five million dollars' worth of acco.

I stand here to-day in the presence of a vastitude of young people who are forming ir habits. Between seventeen and twenty years of age a great many young men get on m habits in the use of tobacco that they er get over. Let me say to all my young nds.

YOU CANNOT AFFORD TO SMOKE. I cannot afford to chew. You either take y good tobacco, or you take very cheap toco. If it is cheap, I will tell you why it is ap. It is made of burdock, and lamp-black, sawdust, and col's-foot, and plaitain es, and fuller's earth, and salt, and alum, lime, and a little tobacco, and you cannot rd to put such a mess as that in your mouth. If you use expensive tobacco, do you not ik it would be better for you to take that ount of money which you are now expending this herb, and which you will expend during course of your life if you keep the habit up, with it buy a splendid farm and make the mnoon and the evening of your life comfort-?

There are young men whose life is going out y inch from cigarettes. Now, do you not ik it would be well for you to listen to the

TESTIMONY OF A MERCHANT
New York, who said this: "In early life I ked six cigars a day at six and a half cents a. They averaged that. I thought to my-one day, I'll just put aside all I consume in r habits and all I'll see what it will come to by ound interest." And he gives this treduous stistic: "Last July I completed thirty years since, by the grace of God, I was icipated from the filthy habit, and the savam-ounted to the enormous sum of $39,102.03 ound interest. We lived in the city, the children, who had learned something of enjoyment of country life from their annual ts to their grandparents, longed for a home ng in the green fields. I found a very pleasant e in the country for sale. The cigar money e into requisition, and I found it amounted a sufficient sum to purchase the place, and it nine. Now, boys, you take your choice. oking without a home, or a home without oking." This is common sense as well as gion.

I must say a word to my friends who smoke e best tobacco, and who could stop at any e. What is

YOUR CHRISTIAN INFLUENCE his respect? What is your influence upon ng men? Do you not think it would be bet- for you to exercise a little self-denial? Peo-wondered why George Briggs, Governor of achusetts, gave a cravat but no collar, h," they said, "it is an absurd eccentricity," his was priate for men. Now my subject widens and shall be appropriate for both sexes. In all ages of the world there has been a search for some herb or flower that would stimulate lethargy and compose grief. Among the ancient Greeks and Egyptians they found something they called nepenthe, and the Theban women knew how to compound it. If a person should chew a few of those leaves their grief would be immediately whelmed with hilarity. Nepenthe passed out from the consideration of the world and then came HASHEESH, which is from the Indian hemp. It is manu- factured from the flowers at the top. The work- man with leathern apparel walks through the field and the exudation of the plants adheres to the leathern garments, and then the man comes out and scrapes off this exudation, and it is mixed with aromatics and becomes an intoxicant that has brutalized whole nations. Its first effect is sight, spectacle glorious and grand be- yond all description, but afterward it pulls down body, mind, and soul into anguish.

I knew one of the most brilliant men of our time. His appearance in a newspaper column, or a book, or a magazine was an enchantment. In the course of a half hour he could produce more wit and more valuable information than any man I ever heard talk. But he chewed hasheesh. He first took it out of curiosity to see whether the power said to be attached really existed. He took it. He got under the power of it. He tried to break loose. He put his hand in the cocatrice's den to see whether it would bite, and he found out to his own undog- ing. His friends gathered around and tried to save him, but he could not be saved. The father, a minister of the Gospel, prayed with him and counselled him, and out of a compara- tively small salary employed the first medical advice of New York, Philadelphia, Edinburgh, Paris, London, and Berlin, for he was his only son. No help came. First his body gave way in pangs and convulsions of suffering. Then his mind gave way and he became a raving maniac. Then his soul went out blaspheming God into a starless eternity. He died at thirty years of age. Behold the work of accursed hasheesh.

But I must put my emphasis upon the use of OPIMUM. It is made from the white poppy. It is not a new discovery. Three hundred years before Christ we read of it, but it was not until the seventh century that it took up its march of death, and passing out of the curative and the medicinal, through smoking and mastication, it has become the curse of nations. In 1861 there were imported into this country one hundred and seven thousand pounds of opium. In 1880, nineteen years after, there were imported five hundred and thirty thousand pounds of opium. In 1876 there were in this country two hundred and twenty-five thousand opium consumers. Now it is estimated that there are in the United States to-day six hundred thousand victims of opium. It is appalling.

We do not know why some families do not get on. There is something mysterious about them. The opium habit is so stealthy, it is so deceitful, and it is so deathful you can cure a hundred men of strong drink when you can cure one opium-eater.

I have knelt down in this very church by those who were elegant in apparel, and elegant in appearance, and from the depths of their soul and from the depths of my soul we cried out for God's rescue. Somehow it did not come. In many a household only the physician and pastor know it—the physician called in for physical relief, the pastor called in for spiritual relief, and they both fail. The physician confesses his defeat, the minister of religion confesses his defeat, for somehow God does not seem to hear a prayer offered for an opium-eater. His grace is infinite, and I have been told there are cases of reformation. I never saw one. I say this not to wound the feelings of any who may feel this awful grip, but to utter a potent warning that you stand back from

THAT GATE OF HELL. Oh man, oh woman, tampering with this great evil, have you fallen back on this as a permanent resource because of some physical distress or mental anguish? Better stop. The ecstasies do not pay for the horrors. The Paradise is followed too soon by the Pandemonium. Morphia, a blessing of God for the relief of sudden pang and of acute dementia, misappropriated and never intended for permanent use.

It is not merely the barbaric fanatics that are taken down by it. Did you ever read

DE QUINCEY'S CONFESSIONS of an opium-eater? He says that during the first ten years the habit handed to him all the keys of Paradise, but it would take something as mighty as De Quincey's pen to describe the consequent horrors. There is nothing that I have ever read about the tortures of the damned that seemed more horrible than those which De Quincey says he suffered. Samuel Taylor Coleridge first conquered the world with his exquisite pen, and then was conquered by opium. The most brilliant, the most eloquent lawyer of the nineteenth century went down under its power, and there is a vast multitude of men and women—but more women than men—who are going into the dungeon of that awful incarceration.

The worst thing about it is, it takes advantage of one's weakness. De Quincey says: "I got to be an opium-eater an account of my rheumatism." Coleridge says: "I got to be an opium eater on account of my sleeplessness." For what are you taking it? For God's sake do not take it long. The wealthiest, the grandest families going down under its power. Twenty-five thousand victims of opium in Chicago. Twenty-five thousand victims of opium in St. Louis, and, according to that average, seventy-five thousand victims of opium in New York and Brooklyn.

The clerk of a drug-store says: "I can tell them when they come in; there is something about their complexion, something about their manner, something about the look of their eyes that shows they are victims." Some in the struggle to get away from it try chloral. Whole tons of chloral manufactured in Germany every year. Baron Liebig says he knows one chemist in Germany who manufactures a half ton of chloral every week. Beware of hydrate of chloral! It is coming on with mighty tread to curse these cities. But I am chiefly under this head speaking of morphia. The devil of morphia is going to be in this country, in my opinion, mightier than the devil of alcohol.

By the power of the Christian pulpit, by the power of the Christianized printing-press, by the power of the Lord God Almighty, all these evils are GOING TO BE EXTIRPATED —all, all, and you have a work in regard to that, and I have a work. But what we do we had better do right away. The clock ticks now, and we hear it; after a while the clock will tick and we will not hear it. I sat at a country fireside, and I saw the fire kindle and blaze, and go out. I sat long enough at that fireside to get a good many practical reflections, and I said: "That is like human life, that fire on the hearth." We put on the faggots and they blaze up, and out, and on, and the whole room is filled with the light, gay of sparkle, gay of flash, gay of crackle. Emblem of boyhood. Now the fire intensifies. Now the flame reddens into coals. Now the heat is becoming more and more intense, and the more it is stirred the redder is the coal. Now with onesweep of flame it cleaves the way, and all the hearth glows with the intensity. Emblem of full manhood. Now the coals begin to whiten. Now the heat lessens. Now the flickering shadows die along the wall. Now the faggots fall apart. Now the household hover over the expiring embers. Now the last breath of smoke is lost in the chimney. The fire is out. Shovel up the white remains. Ashes! Ashes!

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

An Appalling State of Things.—At a Noon prayer-meeting in Glasgow, Mr. Quarrier said:

"There was never more need for the Church of Scotland standing up against the drink than there is at present. I could mention hundreds of individual cases which have come under my notice, of which I shall mention one. It was that of four children who were brought to our Homes. The father came home from his work one day, and fell quite dead through indulging in strong drink, and a few days later the mother died of delirium tremens."

The Peddler and His Pack.—Mr. Kerr Said: "I am acquainted with an old Irish peddler. One day he was going along a country road with a heavy pack on his back, but he was carrying a far heavier burden than that; a deep sense of sin within him. As he was going on his way he thought, 'I must get this matter settled; the load is too heavy; I cannot carry it,' and, coming to a field, he threw his pack over a wall, and, dropping on his knees, he said, 'I will not rise until I get salvation.' So there he wrestled with God, and cried, like Jacob of old, 'I will not let Thee go until Thou bless me.' And he did not rise, dear friends, until God pardoned him of all his sins through Jesus Christ, His Son, and he is now a happy, rejoicing Christian."

Power of a Young Lady's Silence.—A Christian sister said: "A young lady was asked to a dinner-party, and at the table two young men were speaking in a very irreverent way of God and holy things. This young lady was a child of God, and was very indignant to hear the Saviour whom she loved being spoken of in such a slighting manner. She kept silence, for she could not speak. In the course of the evening one of the two young men came to her and said, 'I am very anxious about my soul; your eloquent silence at the dinner-table affected me very much. I could not get it out of my mind, and in consequence I have now come to ask you what must I do to be saved?' It was not long before this new penitent found forgiveness and eternal life at the cross of Christ. Dear friends, does not this show us that at times, even by keeping a holy, prayerful silence, we may lead a soul to Christ?"

Why the Navy Hung His Head.—A Christian worker related the following: "Some time ago, I was speaking to an old navy, between sixty and seventy years of age. He was telling me how very religious he was, and to how many sermons he had listened. He mentioned one minister in the country whom he had gone to hear for a long time, and whom I knew to be a very godly man, and I said: 'I suppose you have heard the Gospel preached twenty times?' 'Far more than that,' he replied. 'Well,' I then said, 'you have heard it preached one hundred times?' 'Aye, as many times as that and more,' was the reply. 'Maybe you have heard it preached five hundred times?' 'I would not say but what I have,' he said. 'And have you ever received that Gospel?' I asked. The old man, hanging his head, replied, 'I do not think I have.' Have you, dear friends? You who have listened to the Gospel times without number, or have you to hang your head and confess, like the old man, 'I do not think I have'?"

Finding a Lost Son.—At a Gospel Temperance meeting the following was related: "In a village some miles from Glasgow a lady was left a widow with one son, and all her prayers and care were centred upon him. She educated and kept him at home as long as she could, but as he grew older some friends advised her to send him to Glasgow, which, very reluctantly, she did. He was not long in that city before he was drawn into a circle of worldly companions, and all the early teaching of his mother was forgotten. His letters home were few and unsatisfactory, until very soon they ceased altogether. One day, while the widow was sitting mourning over her lost son, he suddenly entered, and exclaimed, 'Oh, mother, I have given my heart to Jesus, and I could not rest until I had told you.' The glad mother wept tears of joy over her son; her prayers and her teaching were not in vain. She now let him return to the city with the greatest confidence, knowing that he had a common Father in heaven. He is now an earnest Christian worker in Glasgow, and is humbly trying to follow in the footsteps of his dear Master."

Cast Adrift by Friends.—A Lady Worker remarked: "There was a young girl sent to me from the Evangelistic Association. When speaking to her about her soul, she said: 'If God has the power to keep me from sin, why does He let me go on in it?' 'You are not a machine,' I replied; 'God has made you a responsible being.' Then she told me as follows: 'My friends tried to force me into the right way, but I never would go, and it must have been God Himself who led me in here.' 'Yes, I answered, 'it was God who guided you here.' 'And it must have been God, too, who kept me from drowning myself last night,' she said. 'Did you try to do that?' I asked. 'Yes,' she rejoined, 'I went down to the river for the purpose of throwing myself in, but something kept me back.' This young woman had been cast adrift by all her friends, but Jesus did not cast her off. He saved her and blessed her. She is still in the Homes, and, I believe, truly in Christ Jesus as her Saviour."

The Devil's Best Servant.—Miss Bryson Related the following: "There was a poor woman whom I used to visit, and although she was much addicted to strong drink, she said to me that the drink was the devil's best servant. She took it at intervals, but these intervals became shorter and shorter, until the drink brought on creeping paralysis. She was left in the house all day alone, for her husband had to go out, and she had no children. After all she had suffered through drink, I went in to see her one day, and found her lying helplessly intoxicated on the floor. Some one had come in and offered her whiskey, and she yielded to the temptation. Oh, dear friends, when we give way to temptation, how soon it exercises power over us, and we are quite helpless until we seek Divine aid, and then, and only then, shall we have the power over this or any other sin."

Why Katie Wept.—Mr. Adams, a Devoted Christian worker, said: "A short time ago I was called to the death-bed of a little girl. Her mother sent for me to announce to the little one that she was about to die. I broke the news as gently as I could, speaking to her of the love of Jesus, whom she seemed to know very well. I said, 'Katie, perhaps the Lord will soon call you to be with Himself.' She at once saw clearly what I had come for, and the darling child burst into a flood of tears. 'Katie,' I said, 'are you sorry you are going home?' 'Oh, no, Mr. Adams, it is not that,' she replied, 'but I have done so little for Jesus.' I softly sang the hymn beginning,

I heard the voice of Jesus say,

Come unto me and rest,

After I had sung the hymn through I heard the very faintest voice saying, 'Thy will be done.' And little Katie soon passed away, saying she was so happy because she would now see Jesus, and be with Him forever and ever."

Children Healed in Answer to Prayer.—A member of one of Mr. Moody's Mizpah bands thus testified: "Before my conversion my little girl, of whom I am very fond, was taken very ill, and one night when she was at the gates of death I went apart by myself, and in my agony I cried to God to save her, and promised that I would give myself to Him in return; and God heard my cry, and restored the little one to me, but I did not keep my part of the contract. As soon as I got my child restored to me I went back into the world. It is now two years since I gave myself to Christ, and He has kept me ever since. Before I gave up the drink I thought I could not do without it, but now I have no appetite for it. Last night my little boy, a second child, was at the gates of death. Agg went to the Lord, and pleaded with Him spare my child, and God has again heard prayer and recovered my little one. God veiled Himself to me last night in a way had never before done, and He is more precious to my soul than ever."

ANTICHRIST AND THE JEWS.

By the Rev. E. J. Hytche.

The Temple to be Rebuilt under Antichrist Protection—Daily Sacrifices Renewed—Christ's Treaty Broken—A Gigantic Attack to Crush the Jews—The Armies of Condemned Europe—The Terrific Slaughter—Interposers of Messiah—His Welcome—The Locality of His Advent—The Deliverance.

We learn from Zechariah 12:12-13, the some future period, and probably—judging from all the signs of the times—a very high but the three tribes, Judah, Benjamin, and Levi, remained united when the Ephraimite King was formed, and continued a separate nation until their dispersion after the capture of Jerusalem by Titus, will return to the Holy Land an unconverted state. Either just immediately before their return, or when there, by a treaty with Antichrist (Isa. 28:14, and Dan. 9) they will be placed under the protectorate of the lawless one. This covenant, for some explained reason, will be made for only six years, and thus has an element of uncertainty as to its after continuance when that period expires.

But notwithstanding the limited duration this covenant with Antichrist, the Jews will build their temple, possibly not on its former site, but on Mount Zion (Ps. 77). This may be inferred from the fact that it is one of their cherished hopes. The liturgy in daily use among them contains the prayer, "Build thou thy temple in our days, speedily." But for such re-creation of the ancient temple we have something more than well warranted inference, for Ezekiel 40:43 its dimensions and ritual specified in the minutest detail. This last temple is also referred to in Isa. 66; Zech. 1:13; Mal. 3:1; 11 Thess. 2:4, and 11:1-2. So that Ezekiel's temple is no mere biblical allegory, as most biblical commentators assert, for both the writers of the Old Testament and the New Testament, as taught by the Holy Spirit, re-report it as a literal building—literal worship and sacrifice.

But, unhappily, unlike Solomon's temple, one to be erected by the restored Jews who rebuilt, when they are still as a nation—as from God. Hence He will say (Isa. 66:17) "Where is the house that ye build unto Me, and where is the place of my rest?" As a result of such re-edification of the temple, we learn from Daniel 9:27 that will be again offered. But not being present in a contrite spirit, the Most High declares: "He will not accept them, but will rather (Isa. 66:3). 'He that killeth an ox as if he slew a man; he that sacrificeth a lamb, as if he cut off a dog's neck; he that offereth an oblation as if he offered swine's blood; he that burneth incense as if he blessed an idol.'"

Though the covenanted protectorate of Antichrist was for seven years, yet for some unexplained reason—but most probably as preparatory to his claim for divine worship—he break his covenant with the Jewish rulers who only a moiety of that period has expired. This infraction of his own covenant he will apparently be aided by some apostate Jews, since read that (Dan. 11:30) "he will have intercourse with those who forsake the holy covenant." The next step in his hellward course will be to erect

A SATANICALLY-ENDOWED IMAGE of himself in the temple for divine honor (Dan. 12:11; Heb. 2:19; Matt. 24:15; 13:14-15).

This claim of Antichrist to divine homage, doubtless be resisted by the mass of the Jew-

For, though they have rejected the Messiahship of Jesus, they still will have too much veneration for the God of their fathers to worship a mere man, and he the fiercest despot that ever crushed mankind. This will lead to a general insurrection in which the royal tribe of Judah will be conspicuous for courage and military tactics, the house of David taking the leadership in the conflict (Zech. 12 : 5-6).

Incited by Satan, of whom he will be the incarnation, and urged by his own rage at such a feeble nation daring to resist him (Dan. 11 : 44), Antichrist and his ten vassal kings will invest Jerusalem (Zech. 14 : 2, and Rev. 19 : 12). The allied Gentile armies will be beyond all precedent as respects numbers, and military skill and equipment. When compared with them the forces of the three tribes will be as in the days of King Ben-hadad (1 Kings 20 : 27). "Like two little flocks of kids, but the Syrians filled the country." We have already a foreshadow, even now, of the largeness of these confederated armies in the of Europe. For their standing armies already reach 4,000,000, and if we add to these fully trained and well-equipped soldiers the reserves, there are no less than 15,000,000 fighting men in Christendom alone. Hence we can well understand what the prophet Joel meant when he spoke of the last investment of Jerusalem (Joel 3 : 11-14). "Let the Gentiles be awakened and come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat, multitudes, multitudes, in the valley of threshing" (margin).

This prepares us to learn that one portion of the reserves of the Gentile armies will be located in Bozrah, on the south-east of the Holy Land, and there be

DEFEATED BY OUR LORD IN PERSON

(Isa. 63 : 1-6), and the other part as far north as the plain of Megiddo (Rev. 16 : 16) so memorable in Jewish history.

Every reference to this final rebellion shows that the whole land will be in insurrection. Zechariah says (12 : 6), "I will make the governors of Judah like a hearth of fire among the wood, and like a torch of fire in a sheaf—and they shall devour all the nations round about, on the right hand, and on the left." But in spite of the courage of the Judahites, Antichrist, impelled by Satan as well as by his own pride, and leading the multitudinous armies of the Gentiles, will totally defeat them wherever they make a stand. As a result of this victory (Zech. 13 : 8) two thirds "in all the land will be cut off and die, and a moiety of the Jerusalemites" will be carried away as captives.

Nor is this all. For in their hatred of Jehovah (Ps. 74 : 4-8) the Gentile armies will "burn up all the synagogues of God in the land. They will also cast fire into the sanctuary (or temple), and defile it by casting down the dwelling-place of God's name to the ground."

As in spite of their defeat, and the burning of their synagogues, the Jews will still fail to recognize the cause of this scourge, a bitter wail of despair will come up from them as a nation. The very language they will utter is pre-empted in Ps. 74 : 9. "We see not our signs; there is no more any prophet; neither is there among us any that knoweth how long? O God, how long shall the enemy reproach? Shall the enemy blaspheme Thy name forever?"

THIS TERRIBLE CRY OF DESPAIR

will come, not from a pious remnant, but from the whole nation. For Zechariah 12 : 11, 14 intimates that "The land shall mourn, every family apart; all the families that remain, every family apart and their wives apart." And no wonder; for, with two thirds already slaughtered, there seems to be every prospect that the whole nation will be exterminated, so fierce will be the rage of the Gentiles.

The predicted time for the advent and has now arrived. Antichrist will have planted his pavilion (Dan. 11 : 45) on "the glorious holy mountain," or Mount Zion. The satanically endowed image of the autocrat will be erected in the courts of the temple for universal worship. Nay, he himself (11 Thess. 2 : 4) will "sit in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God;" and (Rev. 13 : 8) "all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the slain Lamb." Hence there will be no one left to resist him, save that Jewish remnant who (Micah 7 : 10) "will be trodden down as the mire of the streets."

As self-help is out of the question, it depends upon supernatural aid alone to prevent the extermination of the chosen people. One, however, is found not only equal but ready to come to their rescue; and who can that possibly be but Messiah, the hope of every pious Jew during their long exile?

Nor are we left in any doubt as to the number of the Jews who shall be thus rescued by our Lord from impending ruin. For we read (Zech. 13 : 9), "I will bring the third part through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined, and I will try them as gold is tried; they shall call on my name, and I will hear them; and I will say, it is my people; and they shall say Jehovah is my God."

THE LOCALITY OF THE SECOND ADVENT of Messiah is indicated by Ezekiel, who says (Ezek. 43 : 1-4), "He brought me by the gate (of the temple) that looketh toward the east, and beheld the Glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east, and His voice was like the voice of many waters, and the earth shined with His glory; and the Glory of Jehovah came into the house by the way of the gate whose prospect was toward the east." Zechariah is even more definite in describing the locality of the Second Advent of our Lord, for he says (Zech. 14 : 4), "His feet shall stand in that day on the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east." Then will be fulfilled the words of our Lord (Luke 13 : 35), "Your house is left unto you desolate, and ye shall not see me until the time come when ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord." For they will (Zech. 11 : 10) "look unto Him whom they have pierced," and so, for the first time, understand the enigmas of their long expatriation from their fatherland.

THE MISSIONARY VOYAGE OF MESSRS. STUDD AND SMITH.

The Indian Witness gives some details of the voyage of Messrs. Studd and Smith whose portraits appeared in the journal on April 9th. It recounts the events which attended their arrival at Suez, and reports the meetings held by them and their five companions. The following extracts will interest our readers:

"On their arrival at Suez many wondered what they would be like; that surely there must be something wrong, a screw loose somewhere, that seven young men of position should leave home and all the pleasures of fashionable life, for as they said something less than a myth, a wild goose chase—to convert Chinamen! Teach them! Why, they'll laugh at them. So thought I, and with me many others. In fact, we expected no end of fun in quizzing them, intending to patronize their singing as a polite concession to mistaken enthusiasm. So with that view, when came, we gathered round, but when we heard the deep swelling notes in which they so earnestly sang, 'Christ Receiveth Sinful Men,' and after a few stirring words of earnest appeal went on, in a gentle solo, with those simple words, 'Let the dear Master come in,' it seemed to touch even the most callous. Tears would come in the eyes of many, and, as Mr. Beauchamp and Stanley Smith, spoke of the endless blessing of the Saviour's love, eighteen hundred years seemed but a day, so vividly did they paint that great event. A bleeding Saviour hung before us, and with a dying look of love, exclaimed, 'It is finished!' Then many a trembling sinner longed to get that peace—a peace which faith and trust only can give.

"Later on they would join in prayer, leading with them some nervous, repentant brother, and pleading for the Saviour's loving help to strengthen him, and make him bold to own and serve his new Master, asking God to fill his heart so full of peace and love that there be no room for evil in it. So were the evenings spent, singing ending about 10 P. M., but not their work. One or the other might be seen earnestly whispering words of hope, or upsetting some stubborn theory of unbelief. Always gentle, always patient, and not to be offended. I and many others look back to these evenings with pleasurable regret, and earnestly pray that God will guard them and bless their work.

"As time wore on, Sunday came.

in the morning, but later on a more informal one on the main deck, to which all the stewards came; also many of the passengers. After a chapter had been read, and a hymn sung, in which all cordially joined, each young man stood out, and in a few sincere and simple words told us of the wondrous way in which God had called them to His service, leading them to throw up their various professions and serve Him only, and testifying before all to that great and indescribable peace which follows reconciliation to God, and implicit trust in His mercy. After this evening a Bible-class was formed, and a chapter read before breakfast; then each brother was strengthened in faith by appealing and hearing other trustful prayers for strength and help. Again, at noon, a few earnest friends gathered together for an hour, and most of those passengers immediately under their influence and example took a pleasure in reading the Word, praising God in simple hymns of thanksgiving, while each pointed out and called to notice some fresh beauty or glorious promise, made to those who will but trust Him.

A LIGHT-HEARTED MAN-O-WAR'S MAN

on board, who was bound to join his ship, the Agamemnon, at Aden, a jolly tar, with hardly a thought beyond the morrow, but a heart as soft and tender as his hand was hard and rough. I often heard his voice as they sang. 'Let the dear Master come in.' First, 'twas but a murmur; yet, as the night rolled on, it gathered strength, and at last loudly and proudly came the words, 'I believe it, I believe it: Jesus died for me.' No hesitation then, for he did believe it. I shall long remember the night he left. 'Twas in a hurry, close on twelve. A boat came for him, the officer was waiting, and as he bundled his clothes together, exclaiming, 'There'll be a rare crowd there, sir' (meaning on board the Agamemnon). 'Yes, Jack,' was the answer, 'there will; but your new Master is well able to keep you even there, only trust in Him.' Then his face brightened up with a happy smile, his eyes filled with tears, and taking a step forward, he cried, in such an earnest voice, 'Do you really mean it, sir? I am so glad.' He left, and with him went the prayer of many an earnest heart. Thus God in His great mercy blessed their work of love.

"But the devil must needs be busy. How could he stand idly by, seeing so many of his best and zealous ministers wavering on the brink of salvation, all but believing? He stirred up a few unsettled spirits who, during what was to have been a farewell service, tried with bones, tambours, and other noise to distract the attention of the people. But the kind attention of the commander and his officers to forward any proposals or arrangements for the common weal, more than compensates for so slight a check. The general patience and attention paid by all the crew during these meetings was very marked. So we all sincerely hope that the ministry of these young men may be blessed in proportion to their trust; and since Studd, at cricket, and Smith with the oar, surpassed their fellows in sport, so may it please God that they tower above others in a glorious example of humility and faith."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Advent of a Democratic Administration. which some of our contemporaries predicted would reveal extensive dishonesty in the Treasury, has not, so far, led to any discoveries of that kind. It is gratifying to learn, for the sake of our national honor, that no discrepancies have been found. A press dispatch states that the count of the moneys and securities in the Treasury has been completed. Everything was found in a satisfactory condition, and the reports of ex-Treasurer Wyman were proved correct in every instance. There was a discrepancy of two cents reported in the count of the cash room, as missing from a package of pennies, but this was shown, on a recount, to be incorrect. The missing pennies were subsequently found on the floor, where they had dropped during the progress of the count.

The President Received the Mormon Delegation on May 13th at the White House, and listened to the reading of the protest adopted by the church which was described in these columns two weeks ago. Mr. Cleveland reminded them that it was his duty to have the Edmunds act faithfully administered as any other law. He promised that such changes as he might make in the commission would be with the view of securing "impartial" administration of the law. Beyond this the delegates obtained no concession. To the President they said that that was all they wanted, but to a reporter subsequently they said that they wanted the President to remove the present commissioners, appointed under the Edmunds law, and to appoint new men of high character, who would make an impartial and thorough investigation of affairs in Utah and report the truth. The present commissioners had gone there with a mission, and not to confine themselves to the duties prescribed by the law creating it. It is possible that the present commission may be removed and new men appointed, but the Mormons will gain nothing if the new men are of high character, because men of that type will make it their first duty to enforce the law, which is precisely the trouble with the present commissioners. The men who would be popular with the Mormons are men of low character, who could be bribed or intimidated into connivance with their transgressions of the law. President Cleveland will be very ill-advised if he sends to Utah commissioners of that character.

The New Rule Adopted by the Secretary of the navy is working disastrously for Mr. John Roach, the builder of the Dolphin. That vessel has not yet been accepted. Two trial trips have been made, but each has been a failure, and repairs are needed already. This is the old story with which the people are familiar, and is part of the system of which Congress took cognizance when it refused appropriations while Mr. Robeson was in power on the naval committee. Mr. Whitney's requirement is that before he accepts the Dolphin she shall steam for six consecutive hours. On her second trial trip she went ahead for an hour and a half only. Mr. Whitney's demand does not seem unreasonable. If he remains firm and is as careful in other matters, there will be no difficulty in obtaining appropriations from Congress, and the United States may yet have a navy worthy the name.

The Epidemic at Plymouth, Pa., Appears to have spent its force. The new cases occur less rapidly and with less virulence. Three experts from the Board of Health of New York City visited Plymouth last week with the view of investigating the epidemic and endeavoring to trace its causes. They report the sanitary condition of the town as exceedingly bad—that, in fact, all the laws of health have been set at defiance. The town is favorably situated for sanitary purposes, but the advantages of its site have been neglected. As to the immediate cause of the epidemic, the experts appear to agree with the local physicians in their opinion that it was caused by impure water, which the water company turned into the mains when the mountain stream, that is the usual supply for most of the town, gave out, or to the loosening of the mountain stream by thaw during the last week of March. It was conceded that the flood from the mountain stream had swept into the reservoirs refuse from a house near the head of the stream, in which lay a typhoid patient. Dr. Edson is quite sure that this refuse was sufficient to impregnate with germs a much larger body of water than was swept into the reservoir by the flood. These facts convey a warning to other cities that should not be unheeded.

General Middleton's Attack on the Half-Breeds of the Northwest at Batouche, on May 11th, was successful. It commenced with a duel of artillery, in which the Canadian troops, while inflicting severe injury, suffered considerable loss. Many gallant officers fell. After a continuous fire of several hours, General Middleton ordered an advance, and the half-breeds were charged at the point of the bayonet. There was some fierce fighting, but in the end the position was carried and Riel and his followers fled. On Friday, May 15th, three scouts brought Riel into General Middleton's camp. They had found him in the brush not far from Batouche. He claimed that he was on his way to give himself up. It is expected that this will end the war as far as the half-breeds are concerned. What Big Bear and his tribe will do is not clear, but it is evident that the rebellion is broken. There is much resentment felt against Riel, especially by people who have lost relatives in the war, but he is well protected. He will be tried by court-martial.

A New Vote of Censure on the British Premier was moved in the House of Commons on May 11th, but was defeated by a majority of thirty votes. Technically the motion was to refuse appropriations until the Cabinet had fully disclosed its foreign policy. At the commencement of the debate, explanations were made by Mr. Gladstone and the Marquis of Hartington. The former announced that two cabinet officers representing England and two diplomatists representing Russia had arrived at an agreement on the Afghan question which was satisfactory to the English Cabinet and to Lord Dufferin, the Viceroy of India, and which had been sent to Russia for Imperial consideration. Lord Hartington stated that the Government had finally decided to evacuate the Soudan and abandon the project of besieging Khartoum to punish Gordon's murderers; but that Suakim would be retained and defended against the Arabs either by England or some civilized Power, for military reasons. These explanations partly disarmed the Conservative motion, which was based on the reticence of the Government. The motion, however, was not withdrawn, and on a vote being taken, it was defeated. The Parnellites voted against Mr. Gladstone. Leaving them out of consideration, their votes being cast for personal reasons unaffected by the question at issue, Mr. Gladstone was sustained by a majority of fifty-five.

The Convention Negotiated Between the English Government and Baron De Staal, and M. Lessar, the Russian Envoy, was the subject of numerous cable dispatches last week. It was reported that it was unsatisfactory to the Czar and his council, who wished the frontier between Afghanistan and Asiatic Russia to be drawn at a point further south than that agreed upon, thus giving Russia a strip of Afghan territory. This objection, although it was irritating to the British Government, was not thought sufficiently important to justify a rupture between the two countries. A further stipulation on the part of Russia is, however, more serious. It is that Russia shall not be bound to observe the frontier limit if tribal disturbances break out. This is a grave question, because Russian envoys may easily stir up broils, and so afford an excuse at any time for an advance of the Russian army still further into Afghan territory. It is believed in Europe that the Russian Government wished for war especially since Mr. Gladstone's conciliatory bearing became marked, from which it was inferred that England was unprepared for war.

The Coercion Laws for Ireland are to be Renewed. It was expected that the Radical members of the British Cabinet would succeed in their opposition to them, but the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland and his aristocratic colleagues strenuously demanded the continuance of the extraordinary powers of arrest, and Mr. Gladstone has yielded. He announced in the House of Commons on Friday that he would ask Parliament to pass a remodelled law on the principle of the Act known as the "Crimes" law. He also expressed his regret that several measures of a conciliatory character, which he named, would have to be postponed for a future session. The decision has caused much dissatisfaction among the Irish members, and they will probably vote with the Conservatives during the remainder of the session.

How English Workmen Feel about the war with Russia may be inferred from a letter one of them addressed to the Pall Mall Gazette, which is the only first class journal that has vigorously opposed the war fever. He says: "I beseech you that the voice of the toiler, however feeble, may be heard at this supreme crisis in the history of our country. A war with Russia means the slaughter of many thousands of British lives and the expenditure of, may be, fifty millions of British money, and these lives and that money will mainly have to be provided by the lowly workers of the nation. Trade will be demoralized in every level, society generally will be disorganized; but it is the poor men and women who are living from hand to mouth in the back streets of London, the wretched laborers in our fields, and the poorly paid and ill-employed workmen in all the towns of the kingdom, who will feel the great pinch of the terrible conflict—it is they chiefly who will have to both pay and weep. And why? Because (at the worst) a hot-headed Russian soldier has brought his men into collision with an armed body of Afghans boiling for a fight. The toilers of Britain and the toilers of Russia have no quarrel; why should the affairs of a miserable little State of Central Asia be permitted to make them enemies, and cause them to expend their earnings and their blood in needless conflict against each other?"

The International Conference on Holiness and Faith Healing, to be held in London next month, is attracting much attention on both sides the Atlantic. Full details respecting it, and a cordial invitation to American friends, appeared in this journal on April 30th. We are informed that the Rev. R. L. Stanton, D.D., author of "Gospel Parallelisms" and other works, is one of the American visitors expected to take part in the conference. The proceedings cannot fail to be of a most interesting and instructive character. The extensive experience of the managers of Bethshan, and the information which visitors from this side are able to afford, should lead to increased interest in the movement, which is certainly one of the most remarkable of these times.

The Twenty-Sixth Annual Convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of the United States and Canada was in session last week at Atlanta, Ga. Major Joseph Hardie, of Selma, Ala., presided. Among the foreign visitors were Mr. Kennedy, Secretary of the London Association; Mr. Phildens, of the Berlin Association; Count Pinckler, of Berlin, and Mr. Hodder, of London, all of whom delivered brief addresses. Mr. Brainerd presented the report of the International Committee, showing that eight hundred and fifty associations reported one hundred and twelve thousand members, seventeen thousand active members on committees, and nearly four hundred young men's Bible-classes. The associations own $4,300,000 worth of property.

A Series of Meetings was Held at Hartford, Conn., last week, from which much good is expected in the way of promoting harmonious action among the churches. Its title is "The American Congress of Churches," but it was not designed to have the legislative functions of a Congress, but rather, by consultation and the interchange of friendly greetings, to draw into closer union, believers of various denominations, and to stimulate all to greater activity in the service of our common Master. Many distinguished professors and preachers took part in the meetings. The arrangements were under the charge of a council of twenty-five, composed of clergy and laity of as many churches. An executive committee of seven, chosen from its membership, was instructed "to make arrangements for an annual public meeting, and to conduct its various sessions in such a manner as to further the interests of Christianity." The Congress was pledged to take no notes of the questions presented, and none of them were submitted to a vote.

Mr. Ben Hogan, the Converted Pugilist, is now laboring in St. Louis, Mo., where his name is well known in sporting circles. It was in 1873 that Mr. Hogan was last in St. Louis, where he went to arrange for a prize fight which took place subsequently in Omaha. Mr. Hogan's antagonist on that occasion is now a saloon-keeper in St. Louis, and efforts were made to have the services in his large room, but they failed, the proprietor being even more antagonistic to Mr. Hogan in his new character than he was to him in his former one. We are informed that the services are, however, very largely attended, and hopes are entertained that much good will be effected.

The Loss of Railroad-Nerve was the Reason assigned by a traveller for his protracted residence in a place where he was neither happy nor prosperous. To a friend who asked him why he did not go around as usual, he said: "I have lost my railroad-nerve. Up to about a year ago I felt almost as safe on a railway train as I did in a hotel, but since that time, for some cause or other, I have become morbidly apprehensive of railroad accidents, and now when travelling I fret and worry all the time. I can't rest in a sleeper any more. Many a time I have lain awake all night, and I sometimes become so agitated that I leave my berth and walk the aisle for an hour at a time." "You should conquer your fears," said his friend. "When I step on a train I consider that my fate is in the hands of others—that worry or fret will not avail one particle to help me in case of trouble—and I sleep almost as well in a Pullman or a Wagner as I do in my own bed." "I have tried to reason myself out of my fears," was the response, "but I can't." It appears that this state of mind is not uncommon, but often comes to men who have been accustomed to travel extensively. Doubtless this state of mind in which the sufferer is beset by forebodings and vague fear, is produced in many cases by physical causes which yield to medical treatment, but it is a most miserable condition. We are told in the Bible that God sometimes sends such a state of fear upon men in chastisement (Levit. 26: 36).

A Narrow Escape from Death in a Sewer occurred in Philadelphia a few days ago. A gang of men were repairing the main sewer in Willow Street, when a heavy rain-storm came on, flooding the streets. The men were only two blocks from the river, so that the current from the branch sewers increases in volume largely, and suddenly before it arrived at the place where they were. A cry of warning was raised, and there was a general rush to the street above. As one of the men reached the place of safety he looked back and saw the man with whom he had been working still in the sewer. "Jimmy, Jimmy," he called, "get out quick." "I'll come in a minute," was the response. In less than half a minute a solid wall of water four feet high was upon him and carried him helplessly down the sewer. His comrades ran to the bank of the Delaware expecting to see his mangled corpse borne into the river; but happily he had seized a plank near him, to which he had clung, and the water shot him out fifty feet into the stream like a stone from a catapult, and he was rescued uninjured. It was a Providential escape such as seldom follow an unheeded warning. Too often the delay of a minute in a time of danger is fatal. How many men forget that fact when they are being urged to fly from the wrath to come? (Prov. 1: 24-29).

Twelve Thousand Dollars or a Mother, was the cruel alternative placed before a child recently by a citizen of Brooklyn, N. Y. He and his wife quarrelled and separated. The divorce court awarded their only child, a little girl, to the care of the mother, and for five years the child has resided with her mother. Recently, however, the father desired to obtain possession of the child, and being wealthy, he offered her a bribe, trusting to the mother's regard for her child's interests to insure her consent. He proposed to maintain his daughter, complete her education, and settle $12,000 upon her if she would leave her mother and give herself up to him, the mother renouncing all claim upon her. The woman was in poverty, and after a severe struggle, in which both mother and daughter suffered mental torture, the father's offer was accepted. The same course is sometimes taken by men in reference to their Heavenly Father. The prospect of wealth which may be acquired by unrighteousness is too great a temptation for them to resist, and they seize the worldly advantage at the cost of their privilege of sonship (Heb. 12: 16).

How a Debtor was Delivered by a Bird is related in the Youth's Companion by Dr. Krummacker, the well-known author of "Elisha the Tishbite," and other works. Dr. Krummacker says that in his neighborhood lived a poor man who was much distressed by a small debt he was unable to pay. He was sitting at his door gloomily considering his difficulty, and expecting momentarily the arrival of the sheriff's officer, when he noticed a little bird fluttering about and uttering plaintive cries, as if in distress; suddenly it flew over his head and took refuge in his house. The man closed the door, caught the bird, and placed it in an empty cage, where it sang very sweetly. Soon he heard a knock at the door. "There is the officer," said the man. But it was not the officer; it was the servant of a wealthy lady living near who had lost her bird, and hearing from the neighbors that one had flown into the house, sent to see if it was hers. It proved to be the bird sought, and in a few minutes the servant returned, saying how grateful her mistress was for the recovery of her pet, and begged his acceptance of a small present. Opening the little package the man found just the amount of his debt. When the officer came the money was placed in his hand with the words, "Here is your money; God has sent it to me." Evidently the poor debtor had too much piety and good sense to call his deliverance a coincidence (Ps. 34: 19).

The Destruction of a Child's Carriage Caused some bitter tears a few days ago. At Middletown, Conn., there is a dangerous railroad crossing, over which on May 10th a child strayed, drawing after her a little carriage with her doll in it. A train was approaching at full speed, and the little girl's death seemed inevitable, for the engineer saw her too late to stop the train. The child escaped, but the doll-carriage was struck by the pilot and knocked into splinters, whereat the child sat down and cried bitterly. The child might be excused for crying when she should have rejoiced; she was too young to realize the danger from which she had escaped as if by a miracle. Probably when the children of God recall their past lives in the clearer light which eternity will shed upon them, they will see that the tears they shed on earth over their losses and bereavements were very much like the child's tears, which ought rather to have been praises (Ezek. 14: 10, 11).

A Judge's Reminiscences Caused Some Amusement in a New York court last week. An indignant policeman had arrested two boys for practical joking. They had taken their stand the previous night on an empty cart in the street, and attaching one end of a string to the house opposite, and holding the other end in their hands, they were able to twitch the hats off the heads of passers-by as they stepped along the sidewalk between the house and the cart. They tried the trick successfully, among others on the policeman, whose temper was not proof against this outrage on his dignity, and he arrested them. The judge reprimanded the boys and fined them, but after they had been led out of court, he burst into a roar of laughter. Turning to the policeman, he said: "I've done that old string trick scores of times myself, and you don't know what fun there is in it." The judge must have felt some compunction in punishing the lads, but he evidently considered it his duty in the interests of society, and he was right. Even human judges recognize the principle that wrong-doing cannot go unpunished with safety, though they may sympathize with the sinner; yet people often ask why a righteous God could not have forgiven sin without an atonement (Rom. 3: 21, 22).

A Horse's Compassion for its Mate is Described by its owner, who had a carriage accident at Harvard, Mass., last February. He was attempting to cross the Nashua River on the ice, and had reached a point nearly in the middle of the river, when he came upon thin ice, and he and the carriage and two horses were immersed in the freezing water. The man scrambled out, and with the aid of some men who came to his assistance, succeeded in rescuing one of the horses. The animal was in such a chilled condition that its hind limbs refused to support its body for some time, and it was left on the bank while the men went to work to recover the other horse. By and by the horse on the bank recovered the use of its limbs, and as soon as he was able to move about he looked off to the cold current from which he had escaped, and seeing the other horse still in the water he went down to the very edge of the river and whinnied in a pitiful way. The horse's concern was pathetic though useless, but the newly saved soul may profitably consider the incident. He has not yet received the spirit of Christ if he does not make it his first concern to look after those who are in the same danger from which he has been delivered (John 1: 41).

A GREAT GOSPEL FOR GREAT SINNERS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners; of whom I am chief, etc."—1 TIMOTHY 1:15-17.

A Seasonable Connection—The Narrative and the Inference—Testimony with a Man Behind it—I. Who are Chief Sinners?—Paul One of a Regiment—Persecutors and Scoffers—Preliminary—Men Guilty of Gross Sins—Blasphemy and Lewd Speaking—The Swearer's Prayers—Sinners Against Light—Against the Holy Spirit—Waterlogged by Sin—Those who Lead Others to Sin—II. Why the Chief of Sinners are Often Saved—Christ's Relations Among them—Paul Like a Proof Engraving—III. What they Say when they are Saved—The Immediate and Continuous Praise.

WHEN Paul wrote this ever-memorable text, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners," he placed it in connection with himself. I would have you carefully notice the context. The apostle had spoken of himself, and then it was that the Holy Spirit put it into his mind to write of the glorious salvation of which he was so notable a subject. Truly it was a seasonable and suggestive connection in which to place this glorious Gospel text. What he preached to others was to be seen in himself. When I read to you the story of Saul's conversion, suppose I had finished it by making the remark, "This is a faithful saying, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners," you would all have said, "That is true, and it is a natural inference from the narrative." Such a remark would have served as the moral of the whole story. It is an easy and from such a connection, that Christ Jesus must have come into the world to save sinners. See, then, why Paul uttered it in this particular place. He could not help bringing his own case forward; but when he did bring it forward it was to add emphasis to this declaration that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners. The Lord likes His servants to have such an experience that their testimony shall have a man at the back of it. He would have their lives sustain and explain their testimonies. When Paul said that Christ came into the world to save sinners, his own conversion, his own joy in the Lord, were proof positive of it. He was a witness who had tasted and handled the good Word of life to which he witnessed.

But, beloved, if we have not Paul in our midst to bear his personal witness we have still we have indisputable evidence in those that are still about us that it "is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." I could summon to this pulpit scores who were literally the blackest of transgressors, but they are washed, and sanctified, and so they are living arguments of the Lord's power to save. Many also are now present who could not be numbered by their fellow-men among the chief of sinners in certain aspects of the case, yet they most willingly put themselves down as the chief of sinners under some other way of viewing it, and they bear their testimony, as I do now, that Jesus is able to save unto the uttermost.

The run of thought at this time will be, first, concerning those who are the chief of sinners; secondly, we will inquire why God has saved them; and thirdly, what they say when they are saved.

I. First, then,

WHO ARE THE CHIEF of sinners? Paul says that he was the chief. I think, however, that he was only one of the regiment. There are different classes of sinners, and some are greater and some less. All men are truly sinners, but all men are not equally sinners. They are all in the mire; but they have not all sunk to an equal depth in it. It is true they have all fallen deep enough to perish in sin, unless the grace of God prevent; yet there are differences in the degrees of guilt, and there will doubtless be differences in the degrees of punishment.

Some are the chief of sinners in the same way as the Apostle Paul, for they have persecuted the Church of God. Paul, who was then called Saul, had given his vote against Stephen; and when Stephen was stoned, he kept the clothes of them that murdered him. He felt that blood lying upon his soul long afterward, and he bemoaned it. Yet this was MERELY A BEGINNING.

Saul was like a leopard, who, having once tasted blood, must always have his tongue in it. His very breath was threatening, and his delight was slaughter. He harassed the people of God; he made great havoc of the saints; he compelled them, he says, to blaspheme; he had them beaten in the synagogues, driven from city to city, and even put to death. This must have remained upon his heart as a dark memory, even after the Lord Jesus Christ had fully forgiven him. This matter of deadly persecution placed Saul head and shoulder above other sinners. This was the top-stone of the pyramid of his sin, "because I persecuted the Church of Christ."

But you can go very near to this; in all probability certain of you have done so. That husband who has threatened his wife so bitterly if she obeys her conscience, that man who has discharged his servant for no other reason but his fidelity to Christ, that landlord who has turned out his cottager from his home because he held a religious service beneath his roof, that man who has wilfully and maliciously slandered a servant of God, not because he did him any harm, but because he cannot bear to hear of any truly following after Christ—these are the people who must be reckoned among the chief of sinners. They have done no murder, but they have gone as far as they dare to go, and their heart is full of venom against the people of God; this is

A GRIEVOUS CRIME.

Though it may seem a very small thing to grieve a pious child, or to vex a poor, godly woman, God does not think it so. He remembers jests and scoffs levelled at his little ones, and he bids those who indulge in them to take heed. You had better offend a king than one of the Lord's little ones. That poor man in the workshop, who has so hard a time of it with your jests and chaff, has a Friend in the heavens. I know this, that many patient men will bear a great deal, but if you strike their children, their blood is up, and they will not have it. A father will not stand by to see his child abused, and the Great Father above is as tender and fond as any other father. Is the God of nature without natural affection? I trow not. You shall rue the day, sir, in which you took up arms against the people of God. Humble yourself before God on account of it, otherwise you will be numbered among the chief of sinners, and the chief of punishments shall be meted out to you.

Further, among the chief of sinners we must of course reckon those who are guilty of the coarser and grosser sins. I will not occupy a moment in mentioning what they are, for it is a shame even to speak of them. God keep us from unchastity and dishonesty—from any one of those sins which are censurable even under the head of common morality; for, if not—if we indulge in these—we shall certainly come by them to be numbered among the chief of sinners. I must, however, mention because these are unhappily far too common. Does a man think that he can go on damning his own body and soul in so many words, and never provoke the Lord to anger? Does he dream that he can use foul and filthy words, and wicked oaths, without incurring sin? I believe that these things bring the blackest guilt on the conscience; for God has expressly said that He will by no means hold him guiltless that taketh His name in vain. It is true of every sin that God will not hold a man guiltless who does it; but it is especially said about this sin, because men are apt to fancy that words are of no great importance, or that God takes no notice thereof. Even the thoughtless or trifling repetition of the name of the Lord involves great sin, for thus a man taketh the sacred name in vain. Yet men trifle with that name in common conversation, and that with fearful frequency.

BLASPHEMY AND LEWD SPEAKING,

There is no excuse for this wanton wickedness, because it brings neither profit nor pleasure to the person who so offends. What practical end can it serve? As George Herbert said long ago,

"Lust and wine plead a pleasure, avarice gain;
But the cheap swearer through this open sluice
Lets his soul run for nought, as little fearing Were I an Epicure, I could bate swearing."

I am unable to frame an excuse for profane language; it is needless, wilful wickedness. Men talk so far to horrify us; they chill our blood with fear lest God should take them at their word; and all for nothing at all. It will be an awful thing for the man who used profane imprecations to find out at last that his prayers were heard, and that they will be answered.

Now, dear friends, there are other chiefs among sinners who do not go in for these grosser sins at all. Let me mention them, for in this line I shall have to place myself and many of you. These are among the chief of sinners who have sinned and against the influences of holy instruction, and gracious example. Children of godly parents, who have been brought up and instructed in the fear of God from their youth, are among the chief of sinners if they turn aside from the way of life. When they transgress, there is a heavy weight about their fault, this is not to be found in the common sin of the children of the slums, or the Arabs of the gutter. I remember how this came home to my heart when I was convinced of my sin. I had not engaged in any of the grosser vices, but then I had not been tempted to them, but had been carefully guarded from vicious influences. But I lamented that I had been disobedient to my parents, proud in spirit, forgetful of God's commands; I knew better—knew better from the very first, and this put me in my own estimation among the chief of sinners. It had cost me much to do evil, for I had sinned against the clearest light. Especially is this the case when the possession of knowledge is accompanied by much tenderness of conscience.

Especially is it a grievous offence to sin against the gentle checking of the Holy Spirit. Have you not been sad offenders upon this point? You felt the other Sunday night that if you could once get out of the chapel, and get home, you would bow the knee in prayer; but you did not. You have felt like that many times, and you have shaken off the feeling; and now a sermon scarcely moves you; it had need be full of thunder and lightning to make you turn a hair. Truths which used to make you shake from head to foot scarcely affect you now. Take care, I pray you; for he that sins against the Holy Ghost may find himself so as to be no longer able to move his vessel toward the shores of salvation. Nothing hardens like the Gospel when it is long trifled with. To lie asoak in the truth without receiving it into the heart is sure destruction. To die on holy ground is to die indeed. God grant that it may not be so with any here!

I think that I must put down those among the chief of sinners who have led others into sin. Ah, this is a sad, sad, sad, sad subject! If you have led others astray, if you yourself seek the Lord, and are saved, yet you cannot save them. If it be young persons whom you have polluted with evil, you cannot take the wretched stain out of their minds. You can leave off sowing the devil's seed, but you cannot gather up what you have sown, nor prevent its growing and ripening. It is an awful fact that there may be souls in hell whom you have sent there! It was a wise penitential prayer of a converted man who had exercised influence for evil, "Lord, forgive me my other men's sins." A bad example, a lewd expression, an unholy life, may be the means of drawing others down to perdition; and those that destroy others, and so are soul-murderers, are among the chief of sinners.

Especially must I rank him among the chief of sinners who has preached falsehood, who has denied the deity of Christ, who has undermined the inspiration of Scripture, who has struggled against the faith, fought against the atonement, and done evil even as he could in the scattering of scepticism. He must take his place among the ringleaders in diabolical mischief; he is a master destroyer, a chosen apostle of the prince of darkness. Oh, that he might be brought by sovereign grace to be among the foremost teachers of that faith which hitherto he has destroyed!

I shall not say more upon this mournful matter, for, indeed, I have only mentioned these examples in the hope that some here present may confess, "I am sorry to say that the preacher means me. Under some aspect or other I must take my place among the chief of sinners."

II. Now, secondly, why are the chief of sinners so

OFFEN SAVED?

The Lord Jesus Christ, when He went into heaven, took with Him one of the chief of sinners as a companion; the dying thief entered Paradise the self-same day as our Lord. After our Lord Jesus had gone to heaven, so far as I know, He never did save more than one person by His own immediate instrumentality; and that one person was this very Apostle Paul, who has given us our text. To him our Lord spoke personally from heaven, saying, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" To him He revealed Himself by the way, and called him to be His apostle, even to this man who truthfully called himself the chief of sinners. It is wonderful to think that it should be so; but grace delights in dealing with great and glaring sin, and putting away the crying crimes of great offenders.

The Lord Jesus not only saved the chief of sinners, but He was

by blood. Look through the long line of our Lord's genealogy. You know that doctrine, the last invention of Rome, concerning the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary. I am going to tell you a doctrine which is about as far apart from that as the east is from the west. In the genealogy of our blessed Lord we find the names of certain of the chief of sinners. Three women especially hold a position in it, who were each notorious for sin. Not many women are mentioned, but among the first is Tamar, guilty of incest. The next is Rahab the harlot, and a third is Bathsheba the adulteress. This is a crooked pedigree, an ancestral tree whose branches are more than a little gnarled and twisted. Such sinners as these are in the genealogy of the Saviour of sinners. "He was numbered with the transgressors." He was called "The Friend of publicans and sinners." It was said of Him, "This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them." Still He delights to save great sinners. Oh, my hearer, it will delight Him to save you!

Why does He do it? The apostle says, in the sixteenth verse, "For this cause I obtained mercy, that in me first Jesus Christ might show forth all long-suffering." What, is that His reason for saving a sinner? It is that He may show in that sinner His long-suffering, revealing His patience and forgiveness. Ought you not to be encouraged, if you feel yourself greatly guilty, that God delights to show forth all His patience by saving great sinners? Will you not at once seek that all long-suffering may be shown in your case? Believe on the Lord Jesus, and it shall be so.

And what does Paul say next? He says that the Lord saved him for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on Him to life everlasting. For a pattern. It means for a type or specimen. Paul was a "proof before letters." The first prints of an engraving are sharp and clear, and therefore they are very valuable; they exhibit the productive power of the plate at its highest point, before the surface is worn down in the least degree. Paul was one of the proof-engravings taken off the plate in the earliest days, and under the most favorable circumstances for bringing out every line of grace. All God's long-suffering was seen in him for a pattern. I would to God that we could put some of you under that same engraved plate, and issue more impressions at this very hour; for the plate is not worn out; the now is as new as ever. A grand edition of the Work of Love was issued before Paul was printed off, and published; I refer to the time when Peter preached at Pentecost. Many large and splendid editions have been issued from that press since. I see before me a whole library that God has printed in this house—the proofs that God has taken of late years from the old standing type; but Paul stands at the head of the list as a fine first proof of what God can do. Then God can save me. I came to that conclusion a year ago, and putting it to the test, I found it true. Dear fellow-sinners, come to the same conclusion!

"Oh, but I have indulged in such horrible vices." This is a sad confession, but it does not doom you to despair, for the blood of Jesus washes away the worst of filth. Blasphemers, adulterers, drunkards, thieves—such, "Oh, ye saints—such were some of you, but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified," and why should not others of like character be washed and sanctified too?

III. I must close by dwelling a moment on the third head, which is this—What the chief of sinners say when they are saved.

WHAT THEY SAY

is recorded in the text. It reads like a hymn: "Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honor and glory forever and ever. Amen." See, the first word is "Now." As soon as ever they are saved they begin praising the Lord. They cannot endure to put off glorifying God. Some one might whisper to them, "You will praise God when you get to heaven." "No," replies the gracious soul, "I am going to praise Him now. Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, be glory forever and ever." Grateful love cannot be restrained, it is like fire in the bones. Our heart would break for love if it could not find a means of expressing itself at once.

Does another person whisper, "When you praise God, do not be too long about it. Leave off as soon as you have moderately praised and adored. Do not be forever engaged in the work of praise." "No," says the saved man, "I cannot have done while life lasts—To Him be honor and glory forever and ever."

To Him be honor and glory forever and ever. Amen. Unto Him be glory on earth and glory in heaven, honor from all of us poor imperfect beings, and glory from us when He shall have made us perfectly meet to behold His face. Come, lift up your hearts, ye saved ones! Begin at once the songs which shall never cease. The saints shall never have done singing, for they remember that they were sinners. Come, poor sinner, out of the depths extol Him who descended into the depths for you! Chief of sinners, adore Him who is to you the Chief among ten thousand, and the Altogether Lovely! You black sinners, who have gone to the very brink of damnation by your abominable sins, rise to the utmost heights of enthusiastic joy in Jesus your Lord! Put your trust in the Lord Jesus Christ, and all manner of sin and of blasphemy shall be forgiven unto you; and at the receipt of such a pardon you shall burst out into new-made doxologies to God your Saviour. "Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord; though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." Oh ye guiltiest of the guilty, the Apostle Paul speaks to you, and stands before you as the bearer of of mercy. Surrender to the King eternal, and there is pardon for you, and deliverance from the wrath to come. Thirty-five years Paul lived in sin. Twenty years after that, when he was older than I am, he wrote these words, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners; of whom I am chief." Is there not some thirty-five-years' old fellow here to-night who had better turn over a new leaf? Is there not some woman here of that age who has had more than enough of sin? Is it not time that you turned unto the Lord and found a new and better life? Turn them, Lord; turn them, and they shall be turned! Make them live and they shall live unto Thee, world without end. Amen and Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

THE CROSS AND THE DRAGON;

or, Light in the Broad East. By Rev. B. C. Henry, ten years a missionary in Canton. Mr. Henry is connected with the Presbyterian Mission, but he does not confine his attention to the operations of that particular society. His object, which he faithfully follows throughout his extremely interesting work, is to give a full account of the progress of Christianity in China, and he is careful to give credit to all denominations and to unsectarian efforts for Christ in that land. The dragon is the national emblem of China, hence the title of his book. Apart from the religious character of the book, there is in it a very large amount of information about the country, the government, and the manners and customs of the people, which is wonderfully interesting. Mr. Henry has been a close observer, and he has the faculty of grouping his observations in a manner that arrests attention. His work is planned necessarily from a Christian standpoint, but people not interested in missions cannot fail to be charmed by the vivid descriptions he gives of life in China, while the earnest Christian, whose heart is in his prayer that God would give His Son the heathen for His inheritance, will rejoice in the accounts here given of the progress being made in that benighted land.

No better way of showing the character of this valuable work can be adopted in the space at our disposal than that of citing the subjects of the chapters. They are the following: The Broad East and its Population; Facilities for Reaching the People; Some Characteristics of the People; Confucius and Confucianism; Buddhism in China; Taoism; Ancestral Worship and Geomancy; Feasts, Pastimes, and Folk-lore; A Sketch of Canton Missions in the East; Present Status of Mission Work; Foreign Agents; Preaching by Missionaries; Educational Work; Medical Work; Work for Women; Work for Orphans and Outcasts; Native Agents; The Native Christians; Trials of Converts; Tests of Faith; Christian Giving and Self-support; Criticisms of Travellers and Roman Catholic Missions; Teaching English; A Christian College for Canton; The Present Outlook; Advance into the Interior. As will be seen from this list, Mr. Henry completely covers the ground and supplies a vast amount of information about the Celestial Kingdom which will render clear to the minds of his readers much that has hitherto been incomprehensible in secular news, as well as in missionary records. excellent map, a picture of a Chinese interior, and of Chinese idols in the temple, and portraits of the minister and elders of his church add to the value of his work. Pp. 483. Price $2. Published by Messrs. Anson D. F. Randolph & Company, 900 Broadway, New York.

A MINISTERING ANGEL.

"It was a poor room on the highest floor of a great tenement house," said a city missionary, describing his day's round of visits, "but if ever I saw a ministering angel, I saw one there. There were two children, a boy and a girl, whose pinched, hungry look went to one's heart. They were gazing eagerly at a loaf of bread and a plate of cooked meat, which a girl, not much more than a child herself, had just produced from her basket. It was a sight not easily forgotten. Those two children were being led out of the scanty earnings of the girl who lived in the next room to them in that miserable attic, and who worked all day in a hat factory. It was the old story: a drunken father, no mother—she had worked herself to death a year ago—and no friend but this solitary girl. 'I have no mother myself, sir,' she said simply, 'and I can feel for the poor things.' 'The Lord will repay you,' was all I could say. He who noticed the widow's mites cast into the treasury surely saw that girl's sacrifice and will regard it."

LED BY A CHILD.

"AIN't you glad you came, father?" said a little girl, looking up into the face of a working-man as the two were making their way down the aisle of a church at the conclusion of service.

The man's reply could not be heard. He spoke in a low tone, but as he stooped and kissed the little girl it was evidently a reply likely to be satisfactory to her.

A Christian gentleman who was present noticed the little incident and inferred that it might possibly afford an opportunity for usefulness. He followed the father and daughter out of church, and as soon as they were clear of the crowd he joined them.

"Saw you in church," he said; "I hope you'll come again. We are always glad to see strangers. They become friends sometimes."

"You are very kind, sir, and I don't know but I'll come. Jennie has set her heart on my being a regular church-goer. That has not been my line so far, but she gets her way generally now." The man sighed heavily and continued, "She is our only child now. We had another six years older, but she died a month ago. She was a real good girl, sir, and it seems she made her little sister here promise to never leave off trying till she got me to church. She often tried herself, poor girl, but never succeeded. I wish she had now; I'd give a good deal if I had the chance of giving her a bit of pleasure."

"This is the next best thing you can do. Besides, you can learn here how you can be sure of meeting your lost daughter again."

"Ah, sir!" said the man, "that is too much to hope. I am not the kind of lumber to make a Christian of."

"You are mistaken there, my friend. You are just the kind, if you will let the Master try."

They had by this time reached the home of the father and daughter, and having received a promise for the next Sunday, their new friend bade them good-by. He went home to pray for that father's conversion—a prayer which, some months afterward, was graciously answered.

If a disciple of Ruskin were asked to describe the man and his teachings in a few words, he would probably say, and say truly, that he is, above all things, a hater of lies of all kinds, a valorous antagonist of shams and hypocrisies, and a most implacable enemy of selfishness, idleness, and vice.

Running through all his works is this strong current of individuality. Whether he writes on art, or science, or ethics, these principles manifest themselves. He would have his readers true men, industrious, earnest, kind; and he seeks to attract them to the true and the beautiful with a gentle persuasion which never wavers, but which is mingled with scorching, withering words when he describes what is base and unworthy. His teachings are an application to the world of to-day of the apostolic injunction to think of, or strive after, "whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, and whatsoever things are of good report" (Phil. 4:8).

This characteristic is seen sometimes in a startling manner and in the strangest surroundings. In writing of metals in his "Ethics of the Dust," in connection with a remark about the epithet "ugly," as applied to some of them, he says: "You ought to be glad in thinking how much more beauty God has made than human eyes can ever see, but not glad in thinking how much more evil man has made than his own soul can ever conceive, much more than his hands can ever heal." That is a strange passage to meet in the midst of a lecture on gold, silver, iron, and crystals. Yet such passages are frequent in Mr. Ruskin's works, and they are not labored, but strictly congruous to his subject in hand, and always beautiful and true. One other passage from the same work will serve to illustrate this quality. Describing the difference in crystals, and noting that an absolutely pure crystal is rare, and that impurities are contracted in their formation, he says: "The crystal must be either dirty or clean—and there's an end. So it is with one's hands, and with one's heart—only you can wash your hands without changing them, but not hearts nor crystals. On the whole, while you are young, it will be as well to take care that your hearts don't want much washing; for they may perhaps need wringing also, when they do." Hundreds of such passages might be quoted, each one full of sound wisdom, pointed, forcible, and practical, indicating the wonderful shrewdness and vigorous common-sense of this great lay preacher. For these we must refer our readers to the books themselves, which are now published at a very low price.

Mr. Ruskin is one of the professors of the University of Oxford, England. His department is that of the fine arts, of which subject he is a recognized master. He is sixty-six years of age, having been born on February 8th, 1819. His father commenced his career burdened with the debts of his father, all of which he paid honestly before he laid by any profit for his own use. Many people called him a fool for paying debts not contracted by himself, but his son, with pardonable pride, has engraved on his tombstone his testimony that "he was an entirely honest merchant." The subject of this sketch studied at Oxford University, where he won a prize for the best poem of his year. He graduated in 1842 and devoted himself to the life of an artist. Since that time he has been continually busy with pen and pencil. In 1843 he published his work on Modern Painters, in which he insisted that the best painter was he who most accurately copied nature as "a glass of rare strength and clearness to let us see more than we could ourselves and bring nature near to us." Among numerous other works written by Mr. Ruskin may be mentioned "The Seven Lamps of Architecture," published in 1849; "The Stones of Venice, in 1851-53;" "Notes on the Construction of Sheepfolds," and "King of the Golden Lives," appeared in 1851; "Two Paths" and "Lectures on Architecture and Painting," in 1854; "Unto this Last," in 1862; "Ethics of the Dust," "Sesame and Lilies," and "Study of Architecture in our Schools," in 1865; "Crown of Wild Olives," and "Queen of the Air," in 1866; and "Aratra Pentelici," in 1872.

Perhaps the best way of becoming acquainted with Mr. Ruskin is through his letters to workmen, the first of which was published on January 1st, 1871, and the last, five months ago. These letters he calls "Fors Clavigera," a title which he thus explains: "Fors is the best part of three good English words—force, fortitude, and fortune. Clava means a club; clava, a key; clavus, a nail or rudder. Cera means, I carry. Clavigera may mean, therefore, either Club-bearer or Nail-bearer; Fors, the Club-bearer, means the strength of Hercules or of Deed; Fors, the Key-bearer, means the strength of Ulysses or Patience; Fors, the Nail-bearer, means the strength of Lycurgus or Law." In these letters he talks familiarly to workmen about their work, their play, their dress, their homes; about government, trades-unions, strikes, and about sobriety, and industry, and a multitude of other subjects in which workmen are interested. We believe "Fors Clavigera" is not yet published here in cheap form.

It would be impossible to form an estimate of the influence Mr. Ruskin has exerted and is still exerting on thought and life. Many have been won by him from lives of shame and meanness to nobleness and virtue, while thousands have been led by him to desire those things, though they fail in attaining them because they strive in their own strength instead of depending on Christ and His almighty power. How much the world needs such teaching as that of Mr. Ruskin every thoughtful man perceives. The one cry that ought to be sounded in the ears of this generation is that continually on Mr. Ruskin's lips—the demand that men be true and honest, and cease to profess to be what they are not. Purity of thought and life, earnest and persistent effort to raise our fellows out of sordid and selfish ways of life, to seek that which is noble and Christlike, is a side of religion too much overlooked in our day, and it is that on which Mr. Ruskin insists with all the earnestness of an ancient Hebrew prophet. For the man and his message we have the most profound respect.

THE JEW'S WARD.

Alone in the World.

WHEN the long sweet days of spring came, with their ruffling winds and bright half-opened leaves dancing in the changeful sunshine, and birds singing merrily from earliest dawn to latest dusk, Carola could not help throwing off some of her sadness. She, too, began to sing; and Matthias, as he sat unoccupied at his new bench, or stood bare-headed in the warm sunbeams, heard her as she moved about the house and garden, and the clear words came to his ear, accustoming it to the name he had so long abhorred. But the time to hate was gone by; his mind was growing duller, and this name no longer stirred him to wrath, uttered as it was by Carola's beloved voice.

A great calm had fallen upon him; a season of perfect rest, blended a little with a feeling of weakness and weariness. His old life had passed quite away, and like a child he was living from day to day merely satisfied with the sound of her voice and the sight of her face, as a child is contented with his mother's presence.

The neighbors came about them a little now the roads were dryer, talking in their loud slow country accents, which suited the old Jew's dulled hearing. They did not know he was a Jew; he was nothing more than a very old man, too infirm to get about. There was no clergyman living within four miles of them, for their cottage was at the furthest corner of a straggling parish, and too remote for being visited. Now and then Carola went to the small chapel in the nearest hamlet, where a service was held on Sunday afternoon; but she could not often leave her grandfather, as Matthias was supposed to be, and no one missed her if she was absent. There was not very much church-going among the scattered population.

By and by the old man's ebbing strength did not allow him to quit his bed. This feebleness came on so gradually that there was no shock in it, either to Carola or himself. He was very old, and the complete change in his mode of life had hastened the end. But Carola did not think that the end was near; the only other old person she had known was her grandmother, who had been bed-ridden many years, and she looked without dismay on the prospect of tending Matthias for years to come. He was very peaceful and happy, lying tranquilly on his bed, and listening to her with a placid smile as she read aloud the Psalms of David the King, or the writings of the Prophets of his own race. He had never possessed an English Bible, and these fragments he had learned of them in Hebrew during his school-days and his middle life when he frequented the synagogue, had passed away from his memory. Now he heard them in his own tongue, and his heart grew full of them. It was too late for him to learn them, or to read them to himself, but Carola was always near at hand and willing to read his favorite passages over and over again, filling the old Jew's feeble mind with the music of them, which he hardly understood, but which he would know better by and by.

"Oh! if you'd only let me read what I love better still!" said Carola, one day, as she turned over the leaves of her Bible, after reading the words, "He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, and we hid as it were our faces from Him; He was despised and we esteemed Him not."

"Ay! read what you love best, Carola, my dear," he answered, looking fondly at her from under his shaggy gray eyebrows, "if it's good for you it'll be good for me. There's something that has made you better than any daughter of my own people that I ever knew. But you mustn't ask me to forsake the Lord God of my fathers."

"No, oh, no!" she replied, fervently; "is He not the Father of us all? Only let me read to you about my Lord?"

With eager and tremulous tones she read to him the story of the Lord's death. She had always shrunk from reading it aloud, so powerfully did it touch her; and as she went on from verse to verse the sorrow and the mystery of it grew upon her, until when she came to the words, "And when they had plaited a crown of thorns, they put it upon His head, and a reed in His right hand; and they bowed the knee before him and mocked Him, saying, Hail, King of the Jews," she could control her faltering voice no longer, and falling down on her knees beside the old Jew's bed, she burst into a passion of tears.

"Why, my Carol! my dear!" he cried, stroking her head with his bent fingers, "do you love Him so? It's a hard thing to read that of one you love. You mustn't read any more of that to me."

"Oh, but I must!" she said, looking up at him through her tears. "You'll never know what my Lord is like till you have heard all about Him. But wasn't He 'despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief?' And listen how they crucified Him."

Matthias listened to the end, gazing at Carola's pale and sorrow-stricken face, as she strove to make her tremulous voice clear and steady. When it was finished she closed the book with a deep-drawn sigh; and he shut his eyes, and lay for a few minutes in silent thought.

"I'm too old to remember," he said at last, "but our wise men and rabbis used to say something about all that; and I've known many Christians, too many Christians; but you are different to them, Carol, and you shall read it over again, if you love it best; and the Lord my God will pardon me if I sin in this matter."

Now Carola was free to read in the New Testament she did so gladly, choosing such passages as she thought least likely to arouse his old prejudices, and putting for the hated name of Jesus Christ the title of "my Lord." It was more grateful to the old Jew's ear, for he seemed to be listening to the history of Carol's Lord, not of Him whom he had been taught to think of as the Jewish impostor, whose name for many centuries had been accursed.

It sounded to him like a very new and very personal narrative, as if Carola was telling him what she had herself seen and heard her Lord do and say. It was more easy to remember and ponder over in the long sleepless hours of the night than the psalms or prophecies; and many a time when Carola was lost to him in sleep, he thought of her Lord going about healing the sick and giving sight to the blind; even raising the dead to life again and forgiving sin. And this benevolent Lord had always spoken of the Lord God Almighty as the Father in heaven. Could not he, Matthias Levi, call God Father?

These thoughts did not trouble him; they seemed to infold him as a sort of sweet and tranquil atmosphere, or as a strain of melody not understood, but soothing away distress. There was another and a better Christianity than that which he had known; but he no longer thought of the past with its evil memories. The days and weeks passed peacefully and happily away; and he felt it was very good for him to lie still and be waited on by Carola.

"You'll be very lonely when I'm gone, my dear," he said one evening after he had made his bed and lifted him back into it, almost as if he was a child again.

"Yes, I shall be lonely," she answered, "only my Lord said just before He died, 'I will not leave you comfortless; I will come to you.' When we lose all we find Him."

"Is that in your book?" he asked.

"Yes," she replied; "and just before that He said, 'In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you.' He is preparing a place for us, Matthias."

"If there be many mansions," he said, feebly,

"perhaps He'll let you and me have a little one together, Carol. I used to be afraid you were lost to me forever."

"Oh, He couldn't let us lose one another!" she answered, smiling.

He fell asleep smiling as she had done, and she watched beside him while he slept. For at last she knew that the end was very near, and the messenger of death might come at any moment. There was sadness, but no distress in her heart; she was sorrowing as those who sorrow not. His death would leave her altogether alone, but she did not dread that. There must be some place for her in the world; some footpath, however narrow and thorny, along which she could follow Christ. She sat with her eyes fastened on the furrowed face of the dying man, recalling the days when she was a child and he had guarded her from the evil that encircled her. At last he woke again, and met her wistful gaze.

"My Carol," he murmured feebly, "I'd like to make you happy before I go away, but I'm afraid to grieve the Lord my God. If your Lord is the Messiah He will pardon me."

"Oh, yes!" she answered eagerly, "He will pardon you."

He closed his eyes again, and lay still for a time talking to himself in faint under-tones. Carola caught a word now and then, and knew he was murmuring in broken sentences, "And now, oh, man! what doth He require of thee but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?"

Once, after a long pause, she heard him whisper, "Our Father which art in heaven." That's a good prayer, Carol." Then he lay silent, dreaming perhaps, for a smile rested on his face; but he woke up with a look of trouble and bewilderment, and spoke in a loud and urgent voice, "There's something I've forgotten," he said; "help me to remember, Carol."

He was struggling to lift himself up, and she raised him in her arms, and laid his white head on her shoulder, speaking to him soothingly, as she would pacify a troubled child.

"Turn my face toward Jerusalem," he whispered, "then I shall remember."

She moved him a little on the bed. The sun was setting, and through the window she could see all the long shadows stretching eastward. Then, with her cheek bent down on his wrinkled forehead, she told him he was facing the city of his forefathers, the Holy City.

"I remember," he cried, in a tone of solemn triumph, "Hear, O Israel; the Lord our God is one Lord!"

Carola laid him down again on his bed, but he spoke no more. Only, as she knelt by him, with his hand in hers, she felt now and then a little pressure of his fingers, growing feebler each time, until it ceased altogether, and she knew that he was gone.

She buried him in the parish churchyard, and the same service was read over him as over her drunken grandfather. It did not occur to Carola that any other mode of burial should be found; and the clergyman of the district church knew nothing of the dead man's religion and nationality. Again she stood by the open grave as the only mourner, and looked down upon the coffin lying in its lonely bed, and listened to the solemn words, "We commit his body to the ground; earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust; in sure and certain hope of the resurrection, to eternal life, through our Lord Jesus Christ." "Matthias has seen his Messiah now," she thought, as the tears ran down her pale cheeks. "God is no respecter of persons," she said to herself as she returned alone to her empty cottage, "but in every nation he that feareth Him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with Him."

And now Carola was utterly alone in the world. The long summer days dragged slowly away; for there was no longer any claim upon her for loving service. It seemed useless to prepare meals when there was no one but herself to sit down to them, and she ate such food as gave her the least trouble, just as she had been wont to snatch a crust of bread in her childhood, eating it in any corner where she could find a seat. A little of the wildness of that time returned to her as she rambled aimlessly about the fields and the rough, uncultured lands, where pollard-trees stood, quaintly misshapen, along the hedgerows. She was living again in her mind through the various changes that had come to her; and in her listless saunterings to and fro, the thought of George Bassett's death began to bear undue terror and depression to her. It was a horrible thing to have borne fatal witness against a fellow-creature.

To go in and out of her house; to lie down and sleep, and to rise up and work only for herself, with no face to look upon, and no voice answering hers, was insupportable to her. Yet she wanted some indication as to what her Lord would have her do. Quite literally she believed the words He had said, "As thou hast sent me into the world, so have I also sent them into the world." She did not think He meant only those disciples who followed Him in His lifetime on earth. She took it for granted that Jesus Christ had sent her into the world; and if so, what was the work He required her to do?

But no sign of His will came to her; and, after a while, she began to frequent the cottages which lay scattered among the fields and lanes. It was a large parish, and the church was a long way off. There was no resident squire or any family wealthy enough to take the lead among the sparse population. The poor barren land was divided into small farms, giving employment to two or three laborers on each, whose wages were low, and whose houses were mere hovels. The best and brightest among the boys and girls deserted their native place as soon as they could earn their own living, leaving behind them the dull and lazy, or those of indifferently character, whose work was done grudgingly, and whose only recreation was drinking bad beer in the dreary and dirty little grog-shops.

Carola tried to go among them as she had gone among the cottagers at Hazelmount, but they were altogether different from those contented and intelligent people. Here she was not made welcome in their comfortless hovels, and her visits were considered an intrusion. She had not any position or authority among them as she had in Hazelmount, and they could not understand any friendly advances made with no thought of personal advantage. Many of them looked upon her suspiciously, as a young woman living alone in a solitary cottage, with no visible means of subsistence. Only the little children and the very aged made friends with her; but her home was too far away for them to visit her, and only in the lanes could she play and talk with them, for in their own dwellings she was treated coldly as a suspicious stranger.

To speak to these people of what her heart was full of only provoked a stare of stupid astonishment or indifference. All that sort of talk was for the parson to say to them on their death-beds as a sort of charm to save them from going to a worse place than even this poor world was to them. It had nothing to do with those who could get through a day's work and draw their scanty wages at the week's end. Even the overworked curate, who conducted the Sunday afternoon services in the small chapel of ease, considered her too open and enthusiastic in her religion for a churchwoman, and half imagined her a Methodist in disguise, though she regularly attended his ministrations now Matthias was gone. There was a mystery about her; and a mystery about a young and pretty woman is always to her discredit.

Carola herself was beginning to feel in her inmost heart this general listlessness and indifference creeping over her. Her soul was melting with heaviness. At Hazelmount the fervid and affectionate response which met more than half-way every effort she made to endear herself to the parents of her scholars, had kept the flame burning very brightly on the altar of her own spirit. Her vivid, joyous sense of the reality of the Lord's life on earth, and the power of His words, had awakened in them an answering gladness. Her emotion had never failed to kindle theirs, and the result had been a gentle yet fervent excitement which had gilded all the dullness of every-day existence. But here, though she could get the people to complain of their own lot, or speak spitefully of their neighbors, they had not a thought to utter about Him who had lived and died for them. And Carola was as one who tells an idle tale when she spoke of Him.

PAUL'S CHARGE TO TIMOTHY.

S. S. Lesson for May 31, 2 Tim. 3: 14-17; 4: 1-8. Golden Text, 3: 14. By Mrs. M. Baxter. Paul's Affection for Timothy—His Last Letter—His Injunction—Timothy's Teachers—The Equipment of the Man of God—Intellectual Knowledge Unfruitful if Alone—Eloquence without Usefulness—God's One Season—The Character of the Dispensation Predicted—Hardships to be Endured not Chosen—Parting Words.

TIMOTHY was very dear to Paul. In writing to him he calls him "My true child in faith" (1 Tim. 1: 2, R. V.), and in speaking of him to the Philippians he says, "I have no man like-minded, who will care truly for your state" (Phil. 2: 20, R. V.). It was Timothy whom he desired to see above all, as the time of his martyrdom drew near. "Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me;" "Do thy diligence to come before winter" (II Tim. 4: 9, 21). The last letter on record which Paul ever wrote was written to Timothy; our subject forms a part of it. Some of the tidings which it brought were sad ones, of the defection of Hymenæus and Philetus (chap. 2: 18). "This thou knowest that all that are in Asia turned away from me" (II Tim. 1: 15, R. V.). Paul also foretold that grievous (or perilous) times should come (chap. 3: 1-5, 13, R. V.). But evil, present or future, did not turn away the old apostle's eyes from his Lord; there was not the least discouragement in the tone of his charge to Timothy. Above all seeming confusion, above all which looked like defeat, Paul knew that the purposes of his God were being worked out, that Christ was Conqueror, and His people more than conquerors through Him (Rom. 8: 37).

"Abide thou in the things which thou hast learned,

AND HAST BEEN ASSURED OF

[or versed in], knowing of whom thou hast learned them. Instrumentally Timothy had learned much from his mother, Eunice, and his grandmother, Lois (chap. 1: 5), and much from Paul; few had seen the life of Christ more fully exemplified in their relatives and teacher than had Timothy. But it was neither the teaching nor example of these holy women or of the Apostle Paul which had assured or versed Timothy in the things which he had learned; the Holy Ghost alone could do that. True, from a child he had known the Holy Scriptures which were able to make him wise unto salvation; but until there was "unfeigned faith" in him (chap. 1: 5) the Word did not profit him; how could it, not being mixed with faith? (Heb. 4: 2) Paul did not tell Timothy to abide in anything which he had not learned for himself and been assured of personally. Many believers take up beautiful ideas of truth from others, which, however, do not become part of their own life, "hid with Christ in God," and thus they do not abide. A trial of faith may come on the very point where they have had light, but as that light has not been assured to them by the Holy Ghost, they do not abide.

"Every Scripture inspired of God is also profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction [or discipline] in righteousness, that the man of God may be complete, furnished completely unto every good work" (R. V.). There is no such equipment for the man of God or the woman of God as His Word,

And yet how often those who have it at their fingers' ends, who can give chapter and verse for everything they quote, who know the different readings in the English versions, and even in the ancient Greek manuscripts, yet fail to effect any work of grace upon their hearers! In order to produce any real, lasting effect, the man of God needs to know more than "the letter which killeth," even "the Spirit which giveth life" (II Cor. 3: 6). When a child of God himself believes and the Word which he delivers to others, if he speaks, with Christ dwelling in his heart by faith as the true Witness to what he says, there is a power which men cannot but feel, and they can never be as though they had not heard that message. But when a preacher, even a truly spiritual man, brings his own arguments to bear upon the Word of God, and demonstrates the truth with perfect logic and splendid eloquence, he often has to return sick at heart, and grieved at the hardness of his hearers. As the Word of Christ dwells in us "richly in all wisdom" (Col. 3: 16), and as we are assured of its shrinking from no step of faith to which it leads us, it becomes a power on those whom we teach. Paul speaks of the Word as being profitable for reproof, exhortation, etc. It is blessedly true. An argument with a child, a servant, a scholar, as to the right or wrong of a thing, may be entirely out of place; an unexplained command may often savor of harshness. But a word of God's spoken in His name comes with authority as nothing else can; there is power in every word of God.

Paul's charge to Timothy was probably his last. Once he had been tried and had been set at liberty. Now his second trial before Cæsar was at hand. He knew he was soon to be with the Lord, and with all the love of a father and all the authority of a messenger of God, he said, "I charge thee in the sight of God and of Christ Jesus, who shall judge the quick and the dead, and by His appearing and His kingdom, preach the Word; be instant in season, out of season" (R. V.). To some people it comes very easy to preach; they have a natural flow of words, quickly seize an idea, and as readily reproduce it. But there are numbers of such who do not preach "with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven" (1 Pet. 1: 12), for they do not abide in those things which they have learned. Men may praise them, people who do not want to be awakened will attend their ministry and flatter them, but in their congregation souls are not converted, and believers do not come out of the world. The Holy Ghost is not recognized; everything spoken is addressed to the head and not to the heart; it is man touching man, and contact with the living God is an unknown thing in their midst. Such men are not "instant in season, out of season."

GOD HAS BUT ONE SEASON

for blessing souls; it is always now. "Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation" (II Cor. 6: 2). Are we then to force religion upon all whom we meet, whether they will or no? Thank God, He does not leave us without distinct guidance. While "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature" was His general command, yet He gave special directions to Paul as to what course he should pursue, and when He wanted him in Europe He forbade him to preach the Word in Asia (Acts 16: 6). Philip, who was equally under the same command, was called away from his sphere of service in Samaria to win the Ethiopian eunuch to Christ. When we are willing to be guided by God He will always give us direction. Our part is to follow Him without a question as to whether it is in season or out of season for us; that is God's question, not ours. To the prisoners in the Philippian prison it must have seemed very much out of season that Paul and Silas should sing praises to God, but between them and God there never was a more appropriate time for praise. They had put their case and that of the jailer into His hands, and they knew He had taken the charge; how could they but rejoice? It may have seemed to Felix and to Agrippa very much "out of season" that, as a prisoner at the bar, Paul should presume to turn the court into a meeting-house and preach Christ to his judges. But it was God's season; He had chosen him to carry His name before governors and kings and the children of Israel.

"Reprove [or put to the proof], rebuke, exhort, with all longsuffering and teaching" (R. V.). Some teachers shrink from reproof, partly from the fear of wounding others, but far more from the great consciousness of their own shortcomings. It is only those who are by nature unconsciously or indifferent to the suffering they give to others, who do not naturally shrink from reproof. Yet it is self in us which shrinks from it. Christ in us longs for the deliverance of the brother or sister who is in error, and more, believes in the power and will of God to deliver. Christ in us is as willing to reprove in the power of the Holy Ghost as to preach the Gospel. "For the time will come when they will not endure the sound [or healthful] doctrine, but, having itching ears, will hear to themselves teachers after their own lusts, and will turn away their ears from the truth, and turn aside unto fables." What is this but the history of the dispensation foretold? Romanism, ritualism, rationalism, worldly Evangelicalism in church—all are included in this prophetic utterance of Paul! "But be thou sober in all things, suffer hardship, do the work of an evangelist, fulfil thy ministry." Paul does not tell Timothy to court hardship, but to endure it. Some will deny themselves sleep and spend days in fasting, who will not endure the hardship of having their wills crossed, or their plans disarranged. Timothy was a bishop, but his office did not make it less, but rather more, incumbent on him to win souls and so do the work of an evangelist and fulfil or prove his ministry. One will say, "Now I know more of the deeper life of God, I cannot go on evangelizing; that is not my work." It can never cease to be our work until every soul with whom we come in contact is saved of the Lord.

For I am

ALREADY BEING OFFERED

[poured out as a drink-offering], and the time of my departure is come. "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith." Not one shadow or cloud appears on the evening horizon of this man of God. Not one regret, not one mention of anything left undone. All is peace. The good fight of faith had been fought, God had been glorified in his life as he had believed, and now by faith also God was to be glorified in his death. He looked beyond and added with assurance, "Henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto them also which love His appearing."

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

Three of the American Old Testament Revisers—The Bible House, New York.

THE REVISERS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

ON Thursday last the Revised Version of the Old Testament was issued to the American public. The work confided to the hands of the eminent men who formed the American and English committees was one of an importance that cannot be over-estimated. It was no light responsibility to make changes in the language of a Book to which we and our fathers have gone for guidance in difficulty, for consolation in affliction, and which has been our constant friend and companion in all the vicissitudes of life.

But the work had to be done. We have been told over and over again from the pulpit and from the professor's chair that this and that passage was incorrectly translated, that the English did not fully give us the meaning of the original Hebrew, and that in some cases it was positively misleading, while in others it was incomprehensible, though the meaning of the original was clear. The great and good men who prepared the translation we have been using for more than two centuries and a half were in ignorance of many matters which discoveries in geography, philology, and archaeology have brought to light since their work was finished. The demand, consequently became general among intelligent people that we should have a translation which should be absolutely correct, and that we should know as precisely as the English language could convey, the meaning of the inspired men who wrote the books of the Bible.

After much consideration and consultation among Christians of learning, it was decided to commit the work to two companies of erudite men, the one company to be composed of men familiar with the Greek of the New Testament, and the other of men learned in the Hebrew of the Old Testament. In both cases the work was shared between scholars in England and America. It is now four years since the revisers of the New Testament finished their work, and just a year since the Old Testament Company completed the revision, the interval having been occupied in printing and binding the various editions.

The American Old Testament Company consisted of: Professor William Henry Green, of the Presbyterian Theological Seminary at Princeton, who was chairman; Professor George E. Day, of the Congregational Divinity School at New Haven, who was secretary; Vice-Chancellor Charles P. Krauth, who died in 1883; Professor Charles A. Aiken, of Princeton; Rev. Dr. T. W. Chambers, of the Collegiate Dutch Church of New York; Professor Thomas J. Conant, Baptist, Brooklyn; Professor John De Witt, of the Reformed Dutch Theological Seminary at New Brunswick, New Jersey; Professor Charles M. Mead, formerly of the Congregational Theological Seminary at Andover; Professor Howard Osgood, of the Baptist Theological Seminary at Rochester, New York; Professor Joseph Packard, of the Episcopal Theological Seminary at Alexandria, Virginia; Professor James Strong, of the Methodist Theological Seminary at Madison, New Jersey, and Professor C. V. A. Van Dyck, of Beirut, Syria, who served as advisory member on questions of Arabic. This committee worked in connection with a company of learned men in England. They held their meetings once a month in the Bible House, New York (a picture of which appears on the first page). Each session lasted several days. The work done at each session was sent to England, and the English revisers sent their work to the American Company. Each company criticised the work of the other, and exchanged criticisms, and the differences were for the most part harmonized. Any suggestions of the American Company which the English revisers were unable to accept are printed in an appendix, but they are comparatively few.

PROFESSOR WILLIAM H. GREEN, D.D., LL.D., who was Chairman of the American Company, and whose portrait appears on our first page, is Professor of Hebrew and Old Testament literature in the Theological Seminary of Princeton, N. J. He is sixty years of age, having been born on June 27th, 1825, at Groverville, Burlington County, N. J. He graduated at Lafayette College, Easton, Pa., in 1840. Subsequently he studied at Princeton and became teacher of Hebrew there in 1846. He was ordained a Presbyterian minister in 1848, and in 1849 became pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia. In 1851 he entered upon his present duty as Professor of Hebrew at Princeton. He is the author of a Hebrew Grammar, a Hebrew Chrestomathy, "The Old Testament Vindicated," a work in reply to the criticisms of Colenso, and "The Argument of the Book of Job Unfolded." An evidence of the high honor in which he is held among Christian educators was afforded in 1868, when he was invited to become President of the College of New Jersey, a position which he declined.

PROFESSOR GEORGE E. DAY, D.D., who was Secretary of the American Company, and whose portrait appears on our first page, is Professor of the Hebrew language and literature in the Theological Department of Yale College, New Haven, Conn. He is seventy years of age, having been born at Pittsfield, Mass., March 19th, 1815. He graduated at Yale College in 1833, and concluded his theological course at the Yale Theological Seminary in 1838. He immediately became assistant instructor of sacred literature in that institution, a position which he held until 1840, when he entered upon the active duties of the Christian ministry. During the next eleven years he labored first at Marlborough, Mass., and afterward at Northampton, Mass., as pastor of large and influential churches; but in 1851 on the invitation of the Lane Theological Seminary, he became Professor of biblical literature in that institution. After fifteen years of usefulness there he removed to his present position in Yale College. He has translated several learned works from the German, and was one of the contributors to Smith's Bible Dictionary.

PROFESSOR CHARLES P. KRAUTH, D.D., LL.D., whose portrait also appears on our first page, did not live to see the completion of the work on which he had been engaged, though he had the satisfaction of witnessing and assisting in the labors of the greater part of the work. He died in 1883, at the age of sixty years. He was born on March 17th, 1823, at Martinsburg, Va. He was the son of the Rev. Charles P. Krauth, formerly President of Pennsylvania College, Gettysburg. He graduated there in 1839, and entered the Lutheran ministry in 1841, and was pastor of churches successively in Baltimore, Md., Winchester, Va., Pittsburg, Pa., and St. Mark's Lutheran Church, Philadelphia. In 1864 he was elected Professor of Systematic Theology and Church Polity in the Lutheran Theological Seminary in Philadelphia, and in 1868 he accepted the chair of Intellectual and Moral Philosophy in the University of Pennsylvania, of which institution he was elected Vice-Chancellor in 1873. He was for three successive terms President of the General Council of the Lutheran Church in America, and took a prominent part in the preparation of the Church book issued by the Council in 1869.

PROFESSOR JAMES STRONG, S.T.D., whose portrait appears on page 348, is Doctor of Sacred Theology and Professor of that Department in Drew Theological Seminary at Madison, N. J. He was born in New York, August 14th, 1822. He graduated in Wesleyan University in 1844, and for two years taught in Troy Conference Academy. He subsequently removed to Flushing, L. I., where he engaged in various enterprises for the benefit and development of that locality. He continued his studies while superintending many extensive undertakings, and became one of the most erudite Hebrew scholars in America. In 1858 he returned wholly to the pursuits most congenial to him, by becoming Professor of Biblical Literature at Troy University, a position he occupied until his removal, in 1868, to Drew Theological Seminary. In 1874 he made an extended tour in the Holy Land. He is best known, however, through the Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature which, in connection with Dr. McClintock, he prepared. Dr. McClintock died during the progress of that work, which was, however, completed by Dr. Strong. His assistance in the revision has been most valuable, owing to his intimate acquaintance with the land and literature of the Bible.

PROFESSOR CHARLES M. MEAD, D.D., whose portrait appears on page 348, is Professor of Hebrew in the Theological Seminary at Andover, Mass., which position he has occupied since 1866. He is the youngest member of the company. He was born at Cornwall, Vt., on January 28th, 1836, and has therefore not completed his fiftieth year. He graduated at Middlebury College in 1856, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1862. He subsequently spent four years in studying at German universities. While he has been at Andover he has contributed extensively on theological subjects to various periodicals.

THE REVISED BIBLE.

THE NEW Bible appears with both of the Testaments bound together. The preface opens with a statement of the general principles on which the revision has been conducted. The revisers have borne in mind their duty not to make a new translation, but to revise that already existing, and have departed from it only where they disagreed with the translators of 1611 upon the meaning of a word or sentence. The terms of natural history are only changed where it is certain that the Authorized Version is incorrect. Where it is doubtful or there is an alternative, the rendering is given in the margin.

In some words of frequent occurrence, the Authorized Version being either inadequate or inconsistent, changes have been introduced with as much uniformity as practicable. For instance, "tabernacles of the congregation" has been everywhere changed to "tent of meeting." In regard to the word "Jehovah," the usage of the Authorized Version is followed, the revisers not thinking it advisable to insert it uniformly in place of "Lord" or "God," which, when printed in small capitals, represent the words substituted by Jewish custom for the Ineffable Name. The word "grove" (Judges 6:28) has been replaced by "ashera" with its plurals "asherim" and "asheroth." In the poetical books, "sheol" replaces "hell," which has been changed in prose passages to "the grave" and "the pit," with "sheol" in the margin.

This is a specimen of the blank verse:

Create in me a clean heart, O God,
And renew a right spirit within me.
Cast me not away from thy presence,
And take not thy Holy Spirit from me.
Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation,
And uphold me with a free spirit.

Adam and Eve only take their names after the Fall. Before, they are man and wife. No changes in diction are made in the first chapter of Genesis to aid or puzzle debaters on faith and science. The old account of the Deluge is left as it was. The Mosaic books are but little touched. The Joshua miracle of the sun and the moon is left intact. Job is mainly printed in blank verse. "I know that my Redeemer liveth" stands, but the marginal note destroys all its significance in relation to the Messiah. "Oh that mine adversary had written a book" becomes "Oh that I had the indictment mine adversary had written." "Hast thou clothed his neck with thunder" changes to "With a quivering name."

All the headings of chapters have been dropped, as in the revised New Testament, and the text has been divided into paragraphs, but the old chapter and verse divisions have been retained in the margin for convenience of reference. By this means the revisers have been enabled to rejoin Ps. 10 to Ps. 9, and Ps. 13 to Ps. 12, and to begin Is. 53 at ch. 52 : 13.

The several days of the Creation are made more prominent by breaks of a line between the verses. This expedient has enabled the revisers to make use of the dialogue form and to show the dramatic character of the Song of Songs, the first chapter of which is divided into seven.

The summary of each day's work at the Creation now runs according to the formula, "And there was evening and there was morning one day," "there was evening and there was morning a second day," and so on, giving a suggestion of successive stages with long intervals.

The "apples of gold" of Prov. 25 : 11 are now encased in "figured work" of silver, not in "pictures."

"Vanity and vexation of spirit" (Eccles. 2 : 17) has become "Vanity and a striving after wind."

Happy is the man that hath his quiver full of them (Ps. 127 : 5) has been changed into "Happy is the man that hath filled his quiver with them."

Reuben's curse, Gen. 49 : 4, "Unstable as water, thou shalt not excel," now reads, "Unstable as water have not thou the excellency."

The following changes also grate against associations. The authorized Genesis, ch. 6 : 4, "There were giants in the earth in those days," is revised, "The nephelim were in the earth in those days."

In the authorized edition Job 31 : 35, "Oh, that one would hear me! Behold, my desire is that the Almighty would answer me, and that mine adversary had written a book," is revised, "Oh, that one would hear me! Behold, my desire is that the Almighty would answer me, and that I had the indictment which my adversary hath written."

The Authorized Ps. 8 : 5, "For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels," is revised, "For thou hast made him a little lower than God." The Authorized Ps. 116 : 11, "I said in my haste, all men are liars," is revised, "I said when I made haste to escape, all men are a lie." Eccles. 11 : 13, "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter—Fear God," etc., has been revised to read, "This is the end of the matter; all hath been heard. Fear God," etc.

Prov. 14 : 9, "Fools make a mock at sin; but among the righteous there is favor," is revised to read, "The foolish scorn the guilt-offering; but among the upright there is good will."

Is. 52 : 13, in the Authorized Version, reads, "Behold, my servant shall deal prudently; he shall be exalted and extolled and be very high." The revised reads: "Behold, my servant shall deal wisely; he shall be lifted up and shall be very high."

Is. 53 : 3, in the Authorized Version, is: "He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief; and we hid, as it were, our faces from him; he was despised and we esteemed him not." In the revised this reads: "He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief; and as one from whom men hide their faces; he was despised, and we esteemed him not."

The same chapter, v. 7, is changed to read: "He was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth: as a lamb that he led to the slaughter," etc.

Same chapter, v. 8: "He was taken from prison and from judgment: and who shall declare his generation," is revised to read: "By oppression and judgment he was taken away: and who considereth his generation."

The following are examples in which the actual task of revision is distinctly seen:

Authorized Version, Gen. 22 : 14, "In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen." Revised Version: "In the mount of the Lord it shall be provided."

Authorized Version, Ex. 19 : 20, "And it was a cloud and a darkness to them, but it gave light by night to these." Revised: "And there was the cloud and the darkness, yet gave it light by night."

Authorized, Job 36 : 18: "Beware lest He take thee away from his stroke." Revised: "Beware lest thou be led away with thy sufficiency."

Among the other changes are the following: ACKNOWLEDGED ERRORS.

There are many renderings declared to be incorrect by all lexicons and commentaries of a critical character. For example, the word "hypocrite" is found eight times in the Book of Job, yet in not one of them does the original term have that meaning. So one of the obligations mentioned often in the Pentateuch and elsewhere is called a "meat offering," which leads the reader to suppose that it is an animal sacrifice, whereas, the Hebrew means an unbloody oblation, and is correctly rendered "meal offering." In the following list the incorrect word is placed first, with a reference to one of the places where it occurs, and then the true meaning as generally accepted among scholars:

Apothecary (Ex. 30 : 25) becomes perfumer; avenging (Judges 5 : 2), leaders; bitter (Is. 14 : 23), porcupine; borrow (Ex. 11 : 2), ark; breaches (Judges 5 : 17), crows or harbors; cane (Job 38 : 6), lamp; caldron (Jer. 18 : 3), pot; college (1 Kings 22 : 5), second ward; coast (Jer. 25 : 32), uttermost part; crooked (Job 26 : 13), fleet, or fleeing; dead things (Job 26 : 5), the shades; diet (Jer. 52 : 34), allowance; dragons (Ps. 74 : 13), monsters; dragons (Job. 30 : 29), jackals; dregs (Is. 51 : 17), bowl; flagons of wine (Hos. 3 : 1) pressed grapes; fires (Is. 24 : 15), the East; flood (Joshua 24 : 14), the river; foxes (Judges 15 : 4), jackals; groves (Ez. 34 : 13), pillars; galleries (Cant. 7 : 5), curls of hair; grow up (Mal. 4 : 2), leap; hats (Dan. 3 : 2), mantles; hearth (Jer. 36 : 22), brazier; hell (Ps. 16 : 10), Sheol, Hades, i. e. under world; house of God (Judges 20 : 18), Bethel; hypocrite (Job 8 : 13), ungodly; images (Lev. 26 : 30), sun images; images (Gen. 31 : 19), seraphim; household gods; Jasher (1st Sam. 1 : 18), the upright; jaw (Judges 20 : 19), Leli (a proper name); kid of the goats (Gen. 37 : 31), he goat; lamps (Ezek. 1 : 13), torches; linen yarn (1 Kings 10 : 28), drove of horses; Mount Ephraim (Josh. 24 : 23), hill country of Ephraim; multitude of No (Jer. 46 : 25), Amon of No; mules (Gen. 36 : 44), warm springs; nitre (Jer. 2 : 22), lye; owl (Lev. 11 : 16), ostrich; plain of Mamre (Gen. 18 : 1), oaks of Mamre; paper reeds (Is. 19 : 7), meadows; pots (Jer. 35 : 5), bowls; river of Egypt (Nurie. 34 : 5), brook of Egypt (not the Nile); reward (Jer. 40 : 5), present; satyrs (Is. 13 : 2), goats; scapegoat (Lev. 16 : 8), removal; screech owl (Is. 34 : 14), night monster; scum (Ezek. 24 : 6), rust; shameless spewing (Hab. 2 : 16), ingominy; spider (Prov. 38 : 31), lizard; sweet influences (Job 38 : 31), cluster, or chain; thick clay (Hab. 2 : 6), pledges; table (Is. 30 : 8), tablet; tablet (Is. 3 : 20), perfume box; torches (Nah. 2 : 3), steel; troop (Amos 9 : 6), vault; valley (Josh. 11 : 16), lowland; veil (Ruth 3 : 15), mantle; unicorn (Num. 23 : 22), wild ox; wounds (Prov. 18 : 8), dainty morsels.

The song of Lamech is made more intelligible by making the second couplet read:

For I have slain a man for bruising me.
And a young man for bruising me.

In Is. 1 : 1, "Abraham went up out of Egypt," into the South," the printing of the last word with a capital letter shows that it refers to a definite region (the Negeb), and thus avoids the incongruity of the Authorized Version in leading one to think that the patriarch reached Palestine by going south from Egypt. In v. 18, "the plain of Mamre which is in Hebron" is changed to "the oaks of Mamre which are in Hebron," because this is the meaning of the Hebrew, and there is no plain in Hebron or its vicinity. (So Is. 14 : 13 and Is. 1 : 1.) In 24 : 2, "Abraham said to his eldest servant of his house," is made to read, "Abraham said to his servant, the elder of his house," which is what the Hebrew means. In 33 : 18, "And Jacob came to Shalem, a city of Shechem," the revision reads, "came in peace to the city of Shechem," because no such city as Shalem is known, and the true rendering shows how God fulfilled Jacob's request (28 : 21). In the prophecy of Jacob (Gen. 49) are several manifest improvements. Reuben is charged with being not "unstable," but, as the original word means, "boiling over"—that is, impulsive or excitable, which exactly describes his character, as shown by his conduct on various occasions. In the fifth verse, "instruments of cruelty are in their habitations," the margin of the Authorized Version, "weapons of violence are their swords," is inserted in the text, as being both more literal and more expressive. In the ninth verse, instead of saying that Judah couched "as an old lion," the revision returns to Tyndale's more accurate rendering, "as a lioness."

In the second commandment (20 : 5) we have a slight change, "visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, upon the third and upon the fourth generation of them that hate me" (the exact sense of the original). The sixth command (v. 13) is, after the pattern of the Prayer-Book and the Authorized Version in Matt. 19 : 18, given as "Thou shalt do no murder," and the same as Deut. v. 17. The advantage of this rendering is that it needs no imitation or explanation. To kill is often lawful, and sometimes a duty, but to do murder is wrong always and everywhere.

SOME ALTERED VERSES.

Following are some changes in the new version:

AUTHORIZED VERSION.	REVISED VERSION.
Ps. 12 : 5. "I will set him in safety from him that puffeth at him."	"I will set him in safety at whom they mock."
Ps. 68 : 4. "Extol him that rideth upon the heavens."	"Cast up a highway for him that rideth thro' the deserts."
Ps. 68 : 19. "Blessed be the Lord who daily loadeth us with benefits."	"Blessed be the Lord, who daily beareth our burdens."
Ps. 68 : 30. "Rebuke the company of spearmen."	"Rebuke the wild beasts of the reeds."
Ps. 82 : 7. "As well the singers as the players on instruments shall be there. All my springs are in Thee."	"As well the singers as they that dance say, all my fountains are in thee."
Ps. 141 : 5. "And let him reprove me; it shall be an excellent oil which shall not break my head."	"And let him reprove me; it shall be oil upon the head; let not my head refuse it."
Prov. 14 : 9. "Fools make a mock at sin; but among the righteous there is sin."	"The foolish scorn the guilt offering; but among the upright there is good will."
Is. 16 : "Carved works, fine linen of Egypt."	"Striped cloths of the yarn of Egypt."
Is. 29 : "It is as sport to a fool to do mischief; but a man of understanding hath wisdom."	"And so is wisdom to a man of understanding."
Is. 13 : "The way of transgressors is hard."	"The way of the treacherous is ragged."
Ps. 16 : "The preparations in man and the answer of the tongue is from the Lord."	"The preparations of the heart belong to man, but the answer of the tongue is from the Lord."
Ecc. 5 : 14. "All is vanity and vexation of spirit."	"All is vanity and striving after wind."
Is. 13 : "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter, Fear God, etc."	"This is the end of the matter; all hath been heard, Fear God, etc."

A German's Testimony to the Value of Prohibition is published in a Kansas journal. In a letter dated Altoona, Wilson County, Kan., he says: "Like most Germans, I was very much opposed to Prohibition before it was adopted in our State. Indeed, my aversion was so great that I earnestly contemplated selling my farm and turning my back on Kansas. At that time I held it to be a great shame to live in a State where drinking was not free. Fortunately for me, I could not sell. I say fortunately, because I have since found that I was greatly mistaken. The State, instead of going down, as was prophesied by the liquor party, has experienced the height of prosperity. It was said that emigration would cease if Prohibition was adopted, but the reverse took place. Emigration increases every day, and the price of land has raised in value considerably. Farmers are in better circumstances than ever before."

DESPOTISM OF THE NEEDLE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached last Sunday Morning, May 24, 1885.

"So I returned, and considered all the oppressions that are done under the sun: and behold the tears of such as were oppressed, and they had no comfort; and on the side of their oppressors there was power; but they had no comfort."—ECCLES. 4: 11.

The Occupation Honorable—But Murderous—The Misery of Idleness—Girls Should Have an Occupation—Mme. De Staël's Experience—De- spoiled Orphans—Mistaken Notions About Women's Work—What Is and Is Not Honorable—A Woman's Right to Her Bread—Opportunity to be Given Her—Martyrs of Wash-tub and Needle—Right to Equal Compensation—The Sewing Girls of the Cities—Tragedies of Suffering—Cases of Imposition—The Remedy—Trust in God—Be Competent—Be Independent—The Unmarried Aunts—Everybody's Blessing.

VERY long ago the needle was busy. It was considered honorable for women to toil in olden time. Alexander the Great stood in his palace showing garments made by his own mother. The finest tapestries at Bayeux were made by the queen of William the Conqueror. Augustus, the Emperor, would not wear any garments except those that were fashioned by some member of his royal family. So let the toiler everywhere be respected!

The needle has

SLAIN MORE THAN THE SWORD.

When the sewing-machine was invented some thought that invention would alleviate woman's toil and put an end to the despotism of the needle. But no; while the sewing-machine has been a great blessing to well-to-do families in many cases, it has added to the stab of the needle the crush of the wheel, and multitudes of women, notwithstanding the reinforcement of the sewing-machine, can only make, work hard as they will, between two dollars and three dollars per week.

The greatest blessing that could have happened to our first parents was being turned out of Eden after they had done wrong. Adam and Eve, in their perfect state, might have got along without work, or only such slight employment as a perfect garden with no weeds in it demanded. But soon as they had sinned, the best thing for them was to be turned out where they would have to work. We know what it is for a man to have nothing to do. Old Ashbel Green, at fourscore years, when asked why he kept on working, said: "I do so to keep out of mischief." We see that a man who has a large amount of money to start with has no chance. Of the thousand prosperous and honorable men that you know, nine hundred and ninety-nine had to work vigorously at the beginning. But I am now to tell you that industry is just as important for a woman's safety and happiness. The most unhappy women in our communities to-day are those who have no engagements to call them up in the morning; who, once having risen and breakfasted, lounge through the dull forenoon in slippers down at the heel and with dishevelled hair, reading Ouida's last novel, and who, having dragged through a wretched forenoon and taken their afternoon sleep, and having passed an hour and a half at their toilet, pick up their card-case and go out to make calls, and who pass their evenings waiting for somebody to come in and break up the monotony. Arabella Stuart never was imprisoned in so dark a dungeon as that.

There is no happiness in an idle woman. It may be with hand, it may be with brain, it may be with foot; but work she must, or be wretched forever. The little girls of our families must be started with that idea.

THE CURSE OF AMERICAN SOCIETY is that our young women are taught that the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, tenth, fiftieth, thousandth thing in their life is to get somebody to take care of them. Instead of that, the first lesson should be how under God they may take care of themselves. The simple fact is that a majority of them do have to take care of themselves, and that, too, after having, through the false notions of their parents, wasted the years in which they ought to have learned how successfully to maintain themselves. We now and here declare the inhumanity, cruelty, and outrage of that father and mother who pass their daughters into womanhood, having given them no facility for earning their livelihood. Mme. de Staël said: "It is not these writings that I am proud of, but the fact that I have facility in ten occupations, in any one of which I could make a livelihood." You say you have a fortune to leave them. O man and woman, have you not learned that, like vultures, like hawks, like eagles, riches have wings and fly away? Though you should be successful in leaving a competency behind you, the trickery of executors may swamp it in a night; or some officials in our churches may get up a mining company and induce your orphans to put their money into a hole in Colorado, and if by the most skillful machinery the sunken money cannot be brought up again, prove to them that it was eternally decreed that that was the way they were to lose it, and that it went in the most orthodox and heavenly style. Oh, the

that professed Christians will engage in until God puts His fingers into the collar of the hypocrite's robe and strips it clear down to the bottom! You have no right, because you are well-off, to conclude that your children are going to be as well-off. A man died leaving a large fortune. His son fell dead in a Philadelphia groshop. His old comrades came in and said as they bent over his corpse: "What is the matter with you, Boggsey?" The surgeon standing over him said: "Hush ye! He is dead!" "Oh, he is dead, they said. 'Come, boys; let us go and take a drink in memory of poor Boggsey.'" Have you nothing better than money to leave your children? If you have not, but send your daughters into the world with empty brain and unskilled hand, you are guilty of assassination, homicide, regicide, infanticide.

There are women toiling in our cities for two and three dollars per week who were the DAUGHTERS OF MERCHANT PRINCES.

These suffering ones now would be glad to have the crumbs that once fell from their fathers' table. That worn-out, broken shoe that she wears is the lineal descendant of the twelve dollar gaiters in which her mother walked; and that torn and faded calico had ancestry of magnificent brocade that swept Broadway clean without any expense to the Street Commissioners. Though you live in an elegant residence and fare sumptuously every day, let your daughters feel it is a disgrace to them not to know how to work. I denounce the idea prevalent in society that, though our young women may embroider slippers and crochet and make mats for lamps to stand on without disgrace, the idea of doing anything for a livelihood is dishonorable. It is a shame for a young woman belonging to a large family to be inefficient when the father toils his life away for her support. It is a shame for a daughter to be idle while her mother toils at the wash-tub. It is as honorable to sweep house, make beds or trim hats as it is to twist a watch-chain.

A POPULAR NOTION.

As far as I can understand, the line of respectability lies between that which is useful and that which is useless. If women do that which is of no value, their work is honorable. If they do practical work, it is dishonorable. That our young women may escape the censure of doing dishonorable work, I shall particularize. You may knit a tidy for the back of an arm-chair, but by no means make the money wherewith to buy the chair. You may with a delicate brush beautify a mantel ornament, but die rather than earn enough to buy a marble mantel. You may learn artistic music until you can squall Italian, but never sing "Ortonville" or "Old Hundred." Do nothing practical if you would in the eyes of refined society preserve your respectability. I scout these finical notions. I tell you a woman no more than a man, has a right to occupy a place in this world unless she pays a rent for it. In the course of a lifetime you consume whole harvests and droves of cattle, and every day you live breathe forty hogsheds of good, pure air. You must by some kind of usefulness pay for all this. Our race was the last thing created—the birds and fishes on the fourth day, the cattle and lizards on the fifth day, and man on the sixth day. If geologists are right, the earth was a million of years in the possession of the insects, beasts, and birds before our race came upon it. In one sense

WE WERE INNOVATORS.

The cattle, the lizards, and the hawks had pre-emption right. The question is not what we are to do with the lizards and summer insects, but what the lizards and summer insects are to do with us. If we want a place in this world we must earn it. The partridge makes its own nest before it occupies it. The lark by its morning song earns its breakfast before it eats it, and the Bible gives an intimation that the first duty of an idler is to starve when it says, "If he will not work, neither shall he eat." Idleness ruins the health; and very soon nature says: "This man has refused to pay his rent, out with him!" Society is to be reconstructed on the subject of woman's toil. A vast majority of those who would have woman industriously shut her up to a few kinds of work. My judgment in this matter is that a woman has a right to do anything she can do well. There should be no department of merchandise, mechanism, art, or science barred against her. If Miss Hosmer has genius for sculpture, give her a chisel. If Rosa Bonheur has a fondness for delineating animals, let her make "The Horse Fair." If Miss Mitchell will study astronomy, let her mount the starry ladder. If Lydia will be a merchant, let her sell purple. If Lucretia Mott will preach the Gospel, let her thrill with her womanly eloquence the Quaker meeting-house.

It is said, if woman is given such opportunities she will occupy places that might be taken by men. I say, if she have more skill and adaptedness for any position than a man has, let her have it! She has as much to her apparel, and to her home, as men have. But it is said that her nature is so delicate that she is unfitted for exhausting toil. I ask in the name of all past history what toil on earth is more severe, exhausting, and tremendous than that toil of the needle to which for ages she has been subjected? The battering-ram, the sword, the carbine, the battle-axe, have made no such havoc as the needle. I would that these living sepulchres in which women have for ages been buried might be opened, and that some resurrection trumpet might bring up these living corpses to the fresh air and sunlight.

Go with me and I will show you a woman who by hardest toil supports her children, her drunken husband, her old father and mother, pays her house rent, always has wholesome food on her table, and when she can get some neighbor on the Sabbath to come in and take care of her family, appears in church with hat and cloak that are far from indicating the toil to which she is subjected. Such a woman as that has body and soul enough to fit her for any position. She could stand beside the majority of your salesmen and dispose of more goods. She could go into your wheelwright shop and beat one half of your workmen at making carriages. We talk about woman as though we had resigned to her all the light work, and ourselves had shouldered the heavier. But the day of judgment, which will reveal the sufferings of the stake and inquisition, will marshal before the throne of God and the hierarchs of heaven and needle. Now, I say if there be any preference in occupation, let woman have it. God knows her trials are the severest. By her acuter sensitiveness to misfortune, by her hour of anguish, I demand that no one hedge up her pathway to a livelihood. Oh! the meanness, the despicability of men who begrudge a woman the right to work anywhere in any honorable calling!

I go still further and say that woman should have equal compensation with men. By what principle of justice is it that women in many of our cities get only two thirds as much pay as men, and in many cases only half? Here is the

GIGANTIC INJUSTICE

—that for work equally well, if not better done, woman receives far less compensation than man. Start with the National Government. Women clerks in Washington get nine hundred dollars for doing that for which men receive eighteen hundred dollars. The wheel of oppression is rolling over the necks of thousands of women who are at this moment in despair about what they are to do. Many of the largest mercantile establishments of our cities are accessory to these abominations, and from their large establishments there are scores of souls being pitched off into death, and their employers know it. Is there a God? Will there be a judgment? I tell you, if God rises up to redress woman's wrongs, many of our large establishments will be swallowed up quicker than a South American earthquake ever took down a city. God will catch these oppressors between the two mill-stones of his wrath and grind them to powder.

Why is it that a female principal in a school gets only eight hundred and twenty-five dollars for doing work for which a male principal gets sixteen hundred and fifty dollars? I hear from all this land the wail of womanhood. Man has nothing to answer to that wail but flatteries. He says she is an angel. She is not. She knows she is not. She is a human being who gets hungry when she has no food and cold when she has no fire. Give her no more flatteries; give her justice! There are sixty-five thousand and Brooklyn. Across the sunlight comes their death groan. It is not such a cry as comes from those who are suddenly hurled out of life, but a slow, grinding, horrible wasting away. Gather them before you and look into their faces, pinched, ghastly, hunger-struck! Look at their fingers, needle-picked and blood-tipped! See that premature stoop in the shoulders! Hear that dry, hacking, merciless cough! At a large meeting of these women held in a hall in Philadelphia, grand speeches were delivered, but a needle-woman took the stand, threw aside her faded shawl, and with her shrivelled arm hurled a very thunderbolt of eloquence, speaking out the horrors of her own experience.

Stand at the corner of a street in New York at six or seven o'clock in the morning as the women go to work. Many of them had no breakfast except the crumbs that were left over from the night before or the crumbs they chew on their way through the street. Here they come! The working-girls of New York and Brooklyn. These engaged in head work, these in flower-making, in millinery, paper-box making; but, most overworked of all and least compensated, the sewing-women. Why do they not take the city cars on their way up? They cannot afford the five cents. If, concluding to deny herself something else, she gets into the car, give her a seat. You want to see how Latimer and Ridley appeared in the fire. Look at that woman and behold a more horrible martyrdom, a hotter fire, a more agonizing death. Ask that woman how much she gets for her work and she will tell you six cents for making coarse shirts and finds her own thread.

Years ago, one Sabbath night in the vestibule of this church, after service, a woman fell in convulsions. The doctor said she needed medicine not so much as something to eat. As she began to revive, in her delirium she said, gaspingly: "Eight cents! Eight cents! Eight cents! Eight cents! I wish I could get it done,

I AM SO TIRED.

I wish I could get some sleep, but I must get it done. Eight cents! Eight cents! Eight cents!" We found afterward that she was making garments for eight cents apiece, and that she could make but three of them in a day. Hear it! Three times eight are twenty-four. Hear it, men and women who have comfortable homes! Some of the worst villains of our cities are the employers of these women. They beat them down to the last penny and try to cheat them out of that. The woman must deposit a dollar or two before she gets the garments to work on. When the work is done it is sharply inspected, the most insignificant flaws picked out, and the wages refused and sometimes the dollar deposited not given back. The Women's Protective Union reports a case where one of the poor souls, finding a place where she could get more wages, resolved to change employers and went to get her pay for work done. The employer says: "I hear you are going to leave me?" "Yes," she said, "and I have come to get what you owe me." He made no answer. She said: "Are you not going to pay me?" "Yes," he said, "I will pay you," and he kicked her down stairs.

Oh, that Women's Protective Union, 19 Clinton Place, New York! The blessings of heaven be on it for the merciful and divine work it is doing in the defense of toiling womanhood. What are presented to them day by day! A paragraph from their report: "Can you make Mr. Jones pay me? He owes me for three weeks at $2.50 a week, and I can't get anything, and my child is very sick." The speaker, a young woman lately widowed, burst into a flood of tears as she spoke. She was bidden to come again the next afternoon and repeat her story to the attorney at his usual weekly hearing of frauds and impositions. Means were found by which Mr. Jones was induced to pay the $7.50.

Another paragraph from their report: "A fortnight had passed, when she modestly hinted a desire to know how much her services were worth. 'Oh, my dear,' he replied, 'you are getting to be one of the most valuable hands in the trade; you will always get the very best price. Ten dollars a week you will be able to earn very easily.' And the girl's fingers flew on with her work at a marvellous rate. The picture of $10 a week had almost turned her head. A few nights later, while crossing the ferry, she overheard the name of her employer in the conversation of girls who stood near by. 'What, John Snipes? Why, he don't pay. Look out for him every time. He'll keep you on trial, as he calls it, for weeks, and then he'll let you go and get some other fool!' And thus Jane Smith gained her warning against the swindler. But the Union held him in the toils of the law until he paid the worth of each of those days of 'trial'."

Another paragraph: "Her mortification may be imagined when told that one of the two five-dollar bills which she had just received for her work was counterfeit. But her mortification was swallowed up in indignation when her employer denied having paid her the money, and insultingly asked her to prove it. When the Protective Union had placed this matter in the courts the judge said: 'You will pay Eleanor the amount of her claim, $5.83, and also the costs of the court.'"

THE REMEDY.

How are these evils to be eradicated? Some say: "Give woman the ballot." What effect such ballot might have on other questions I am not here to discuss; but what would be the effect of female suffrage on women's wages? I do not believe that woman will ever get justice by woman's ballot. Indeed, women oppress women as much as men do. Do not women, as much as men, beat down to the lowest figure the woman who sews for them? Are not women as sharp as men on washerwomen and milliners and mantua-makers? If a woman asks a dollar for her work, does not her female employer ask her if she will not take ninety cents? You say, "Only ten cents difference,"

But that is sometimes the difference between heaven and hell. Women often have less commiseration for women than men. If a woman steps aside from the path of rectitude, man may forgive—woman never! Woman will never get justice done her from woman's ballot. Neither will she get it from man's ballot. How then?

GOD WILL RISE UP FOR HER.

God has more resources than we know of. The flaming sword that hung at Eden's gate when woman was driven out will cleave with its terrible edge her oppressors.

But there is something for women to do. Let young people prepare to excel in spheres of work, and they will be able after awhile to get larger wages. Unskilled and incompetent labor must take what is given; and skilled and competent labor will eventually make its own standard. Admitting that the law of supply and demand regulates these things, I contend that the demand for skilled labor is very great and the supply very small. Start with the idea that work is honorable and that you can do some one thing better than anybody else. Resolve that, God helping, you will TAKE CARE OF YOURSELF.

If you are after awhile called into another relation you will all the better be qualified for it by your spirit of self-reliance, or if you are called to stay as you are, you can be happy and self-sustaining.

Poets are fond of talking about man as an oak and woman the vine that climbs it; but I have seen many a tree fall that not only went down itself but took all the vines with it. I can tell you of something stronger than an oak for an ivy to climb on, and that is the throne of the great Jehovah. Single or affianced, that woman is strong who leans on God and does her best. Many of you will go single-handed through life, and you will have to choose between two characters. Young woman, I am sure you will turn your back upon the useless, giggling, irresponsible nonentity which society ignominiously acknowledges to be a woman, and ask God to make you an humble, active, earnest Christian. What will become of that womanly disciple of the world? She is more thoughtful of the attitude she strikes upon the carpet than how she will look in the judgment; more worried about her freckles than her sins; more interested in her apparel than in her redemption. The dying actress whose life had been vicious said: "The scene closes—draw the curtain." Generally the tragedy comes first and the farce afterward; but in her life it was first the farce of a useless life and then the tragedy of a wretched eternity.

Compare the life and death of such a one with that of some Christian aunt that was once a blessing to your household. I do not know that she was ever asked to give her hand in marriage. She lived single, that untrammelled she might be

EVERYBODY'S BLESSING.

Whenever the sick were to be visited or the poor to be provided with bread she went with a blessing. She could pray or sing "Rock of Ages" for any sick pauper who asked her. As she got older there were days when she was a little sharp, but for the most part auntie was a sunbeam—just the one for Christmas Eve. She knew better than any one else how to fix things. Her every prayer, as God heard it, was full of everybody who had trouble. The brightest things in all the house dropped from her fingers. She had peculiar notions, but the grandest notion she ever had was to make you happy. She dressed well—auntie always dressed well; but her highest adornment was that of a meek and quiet spirit, which, in the sight of God, is of great price. When she died you all gathered lovingly about her; and as you carried her out to rest, the Sunday-school class almost covered the coffin with japonicas; and the poor people stood at the end of the alley, with their aprons to their eyes, sobbing bitterly, and the man of the world said, with Solomon: "Her price was above rubies;" and Jesus, as unto the maiden in Judea, commanded, "I say unto thee, arise!"

MISSION WORK ON THE CONGO.

A VERY special interest for us attaches to the Congo Mission. It was by an American—Mr. H. M. Stanley—that the region was opened up for missionaries. In crossing Africa in search of Livingstone and in his subsequent journeys in carrying on Livingstone's explorations, Mr. Stanley prepared the way for the preachers of the Gospel. He did more; he wrote to the press urging the Christian churches to engage in the work, and with so much effect that within a week after his letter appeared, wealthy Christians subscribed the sum of $120,000 for the expenses, and money has been constantly flowing in since.

The following incidents are narrated by the Rev. T. J. Comber, who has been laboring in the Congo region under the auspices of the Baptist Missionary Society:

THE SEED SOWN.

"One of the most prosperous and promising missions in Africa that I have seen is the Baha Mission, at Accra. Rather more than a hundred years ago, in the middle of the eighteenth century, eleven Moravian missionaries went out to establish a mission at Accra. Ignorant of the conditions of the climate, and probably without any medical skill, one by one they fell victims to the climate, died, and were buried. About fifty years ago, another effort was made to establish a mission in that place, nine brethren went out for the work, and again, with one exception, they died from the effects of the climate. The Church persevered with the work, and now that mission is one of the most flourishing in Africa. They have ten prosperous stations, with sixty out-stations; they have thirty-two European preachers, with twenty-two ladies; they have fifty native preachers and evangelists, over two thousand communicants, and three thousand children in their schools learning of Christ.

ALLEGED WITCHCRAFT.

"When a man is suffering from some internal complaint—it may be pneumonia, or, perhaps, acute dyspepsia, and he does not know what to do to cure himself, he begins to be fearful that some one is bewitching his heart; then he and his friends act with great cruelty toward the supposed witch or wizard, not because of natural heartlessness, but because of anger and passion. Just before we commenced to build our Wathen Station at Manyanga there was a little unhealthy, pale-faced black lad. I have seen people when they are sick get a leaden, ashy hue, which certainly can be called pale-faced. This little lad was suffering from a disease known as ascites, a dropsy of the abdomen, which was greatly distended. His friends could do nothing for him. They thought, of course, that he must be bewitched, and so they had the customary tests used, and there were three people who were, one after the other, killed on account of the sickness from which that little child was suffering. Upon our arrival he was brought to us, and by a little operation we were able to relieve him. How many lives we might save by a little medical or surgical skill with God's blessing, who can tell?

A CONGO DOCTOR.

"One day I went into the largest town of Ngombi to see and have a little talk with Luteti, the chief. We found him looking very depressed, miserable, and ill. He was sitting outside of his house, and there were a few of his wives watching by him anxiously. 'What is the matter, Luteti? Are you sick?' Yes; he had been ill for two days. Pulse and tongue both showed considerable disturbance, and after a few inquiries I left him and went away to the mission station to bring him some medicine. When I returned I heard drums beating briskly, and women chanting a weird, plaintive song, as they shook their rattles, and I saw that sick chief, a semi-circle of his people before him, anxiously watching him, and watching the efforts of the family physician, a general practitioner, who was operating upon Luteti. Himself painted and bedaubed, he was making red and white marks about Luteti's body, thus to drive off the evil spirit; and then he called for a chicken, and he attached this chicken to Luteti's wrist by a piece of cord, and having done that, he proceeded to try and push the sickness out of the man's body and away from his shoulder down his arm and through the cord away into the fowl. Standing up, resting against the wall of the house, was a large wooden image—not an idol; the people have no idol worship, but a fetish image, I sat down beside the fetish while the performance of coloring Luteti was going on. I was allowed after all to give Luteti some of my medicine. I attended him for a day or two and he quickly recovered, but had he died from his complaint it would have caused the death of a large number of people, because he was a great chief, and many people would have been killed on account of supposed witchcraft.

IN FEAR OF EVIL SPIRITS.

"These people seem to have a dread and a horror always haunting them, wherever they are, of evil spirits. They think that sometimes the dead have still with them some evil spirit that can come from the grave and wander forth on evil errands throughout the town; and sometimes when a man becomes ill the people of the town muster together and go to the grave of some newly-buried person with their guns with heavy charges of powder, and fire away down into the grave—a rather forcible way of laying the spirit. But more often not the dead, but the living, are thought to be witches or wizards, and to be exercising evil arts and causing sickness and death in the country; and when a man is accused of this he has to take the poison test, and sometimes a weak stomach will at once vomit up the poison; but in most cases the poison does its deadly work; the man falls insensible, and is quickly clubbed to death and dragged away to be burnt and to be thrown to the alligators in the river.

A SCALPED VICTIM.

"When my dear brother, Mr. Bentley, was at Manyanga, he heard of an intended victim of superstition, and hastened away from the town about three miles distant to try if he could prevent it. He arrived there with his assistant, Joseph Silva, and his boy, Nilembo, in a drenching shower of rain. He found he was almost too late, for the poison had been administered, and the man had been beaten, although he was not dead. The scalp hung in shreds, but the skull was uninjured, and the man was unconscious, though still bleeding, and with a rope round his neck they were dragging him away to be burnt. But Mr. Bentley, who had obtained great influence over this most degraded branch of the Congo tribe, interposed between the victim and the people. He reproached them for the wickedness and cruelty of what they were doing, and by show of authority and determination while the people stood hesitating and irresolute, awed by his interference and daring, he and the man with him took the body and put it upon their shoulders, and went off with it to the station up and down the slippery hills, with the blood dropping down upon their clothes. At last they reached the station; they washed and dressed the head of the man; they applied various remedies, and in about two days the man rallied, although he afterward died. Verily, 'the dark places of the earth are full of the habitation of cruelty.'

STANLEY AND KING MTEA.

"A fine illustration of the good that may be done by a word spoken in season, is conveyed in a thrilling incident that took place during the time when Mr. H. M. Stanley was at Uganda, Central Africa. Great battles were going on, and the Wavumas, against whom Mtea, the Uganda chief, was fighting, on one occasion treacherously massacred a truce party which he had sent, including a favorite hostage. A few days after some of his warriors captured a Wavuma chief. Mtea was elated. That chief should be burned to death in sight of the hostile army, to strike terror into their host. 'Now Stamlee,' he exclaimed, 'you shall see how a chief of Wavuma dies.' But Stanley replied, 'Have you forgotten the words I taught you,

'to love your enemies?' 'I will burn this man to ashes,' cried Mtea; 'I will burn every soul I catch!' But at length Stanley's arguments prevailed. He told him the spirits looking down on him would weep to see this dreadful act. Sobbing like a child, he cried, 'Did not Stamlee talk about the spirit-land, and say Suna (his father) would be angry with me? Oh, he speaks, too true. Oh! Father, forgive me, forgive me!' The Wavuma chief was at once released from his terrible position."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Spaniard's Ground of Hope.—At a recent meeting Mr. Kerr related: "I heard recently of a Spaniard who, when he was asked by a Protestant missionary if he was safe for eternity lightly, even laughingly, replied, 'Oh, I have no fear!' He was then solemnly asked the ground of his confidence, and his answer was, 'I never pass a church door without taking off my hat. Friends, think of it, this was his greatest—his only hope for eternity. He was, of course, faithfully shown his lost condition as a sinner, and the need of Christ's precious blood to cleanse him from sin, before he was prepared to meet God. It is hoped that he accepted the salvation offered to him.'

Success in a Mother's Kiss.—A Devoted worker for the Lord related: "On one occasion one of our best painters was asked what was the reason of his great success in painting, and his answer was: 'I attribute all my success to a mother's kiss. At one time I was plodding over my work and greatly disheartened, when mother bent over me and gave me a kiss and praised my work; but it was the kiss that did it. From that time I took fresh courage, and made up my mind that I would be a successful painter.' Oh, friends, you who have the charge of children, a kind word or a gentle touch, how far it goes to encourage the little ones!"

A New Zealand Highlander.—"One of our devoted workers recently had a most interesting case in the after-meeting. He was speaking to a strong-looking, well-dressed man, who evidently was under deep conviction of sin. When the great question of the man's salvation was settled, he said that it was the first time he had been in a place of worship for many years, having been a shepherd in the Highlands of New Zealand, where there was no chance of getting to church. When he returned to Scotland on a visit to his family, he felt no need of any religion. What induced him to enter the church that night he could not tell. He sailed for New Zealand that same week a new man in Christ Jesus."

The Elephant and the Hunters.—Dr. Cameron, speaking lately of parents putting their children in the way of moral danger, said: "A great strong elephant was being pursued by hunters. The hunters ask each other, 'What is she doing? Why is she not turning round on us when we throw the spear at her?' Ah, friends, this was the reason—she had a young one by her side, and she could not expose it to danger. She was quite able to turn round on her foes, and put them to death, but she had a little one to protect and shield from the spears that were flying. I see the very opposite in Christian homes. Parents not only themselves go to rum shops, but they send their children there, scarcely aware of the danger to which the little ones are being exposed. If you care for your children, keep them out of the way of temptation."

Snatched from a Self-Murderer's Doom.—The Rev. Mr. Ross related: "There was a woman who was much given to indulgence in strong drink. One day a silent messenger entered her home, and snatched away a little fair child from the midst of sin and misery to a beautiful home where sin cannot enter. Instead of making the woman better, it threw her into the deepest despondency and gloom. One day, in this depressed state of mind, she thought, 'There is only one place for me, and that is at the bottom of the canal.' So thinking, the poor creature made her way to the edge of the canal, fully intending to throw herself in, when she heard the sound of approaching footsteps, and waited until they would pass. When the party had passed, the woman, acting on a strange impulse, followed them. They were a party of Christians on their way to our meeting, and the woman followed them right into the church. Through the Spirit of God the speaker's words went home to her heart. She returned to her home now, but had not fully entered into light. One day when she was going about her work, she threw herself upon her knees, and cried to the Lord to take the scales from her eyes. The feeble cry was heard in heaven, and she is now not only a Christian, but industriously trying to win others for Jesus."

Attracted by Music and Song.—Mr. J. G. Forbes, of Glasgow, said: "We have had a large number of interesting and gratifying incidents since our evangelistic work began in Brownfield. In the month of August, 1884, a gentleman was visiting the city on business. One evening, to pass the time away, he strolled along Argyle Street, till he came to Brown Street, where he heard our open-air harmonium being played, and the choir sweetly singing. He stood for some minutes listening, and still in an idle mood he accompanied the crowd to the church where, under the preaching of Christ and Him crucified, he was convinced of sin and led to the Saviour. He has been full of joy ever since. Now he writes to the worker through whom he was led into the light of the Gospel, that he is busily engaged in connection with the new Wesleyan Free Church in Blackburn, and so much respected is he that he has been elected one of the trustees for the new building."

A Good Situation Obtained.—"I Noticed a young woman who came to our meetings regularly, and listened attentively, but she always slipped away before the after-meeting began. At last I got an opportunity of speaking to her about her soul, when she told me that she could not decide for Christ, because she had so heavy a burden to bear. On inquiry, I found that while at her daily work in a mill she got her foot injured, and for six months had not only been suffering great pain, but had been unable to get employment of any kind. I pointed her to the command: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added to you;" but she refused to obey. One night, looking over the meeting, I saw by the peaceful expression on her face, that she had at last obeyed the command of the dear Lord, and on speaking to her afterward I found that it was so. She had yielded herself to Christ with a true and thorough consecration, and almost immediately she got remunerative and suitable employment without seeking for it, though friends had tried in vain to get her work which she could do."

Converted in a Saloon.—Mr. Lakin said: "My father was a distiller, and also kept a bar. When I grew up to be a man, and had a home of my own, I began to feel a strong sense of my sin. In consequence I became very miserable, the burden was more than I could bear. One day, when I was more unhappy and depressed than ever, I thought of the Saviour on the cross. I seemed to see Him, and to hear the great multitude shouting, 'Crucify Him! Crucify Him!' But more than all I seemed to hear my voice crying above them all, 'Crucify Him! Crucify Him!' It was all so plain that I looked around to see if any of the men were about, and seeing no one I went to the house and entered my room, where I threw myself on my knees and cried—'God be merciful to me a sinner!' I knew I rose from my knees a converted man. I went to my wife and told her. She said: 'I wish I was converted too.' 'Well,' I said, 'let us pray together,' and there both of us pleaded before God. I was born in a saloon, and also converted in a saloon. My wife and I proceeded to run off all the intoxicating drink that was in the shop, and to pile the dice and dominoes on the fire, and also to chop up the beer-barrels, until we had made a clean sweep out of all the things that are used in a rum-shop. A friend, hearing of it, came in and said: 'Lakin, if your religion stands for a week I will give you that,' and he held out a gold coin. But, friends, it is now twenty-three years since that, and I never had the slightest desire to turn from the Saviour who has done so much for me."

THE FUTURE CONVERSION OF THE TEN TRIBES.

By Rev. E. J. Hytche.

To Occur After the Epiphany.—The Second Manifestation of Divine Power in Behalf of Abraham's Descendants—A Prior Crisis—In the Wilderness—Their Penitence There—Forgiveness and Restored—Few Conversions by Evangelization to be Expected—The Saturday Night of the Dispensation.

THE conversion of the ten tribes, or Israel proper, will apparently occur after the Epiphany of the Messiah, or our Lord. Hence we read (Isa. 11: 11): "Jehovah shall set His hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush [Ethiopia], and from Elam [Persia], and from Shinar, and from Hamath [North Syria], and from the islands of the sea." Thus from Central Asia, and from the wilds of Africa, the Ephraimites will (Isa. 60: 8) "fly like doves to their cotes."

But before this reinstatement, the ten tribes will have to pass through the furnace of trial, and that in

A SPECIFIED LOCALITY.

Hence we read (Ezek. 20: 35-39), "I will bring you into the wilderness of the people, and there I will plead with you face to face; and I will cause you to pass under the rod; and I will purge out from among you the rebels, and those that have transgressed against me; I will bring them forth out of the country where they sojourn, and they shall not enter into the land of Israel." As one precious result of this decimation of the impenitent Israelites, God (Zeph. 3: 12) "will leave in the midst of them an afflicted and poor people, and they shall trust in the name of Jehovah."

Another prophet was also instructed to refer to the same event; for (Hosea 2: 14) writes: "I will allure her and bring her into and speak comfortably to her." Moreover, he distinctly indicates the part of the desert assigned to Israel, prior to the reinstatement, "I will give her vineyards from thence, and the valley of Achor for a door of hope." This desert is in the vicinity of Jericho, and derived its name from the crime of Achan.

Jeremiah also discriminates between the future recall and conversion of the "house of Israel, and the house of Judah" (Jer. 31: 27), when he points to the time when they shall "sow with the seed of man and with the seed of beast." He also indicates the place of their penitence, for he says in the same prophecy, on the assurance of the Holy Spirit, "I will be the God of all the families of Israel, and they shall be my people. Thus saith Jehovah, the people which were left by the sword found grace in the wilderness, even Israel, whom I went to cause him to rest." Of this "remnant of Israel," God says, "Behold I will bring them from the north country, and gather them from the coasts of the earth." In the desert the ten tribes will approach Him with "weeping and with supplications." And as a result of such the Most High declares that "He that scattered Israel will gather him and keep him as a shepherd doth his flock. For I am a Father to Israel, and Ephraim is my first-born."

It is probably to this episode, in the marvelous history of the ten tribes, that Psalm 80 refers. The prayer of Asaph included a part of the ten tribes, while that of Judah is altogether omitted. In it Asaph says (ver. 1-3), Give ear, O Shepherd of Israel, Thou that leadest Joseph like a flock. Before Ephraim, and Benjamin, and Manasse stir up thy strength, and come for our salvation (margin). Turn us again, O God, and cause thy face to shine upon us, and we shall be saved." The three tribes thus mentioned may be regarded as representatives of the rest of the ten tribes, more especially as they were grouped together west of the tabernacle in their march to Canaan (Num. 2: 17-24).

FORGIVENESS AND RESTORATION.

Nor will this penitential prayer of Ephraim be unanswered. For God declares that (Jer. 31: 18-20 as soon as Ephraim "bemoans himself," and says "turn thou me and I shall be turned," He will reply, "Is Ephraim my dear son? Is he a pleasant child? Since I spoke against him, I do earnestly remember him still, therefore my bowels are troubled for him; I will surely have mercy upon him." Nay, in the very desert (Hos. 2: 15, 16) "she shall sing as in the days of her youth, and as in the day when she came up out of the land of Egypt. And it shall be at that day, saith Jehovah, that thou shalt call me Ishi [My Husband], and shalt call Me no more Baali" [My Lord].

If this outline of the separate conversions of the houses of Judah and of Ephraim, consequent on the Second Advent, be a right exegesis of unfulfilled prophecy, it follows that it is of the Hebrews of both sections who will become loyal to Jesus during this dispensation. It is well to know this predicted fact; for worldlings and Laodicean Christians sneer at the comparatively few Hebrews who are converted through the operations of the Jewish Evangelization Societies. But such abortive efforts as regards the Jews at large is only another proof of the truth of prophecy, since the Holy Spirit indicated by two of His penmen (Isa. 10: 22 and Rom., 9: 27) that "only a remnant should be saved." If then the Jews as a nation, during this reign of Gentileism had recognized the claims of Jesus, the very fact would not only have shown the fallacy of prophecy, but would have thrown doubt on the Pauline doctrine that at God's appointed time (Rom. 11: 25, 26), namely, when the "fulness of the Gentiles be come in, all Israel shall be saved."

No Jewish evangelist then should desist from his labors, however discouraging the present results, since the same Apostle who affirms that of the mass of the Jews, only "a remnant shall be saved" before the epiphany of Christ, also asks as respects his brethren (Rom. 10: 14, 15), "How shall they believe in Him of whom they have not heard," and how shall they hear without a preacher?

From these facts as to the future of the house of Israel and of the house of Judah, two lessons are derivable, never more important now that we have reached of this dispensation: First, The Holy Spirit has not revoked the injunction (Ps. 112: 6), "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem." Now really this command is as binding on the Church as any other commandment, and probably because it has not been obeyed solves the enigma why the Church is in its present Laodicean state, seeing that it is said, "They shall prosper who love thee."

Second, The salvation of the Jews materially affects the future of the Gentiles. If there is any prophetic fact more certain than another it is this: that the world will never be converted before the Jews have acknowledged Jesus as their promised Messiah. . . . until then, Gentileism must go on from bad to worse, until it culminates in universal apostasy and the worship of Antichrist. But when Israel is converted by the personal appearance of the Word of God, it will be to the Gentiles at large as (Rom. 11: 15) "life from the dead." Thus, happily, at the very midnight of this world—when (Isa. 40: 2) "Darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the Gentiles—the glory of Jehovah shall be seen upon Israel."

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Protracted Contest in the Illinois Legislature over the Senatorship ended on May 19th in the re-election of General John A. Logan. The Legislature was a tie on the question, and has been steadily casting its vote for four months without coming to a decision. Mr. Morrison, the Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in the last House was General Logan's chief opponent, but at the last the Democrats voted solidly for Judge Tree. The contest, though one of the most protracted ever known, was conducted with less acrimony than is usual in such cases, and General Logan, in returning thanks, bore witness to the honorable character of the Democratic opposition. He said that he respected Mr. Morrison politically and socially; they had always been and he hoped they always would be friends. The Tribune intimates that General Logan will go to the United States Senate as an opponent of the South and of the administration, but the new Senator did not in his speech so define his policy. He said: "I do not go to Washington with any fire burning in my bosom or a feeling of antagonism to any party or the present administration. I shall endeavor to represent you fairly and honestly, and stand by you in all which I believe is right."

The Hon. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey, died on May 20th, after a long and painful illness, chiefly produced by his arduous labors and close attention to duty while acting as President Arthur's Secretary of State. He was sixty-eight years of age, had twice represented his State in the United States Senate, and had been offered the post of Minister to England by General Grant but had declined it. He was an eminent Christian man, and was not long ago elected President of the American Bible Society. We hope next week to publish his portrait and a sketch of his life.

An Association is Asking for Subscriptions to supply newspapers with short, terse articles to be published once a week until Congress meets. The articles will be directed to the advocacy of the continuation of the silver coinage. If the subscriptions are received, it may be supposed that the articles will appear; but people who read them and people who are inclined to subscribe, will do well to seriously consider the subject from a patriotic standpoint. The national credit is already imperilled by the resources of the Government being largely in coins which other nations will not receive, and which our own citizens, for reasons of their own, will not use. The stock of these coins now in the Treasuries is surely large enough, and sixteen millions more will be added before December, when, in spite of the short, terse articles, it may be hoped Congress will decide to discontinue the coinage until there is a demand for it.

The New Dispatch Boat Dolphin Failed a third time in her trial trip on May 18th. It was a heated crank-pin this time that was responsible for the failure. The boat had not reached the starting-point in the Sound at which her test voyage was to commence, when the engines were stopped, and the engineer reported the mishap. She was then turned about and brought back to her dock. Mr. Whitney considers these repeated failures a reason for increased caution, and demands that before accepting the ship she shall, in addition to the fifteen-knot test in the Sound, be sent on a sea-voyage properly loaded. He will not insist on her maximum speed at sea, but will be satisfied with twelve knots an hour, and promises that the Government will bear the expense of the voyage if the vessel is accepted.

The Civil Service Law is being Executed to the satisfaction of at least one of the commissioners. Mr. Gregory said last week to a reporter that all the complaints made to the commissioners of violation of the law had been investigated, and in every case the allegation had proved false. He stated that the law covered only fifteen thousand appointments, but it forbade partisan procedure throughout the entire service, though the commissioners had no jurisdiction outside the classified list. Mr. Gregory said that in the Atlantic States, and in some of the Western States, the registers were overcrowded with names of candidates examined and found eligible, and in those States examinations had been discontinued for the present.

No New Development in the Anglo-Russian difficulty was reported last week. It was stated, but not authoritatively, that there was another hitch in the negotiations, but as Mr. Gladstone declined to give any information, nothing definite was known. It is, however, an ominous fact that the Czar has resumed his war councils, and that the British troops which were preparing to return home from Egypt were detained there pending further orders.

Victor Hugo, the Great French Poet, died on Friday last. He was eighty-three years of age. His life was a most romantic one. He was the son of General Hugo, a devoted Bonapartist. While a mere child he commenced writing poetry, and attained considerable eminence in that department before he grew to manhood. Louis Philippe made him a Peer of France. When Louis Napoleon seized the crown, Victor Hugo was one of his most determined and persistent foes, and though the Emperor banished him, the poet never ceased to lampoon "Napoleon the Little," and sent out volume after volume mercilessly ridiculing the man of December. On the fall of the Empire Hugo returned to Paris and was elected to the Legislature. He was the most conspicuous of the group of men who opposed the execution of the Communists, though he denounced their crime. His writings are very numerous, and show how powerful and prolific was his mind. "Les Misérables" is probably the work by which he is best known in this country.

Disensions are Again Reported in the British Cabinet. The Radical members, Mr. Chamberlain and Sir Charles Dilke, are opposed to Earl Derby, the Marquis of Hartington, and the other aristocratic members on the question of the renewal of the Coercion Acts in Ireland. Mr. John Morley, a scholarly Radical member of Parliament, is denouncing the renewal of the coercive measures, and it is expected that when the subject is discussed at the assembling of Parliament after the holidays, Mr. Morley will press his motion, and that it will have the support of all the Radicals in the House, all the Irish members, and some of the Conservatives. The embarrassing position in which Mr. Chamberlain and Sir Charles Dilke will find themselves if they vote against their Radical friends is easily realized, and predictions are made that rather than be so situated they will resign.

The Dower of a Princess was a Subject brought before the British Parliament on May 14th. Mr. Gladstone proposed that an annuity worth $30,000 should be provided for the Princess Beatrice, the Queen's youngest daughter, who is about to be married. The proposal appeared to be unwelcome to some of the members, who naturally reflected that the taxes this year, owing to the Soudan war and the preparations for a war with Russia, are unusually heavy, and that business men are in great financial straits and the poor of the country are enduring much misery. One of the members bluntly said he thought the Queen should provide the marriage portion for her daughter, and moved that the House refuse to vote the large sum asked for. Ultimately, however, the money was voted. As the bridegroom is very poor, it is expected that he will live in England, and that a well-paid, secure office will be found for him.

A Naturalization Difficulty Between Our Government and that of Germany awaits diplomatic adjustment. It has arisen out of the expulsion from Germany of some students who were the sons of German parents who had resided here and taken out naturalization papers. At present the German Government claims that Germans who have naturalized themselves in the United States shall be held to have forfeited their American citizenship if they return to Germany and reside there two years. If they have sons born in Germany they will be liable to military duty, and if they have sons born in America, the German Government will not claim those, but reserves to itself the right, in the interests of public order, to refuse them permission to reside in Germany or to study at the universities. Mr. Kasson has vainly endeavored to rectify this difficulty, and leaves it as a legacy to his successor.

Burton and Cunningham, the Two Men charged with being concerned in the dynamite explosions in London, were sentenced to penal servitude for life on May 18th. The evidence against the men was conclusive. The judge summed up decidedly against the prisoners, and the jury were only fifteen minutes considering their verdict. Burton requested permission to make an address in his own defense. His pleas were powerful, and his argument was skillfully constructed, but it had one fatal defect—it contradicted his previous statements, and was based on the evidence given in court. The two men, strongly guarded, were sent to the convict prison at Chatham, where for some months they will be employed, with other prisoners, in picking oakum.

Messrs. Smith and Studd, the Collegiate Missionaries to China and their companions, have again been heard from. A cable dispatch says: "When Messrs. Smith and Studd and the other Cambridge men passed through Singapore on their way to China, His Highness the Maharajah of Johol, became aware of it, and immediately sent an invitation to them to visit Johol, where he would have entertained them with his usual hospitality. The short stay the steamer made prevented any of them accepting his kind invitation. His Highness has just given portions of land to the Episcopalians and to the English Presbyterians, whereon to build churches and mission houses."

Another Offer from Mr. Whipple, of Boston, Mass., is advertised on the last page of this number. It is not our habit to call attention to advertisements, but we do so in this case because the offer is made in the interest of the public, and with a sincere desire to do good. Mr. Whipple is an earnest Christian worker, who is anxious to bring souls to the Saviour, and we happen to know of several cases in which books borrowed from him have been blessed of God.

Donations to the Fund for Supplying Colored ministers in the South and others with the CHRISTIAN HERALD have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $25.50. That sum comprises the following remittances: From Lewiston, Me., $2; Grover, Kan., 50 cents; Frederick, Ind., $2; London, Ont., $4; Santa Barbara, Cal., $5; Tioga Centre, N. Y., $3; New Orleans, La., $1; Gambier, O., $5; Anonymous, $1 and $2. All the ministers' names which were on this list last year have been replaced there for another year, through the kindness of our friends, and several new names have been added belonging to preachers whose claims on our consideration we deemed the strongest among those sent to us. The other names we keep on hand in case of our receiving other donations. We are thankful to learn that the paper is proving helpful, and pray that God will continue to use it for His glory.

The Issue of the Revised Old Testament last week occasioned less excitement than was caused four years ago when the New Testament was given to the public. One reason assigned for the diminished interest was that it had been announced that the changes were comparatively few, and another reason for the smaller number of sales was that the lowest price for which a revised Bible could be bought was one dollar, and that is small type and poorly bound. The book is, however, like the Revised New Testament, a decided improvement on the Authorized Version. There is, of course, a prejudice against it at present because people do not like to see favorite passages altered, but truth is the first consideration in a matter of such vital importance as the Bible, and it is admitted that both in the Old Testament and the New, the Revised Version is a more accurate translation than that now in use. The revisers are not disappointed at the reception of their work; it was fifty years before the Authorized Version superseded the one in use when it was issued. That was denounced by conservative preachers as this has been.

Bishop Taylor and His Party Report Themselves well and happy. In a letter to the Christian Advocate, dated Congo, March 13th, Bishop Taylor describes his reception in Monrovia, where he held a series of services. He had a hearty welcome also in Liberia, where he stayed a month and preached over fifty-five times. He concludes as follows: "I and my party are all well and happy, within three days of our destined post. Glory to God! I sent two of our men on, a month ago, to Loanda, to prepare our way—Dr. Summers and Eli Chateau. I received a letter from Dr. Summers this morning. He had presented my letters to the Governor of Angola, who extends to us a welcome to all parts of the province that we may wish to occupy for our missionary purposes, and to afford us every facility in his power. I left Brothers Willis, Northam, and Stuckelmann, and Sister Willis and little son at Mayumba, two degrees south of the equator, to plant a mission there. This field is immeasurable, and open doors in every direction invite us to come in."

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Conducted Services on May 17th in the Tompkins Avenue Congregational Church, Brooklyn. The afternoon service was for women only; the night service was for women only. The church was crowded at each service, and in response to Mr. Moody's invitation, large numbers rose to ask for special prayer, and waited afterward for private conversation.

The American Bible Society held its Sixty-ninth annual meeting on May 14th, its report showing that the receipts of the year for general purposes were $587,914.34. The payments for manufacturing, and for all other general purposes, were $619,882.58. For the foreign work of the society, to be expended during the coming year, the amount of $172,850 has been appropriated. Since its organization, the society has issued 45,440,206 copies of the Bible. Three hundred and fifty-eight persons have been employed to distribute the Scriptures in foreign lands, the average term of actual service being somewhat more than six months each. To meet expenses incurred in translating, publishing, and distributing the Scriptures in foreign lands, the amount of $142,292.58 was paid to the society's correspondents and agents.

A Stone Unfit for Use was supplied last week by the contractor for the new Federal building to be constructed in Brooklyn, N. Y. The ground has been cleared and the foundation of the building dug out, but when the stone arrived for laying the foundation, the superintendent pronounced it unfit for the use to which it was to be applied. The work on the building was suspended, and the contractor was given the alternative of supplying suitable material or throwing up the contract. As the building will cost a vast sum of money, which has already been voted by Congress, the superintendent did quite right in refusing to allow a foundation stone to be put in, which in his judgment was unfit for the purpose. We can but wish that parents, clergymen, and teachers would be similarly careful when the work of character building is going on under their superintendence. Disaster to the living temple carries with it eternal misery (1 Cor. 3:10, 11).

The Capsizing of the Earl of Dalhousie, a new iron ship, in the bay of San Francisco, on May 12th, is reported in the Alta. It states that the disaster was due to the ship being utterly without ballast. "She was high out of water, and her hull presented a broadside to the winds which her top-heavy condition could not resist. Her masts and spars were as determining weights to topple her when the force of the wind came full upon her long and broad hull, and over she went by the pressure of the wind, with her top-heaviness as auxiliary force. A sufficient quantity of ballast would have held her safe against the fury of the blast." There are many moral and spiritual wrecks due to a similar cause. There is no sight more gladdening than that of young converts overflowing with joy because they have found peace in Christ; and when some of them go on to claim that they have been made perfect and free from sin, we cannot but rejoice if there are some sinless beings in the world; but experience unhappily gives abundant reason to "rejoice with trembling," and to hope that there may be ballast in the ship whose masts are so tall and beautiful (Mark 4:16, 17).

Sight has been Given to a Boy Blind from his birth in West Virginia. At a recent examination of the pupils in the Institution for the Blind, at Romney, W. Va., an eminent surgeon of Wheeling noticed a blind boy of remarkable intelligence. In answer to the surgeon's questions, the boy said he was fifteen years old, and had been blind from his birth. The surgeon believed that if an operation was performed the boy would see, and the boy gladly consented. The operation was performed with complete success. The result is curious. The boy had been so long used to obtaining all his impressions of the outside world by other senses that his sight was of no use to him. The most familiar objects presented to his eyes were not recognized. He did not know a key from a book by the sense of sight alone, and he still preferred to rely upon his senses of touch, hearing, and smelling. He will doubtless soon change that, and make use of the higher sense which through the surgeon's skill he has acquired. He will not be like Christians to whom God has given faith yet who still desire to walk by sight, instead of being guided by the higher light (1 Cor. 5:7).

A Fatal Leap from the Brooklyn Bridge was made on May 19th by a professional swimmer named Robert E. Odlum. He descended in an upright position until within fifty feet of the surface of the river, and was then noticed turning slightly, so that his back was toward the water instead of his feet. He sank in that position, and immediately his friend, Paul Boyton, who was watching him from a tug, dived after him. Odlum rose to the surface, but his head hung on his chest, and his neck seemed to have lost all power to support it. He was lifted into a boat, but he died in about half an hour. An autopsy showed that he had broken five ribs and ruptured the left lung by the force with which he struck the water. He had previously made several high jumps into the water—once as high as one hundred and ten feet. Before taking his fatal leap he boasted that his previous feats had not injured him in any way, but at the autopsy it was proved that he was mistaken. Evidence was found of internal injuries produced by his former exploits, which helped to make his leap from the Brooklyn Bridge a fatal one. There was no money staked upon it. Talking with friends before he started, he said, "I am going to do it because I know I can do it. It will be the greatest jump on record, and it will make me famous." The foolhardiness of the leap was a general subject of conversation after the event, and most people agreed in so characterizing it, yet few people ever reflect on the fact that a similar foolhardy persistence in daring defiance of God and His laws is common enough, and must inevitably end in eternal disaster (Eccles. 8:11-13).

A Warning to Policemen was administered by Recorder Smyth, in a New York Court, on May 18th. Police Sergeant Crowley, who had the week before been convicted by a jury of a diabolical outrage on a young girl, was brought up for sentence. The Recorder sentenced him to be imprisoned with hard labor for seventeen years and six months. It was a sad scene that followed, when the prisoner's aged father, his brother and sister, and wife and child gathered around him, weeping, to bid him a long good-by. Crowley took his little daughter on his knee and kissed her, and wept over her, and then the final parting came. It is impossible not to sympathize with the innocent people made miserable by the sentence, but for the guilty man compassion would be wasted. He richly deserved his sentence, and it was time the police learned that the people have some rights policemen must respect. They club inoffensive citizens, they get drunk and shoot people, they suborn perjury, and are guilty of crimes innumerable, escaping punishment through political influence, but it seems they must not expect immunity when they outrage young girls. Crowley apparently had made the mistake of drawing a wrong inference from the escapes from punishment he and other members of the police force have had. It is not safe to conclude that because the penalty of crime is often evaded, that it will never fall. God has explicitly warned those who sin against Him against making that mistake (Prov. 29:1).

A Marriage Ceremony under Difficulties was performed recently in Dakota under peculiar circumstances. The bridal party were on their way to the Judge's office, when they came to a river which usually it was easy to cross, but they found it so swollen by the rains that on that day no passage could be made. Several people were on the opposite bank, and after some shouting, one of them was persuaded to go for the Judge. He soon returned with that functionary, who came down to the water's edge, and the bridal party being ranged on the other side of the river, he proceeded to scream out the questions, and the candidates shouted the responses. The Judge afterward filed this certificate of the marriage: "Be it known that A. H. H— and S. A. Z— were lawfully united in the holy bonds of matrimony in town 124, north of range 63 west, near the northwest corner of said town, and on the south side of Elm Creek, it being bank full of water." The strange circumstances of the marriage, it appears, do not impair its validity. The novelty of the ceremony is not likely to be forgotten by either bride or bridegroom, and it may be hoped that as they think of it they will not forget that they are tending daily nearer to another river which must be crossed; but as at their union the river proved no bar to their happiness, neither need the river of death, if through faith in Christ they have assurance of reunion beyond (Isa. 43:2).

THE GOOD ANANIAS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And there was a certain disciple at Damascus, named Ananias; and to him said the Lord in a vision, Ananias. And he said, Behold, I am here, Lord."

AT this season we are called upon to think of foreign missions. There was a time when Christian people thought it idle to send missionaries to the heathen, but that time only survives in regretful memories. We remember reading that in a Scotch assembly a Moderate minister, famous in his day, talked of the proposal to send missionaries to the heathen as the greatest absurdity to which he had ever listened; one who was of another mind cried out, "Reach me that Bible;" and when the Bible was opened, and he began to point to its teachings, the caviller was silenced. Are there any such cavillers yet alive? If there are, they are wise enough to hold their tongues. No reviewer in our day would dare to sneer at "consecrated cobblers;" for they remember Carey, and tremble in their shoes. Brethren, we are to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature. This is our Captain's orders, and it would be treason to disobey.

What subjects have risen before me while thinking of a discourse upon missions! Many grand and exciting themes have tempted me. The coming of the Lord, the conquest of nations to His sway, the reign of peace, the overthrow of falsehood, and all manner of glorious topics invite me; but something less ambitious has won my thoughts. It lies upon my heart not to speak of things upon a great scale, above our present power, but to talk of practical matters within the reach of

COMMON CHRISTIANS.

I shall not, therefore, treat of the Millennial reign, but of the kingdom of Christ in your soul and mine, and of how we can increase His dominions and cause His kingdom to come with power. I have selected my text that we may see what can be done by private Christians, and learn how we can personally serve the Lord and become links in the great chain of His gracious dispensation. The mass of us cannot go abroad as missionaries, but we can all be messengers for Christ in our own city. It seems to me that Ananias may serve as a typical person, and that his history may furnish us with many useful lessons.

I. First, let us think a little about

THE MAN.

He is described as "a certain disciple at Damascus, named Ananias." We hear of him this once, and we know nothing more about him. He comes forward at a critical point in Paul's life; executes for him a very useful office, and then disappears.

We remark of him, first, that he was simply a private person. He is not described as pastor, or evangelist, or even as deacon or elder of a church; yet this private person, obscure in life, and without special distinction in the church, was the channel for communicating the Holy Ghost to the great apostle of the Gentiles. For the time being he became one of the most important persons in sacred history.

Ananias is especially said to have been a disciple. Dwell on that title.

HE WAS A LEARNER,

he sat at Jesus' feet and learned of Him, and therefore was ready to instruct Saul of Tarsus. A true disciple is also a follower; he is an imitator of his Master. Christ's discipleship is always practical, it is of the heart and of the hand as well as of the head; all these were wanted in the mission of Ananias to Paul. Oh, brothers and sisters, we must take care that we keep up the character of disciples. May we bear fruit, so shall we be His disciples. Let us never dream of knowing more than our Master teaches us; let us never think that we are perfect, so that we have no more to learn. He who gets beyond a disciple rises beyond his proper place.

Paul tells us, in Acts 22: 12, that Ananias was "a devout man." Nowadays we greatly need more devout men, men of prayer, men who dwell with God in secret; devoted men, men of devotion; for the strength of the spirit of man lies in fellowship with the Spirit of God. The devout man may not be more sombre than others; why should he be? He certainly will not be more anxious to make a display; but it will soon be seen that he is more

FULL OF POWER.

The Spirit of God dwells with the devout man, and fits him for the Lord's service. Let us aim to abide with God, that we may be employed by Him.

Paul also tells us that Ananias had "a good report" of all the Jews which dwell in Damascus. They hated Christians, but they could not help respecting this devout man. We are to win influence over our fellow-men by an upright character, and a generous behavior; so that if they wish to speak against us, they may find no matter for accusation except it be concerning our zeal for the Lord our God. Oh, that our church-members were all men of spotless character! Oh, that all professors were well reported of! The Church is injured in her efforts for the conversion of the world by the inconsistencies of certain of her members.

Another qualification of Ananias for the work which the Lord put upon him was his general thoughtfulness for the Church of God. This comes out in his own words. It is evident that he thought about the persecutions of his brethren. He says concerning Paul, the persecutor, "I have heard by many of this man." No doubt he had frequently made Paul the subject of conversation; for he was grieved at the afflictions of the saints in Jerusalem, and he feared for his brethren in Damascus. All the servants of God who are what they should be take a great interest in the condition of the Church of God; they bear one another's burdens, and share each other's griefs. They do not go in and out of their pews on a Sunday, and then fancy that their connection with the Church is ended; but they bear upon their hearts the interests of Zion. All that belongs to Jesus belongs to me if I belong to Jesus. All the interests of His kingdom are my interests if I am truly walking in fellowship with my Lord. See, then, the man Ananias; there is nothing brilliant about him, he by no means claims distinguished rank; but he is, what I pray we may all be, a vessel fit for the Master's use, cleansed, prepared, consecrated, set apart unto God. Hence he was used of the Lord.

II. Now, secondly, let us consider

HIS POSTURE.

This is seen at once in his answer to the divine call. The voice said to him, "Ananias," and he answered, "Behold, I am here, Lord." Do you not think that God speaks to us many times and gets no answer? When your heart hears a rebuke for a certain omission, do you respond by repairing that omission? Or if it be a rebuke for sin committed, is your heart humbled at once, and ready to respond by putting away the sin? If there be a call to duty, or a secret prompting to sacrifice, does your spirit say at once, "Here am I?"

He was also ready. "Here am I," said he. He did not ask, "What for?" but "Here am I,"

READY FOR ANYTHING

Oh, that our hearts might be in such a state that were it for living or for dying, for giving or for losing, for suffering or for working, the same response would come forth, "Here am I, make what use Thou canst of me, my Lord; I shall count it an honor and a joy if Thou wilt send me anywhere, to any one, with any message, at any time; here am I." Oh, brothers and sisters, are we free from reservations? Whatever the Lord saith to us, are we prepared to do it? What drawbacks there often are! What hindrances to consecration, what reserves for the flesh; but blessed shall that man be who has no answer to give to God's call but just "Here am I." Ready, ay ready!

Again, I think his posture was one which I can only describe by using the phrase that he was all there. "Ananias," "HERE AM I," said he. Would not some Christians be compelled to say if they described themselves truthfully, "I am not here—Thou callest me, but I am not here"? Is it not so, that sometimes in prayer we are not there? In singing the praises of God how often it happens that the mind is wandering—we are not there. I know there is such a thing as preaching, and teaching, and doing service for God with a portion of yourself, and it is not a fact that all that is within you is stirred up to the service of the Lord.

I often see upon a sunny wall a chrysalis, and when I go to take it down, I find that the summer's sun has shone upon it and the insect has developed, and left nothing but an empty case behind. How often in the pew we find the chrysalis of a man, but where is the man himself? Wait till to-morrow morning, and see him in his shop; there is the man; or, to follow up the figure, there is the butterfly with all its wings. Wait till you find our friend engaged in secular employment to his own advantage, and then you will see what he is made of; but in the work of the Lord he is not worth his salt. But oh, brethren, if ever a man ought to be all there, it is when he is called to the service of God. He should marshal all his faculties, and every faculty should reply, "Here am I."

III. Now, thirdly, we are to look to

HIS DIRECTION.

When he had thus said, "Here am I!" the Lord gave him his orders in detail. I do not say that the Lord will give us orders verbally, as He did to Ananias; and I would have you take heed that you do not mistake whims of your own mind for the voice of God; but I do say that whatsoever your hand findeth to do you are to do it with your might, and believe that God's voice is calling you to that service which His providence places in your way. God still guides His servants when they are willing to be guided.

Ananias had his orders as to where he should go. The Lord said, "Arise, and go into the street which is called Straight, and inquire in the house of Judas." The Lord knows the street and He knows the house where the sinner lives who is to be blessed by you. Ananias was also told when to go; he was to arise and go at once. God's errands are so important that we must not delay in their performance. Whenever a man proposes to obey in a week's time, he confesses himself to be disobedient for that time. He who, when he receives a message delivers it at once, with the impression of his call fresh upon him, will deliver it with authority and power. Ananias was also told why he was to go; he was to go to Saul of Tarsus; "for behold he prayeth." The servant was to go because the Master was there already. God had inspired the prayer of the blinded persecutor, and now he was about to answer it by Ananias. Where God has ploughed we are to sow. Of that preparation you know but little, but your own duty is clear enough. The Lord who prepares you to speak has prepared him to listen. In fact, in this case Paul was so prepared that he had "seen in a vision a man named Ananias coming in." If we are always ready for the Master's work, we shall be surprised to find how beautifully he makes us fit in with His providence and His grace. God sends the right messenger to the right man—Ananias to Saul.

He had further directions; for he was told what he was to do when he found Saul; he was to lay his hand on him. There is a great deal in the touch of an earnest man. If you stand half a mile off from a man, and throw the Gospel at him, you will miss him; but if you go close to him, and lay hold upon him, giving him a hearty grip of the hand, and show that you have an affection for him, you will, by God's blessing, lead him in the right way. You must come into heart contact if you are to influence the man.

"But," say you, "if I did thus grasp a man and speak with him, I could not open his eyes." Could Ananias do so? Yet the Lord worked by Ananias, and why not by you? Your instructions are in the Scriptures; follow them!

IV. But now, fourthly, good Ananias, excellent man as he was, had and so when he was bidden to go he said, "Lord, I have heard by many of this man, how much evil he hath done to Thy saints at Jerusalem; and were he hath authority from the chief priests to bind all that call upon Thy name."

These difficulties were very natural. Saul's conversion was astonishing to the last degree; Ananias had Saul on the brain through terror of his cruelties, and now he was to have Saul on the heart through joy of his repentance. He had heard such dreadful stories of the ferocious persecutor, that as soon as he heard the word "Saul" it took his breath away. There is a promise that the leopard shall lie down with the kid, but it is not surprising that the kid should at first shrink from the monster; and so this plain, simple-minded man was startled at the idea that he was to visit the malicious man who had sought the lives of Christians.

But, observe, that his difficulty was unfounded. If he had thought for a minute he would have concluded that if Saul prayed he must have ceased to persecute. Do we not lose opportunities of doing good by dwelling too much upon the past characters of those to whom we are sent? Do we not say, "I have heard of this man that he is a desperate, drunken, swearing fellow; I shall not go near him"? My dear friend, this is the man who most needs your aid; and who knows but at the very time when you go to him the Lord may be dealing with his conscience, so as to set before you an open door? Those who have been for a long time very hopeful are usually the most hopeless of cases; but utterly hopeless people are often the most hopeful when we have faith enough to approach them. Do not bury a man before he is dead; hope that so long as a sinner lives he may yet live unto God. Be hopeful that He who placed this sinner in your way and you in the sinner's way, has designs of love which are about to be accomplished.

V. Concerning Ananias, I want to remind you, in the fifth place, of in the work. The Lord reassured His servant first by reminding him of the doctrine of election. God said to him, "He is a chosen vessel unto me." Some read it "he is a choice vessel," as if there was originally something in Paul which rendered him a choice person; but the apostle himself does not put it so, for he describes Ananias as saying, "The God of our fathers hath chosen thee that thou shouldst know His will."

Moreover, the Lord put aside the fears of Ananias by telling him that He had chosen this man to a great purpose. "He is a chosen vessel unto me, to bear my name among the Gentiles." A great sinner is to be made a great saint. A great opposer is to become a great laborer. Who knows how largely God may use the sinner whom we seek to save? Who knows what may be in any man, or in any child? You, dear teachers in the school, may be teaching Lutherans, or Melancthons; you may be instructing in those young girls holy women, who shall serve the Lord abundantly. You are therefore be not careless in your service. To you is given not gold, nor silver, nor precious stones, to fashion, but immortal spirits, that shall glorify Christ on earth and in heaven.

And then, to remove all difficulty from the mind of Ananias, the Lord told him that He would go with him—"For I will show him how great things he must suffer for My Name's sake."

You are bidden to teach the Gospel to an individual who has been very hardened, and you fear that you have no strength for such an undertaking; and, therefore, you cry, "Lord, I cannot show this man the truth." The Lord replies, "I will show him."

VI. I must ask your attention for a minute or two to the sixth point, and that is, the difficulties of Ananias being taken away; observe to his Master's orders. It was prompt obedience; "Ananias went his way and entered into the house." No longer hesitating nor delaying, he went his way with all speed. His obedience was exact; he entered into the house, and, putting his hands on him, said, "Brother Saul." He did as he had been bidden. There is a great point in that. Mind that what you preach is the Gospel of the Lord Jesus, and that what you do is by order from the throne, and that it is carried out in the Spirit's power, for you cannot expect the Lord to bless your message if you alter it.

Then, see how loving he was. "Brother Saul," he said. Saul of Tarsus would not have made two bites of Ananias a little time before if he had fallen into his power; but now the words "Brother Saul" are sweet to his ear. Love is the method of grace. You cannot win souls by putting on a morose countenance and repelling all approaches; but it must be "Brother Saul." See also how wisely he spoke. It was given him in the same hour what he should speak. He did not pompously say, "I am an ordained official, and therefore speak with great dignity," but he began, "The Lord, even Jesus, that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest, hath sent me." It was wise thus to sink himself in his authority. He speaks most wisely all through, and speaks precisely the right words. When he alludes to Paul's former course, he only gives a hint of it—"The Lord that appeared to thee in the way as thou camest." He does not say, "as thou camest to persecute us," but he allowed conscience to do its own work.

Notice how thoroughly faithful Ananias was. He said, "Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins." The tendency with many good evangelists is to say nothing upon that point. The main thing is to get this man to be a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, but to say, "Arise, and be baptized," is not that far less important? Brethren, we have nothing to do with altering Christ's message; but are bound to deliver it as a whole, without addition or diminution. The tendency everywhere is to say, "Baptism should not be mentioned; it is sectarian." Who said so? If our Lord commanded it, who dares to call it sectarian? We are not commanded to preach a part of the Gospel, but the whole of the Gospel; and this Ananias did. Is it not written, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved"? Why omit one clause?

VII. For, lastly, observe the result of what Ananias said. The

for Paul received his sight at once, and was comforted at once, and baptized at once. But the results were most extensive; for this Paul became a preacher of the Gospel to every land; as the apostle of the Gentiles he brought multitudes to Jesus. It was a splendid work that Ananias did that morning; for to this day the testimony of Paul to the cross of Christ is ringing over Europe, and throughout the whole world. Where would we have been as a nation if it had not been for the apostle of the Gentiles? Everybody is not a Paul, but yet you may find a Paul among your converts.

THE PEARL FISHER

standing on the rock plunges deep into the sea; he does not know whether or no he shall bring up a pearl that will decorate an emperor's dia-dem, but he searches the deeps in that hope; and why should not he bring up such a treasure as well as anybody else? No matter though the fisherman himself may be coarse, and ragged, and rugged, yet he may light upon a prized pearl. And you, whoever you may be, I charge you, in the name of the eternal God, plunge yourself into your work with whole-hearted devotion, and you shall yet discover some hidden jewel which shall adorn Immanuel's diadem. So may it be with you, dear friends, for Christ's sake. Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

ACROSS THE CHASM

is a fascinating story by an anonymous writer, who is likely to become a favorite with the public. The plot of the story is simple, and the incidents those of ordinary life, but there is a piquancy in its style and a gentle mocking railery in it at some foibles which are very common blemishes on the society of our time. The object of the book which we think the author has in view is to convince people on both sides of the chasm that there is more good in the other than either believes. The faults of Northerners and those of Southerners are not concealed nor excused, but the author shows that, as Carlyle said of Sterling, the faults are only the alloy of the character, which has plenty of gold in it. There are some capital sketches of character in it very truthfully drawn. Price, $1. Published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons.

A CHILD'S GARDEN OF VERSES,

by Robert Louis Stevenson, contains over sixty bright and fresh short rhymes for the little ones. They are very simple and a marked improvement on the silly gibberish that has for so long done duty as nursery rhymes. The following little piece is a specimen of the book, and shows that the author is well able to enter into a child's feelings:

"In winter I get up at night
And dress by yellow candle-light.
In summer, quite the other way,
I have to go to bed by day.

"I have to go to bed and see
The birds still hopping on the tree,
Or hear the grown-up people's feet
Still going past me in the street.

"And does it not seem hard to you,
When all the sky is clear and blue,
And I should like so much to play,
To have to go to bed by day?"

We know many little voices which would very feelingly recite such a rhyme, and there are many more of the same category. "The Land of Nod," especially, will be a favorite in the nurseries. Pp. 101. Price, $1. Published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

OATS OR WILD OATS,

by Rev. J. M. Buckley, LL.D. No introduction is needed from us to this brilliant writer. Dr. Buckley is already well known to American readers in all the States by his robust common-sense and his remarkable power of expressing his views in forcible and incisive language. When Dr. Buckley speaks or writes we always give him our attention. We may not always agree with him, but we are sure to learn something, and are sure to be interested by the thoughts of a powerful and original mind. In this book Dr. Buckley appears at his best. He sets out to give advice to young men, and he gives it in a plain, manly, sympathetic style. The advice in itself is valuable, and it is given in a manner very different from that generally adopted by writers who undertake that thankless and generally useless duty.

Dr. Buckley explains the object of his book in his preface. He says that when a young man, having no conscious predilection for any special pursuit, he made several unwise choices and false starts in life. Since then, especially since he became the editor of an influential journal, he has come in contact with many young men having similar uncertainty of opinion and instability of action. His advice was often solicited ed in individual cases, and was given with a readiness born of his recollections of his own painful experience. These letters of advice are now collected, and a few chapters on special objects added, his intention being to explain the principles of business and the characteristics of the great leading branches, to give a general view of the chief forms of honorable, useful, and remunerative pursuits, and generally to treat of health, morals, social life, economy, and intellectual growth.

Commencing with school and college, Dr. Buckley impresses on his readers the importance of using an opportunity never to return, and gives much needed practical advice about the choice of friends, mental work, hazing, etc. Following are chapters on Beginning Business and How to Succeed in Business. Going into detail, he describes the various pursuits in life—farming, teaching, public speaking, and the professions of medicine, insurance, the law, banking, journalism, etc., describing the qualities essential for success in each. The remaining eighty pages are devoted to general advice, valuable to young men in any of those occupations. They are concerned with: Self-Improvement; Care of the Health; Economy; Society and Amusements; Sowing Wild Oats, and the Young Man's Religion. Dr. Buckley points his remarks and renders his book doubly interesting at the same time by striking incidents of real life from history and from his own wide experience. A most valuable work it is, from which there is good reason to hope that many young men will derive benefit, and be saved from blunders the consequences of which are often ruinous. Pp. 306. A REVIVAL IN AUSTRALIA.

THE secretary of the Melbourne Young Women's Christian Association writes: "During the past month we have had the pleasure of welcoming at our 'rooms' Mr. and Mrs. Matthews, with some of the aborigines from their mission station at Maloga. All friends of mission work will be greatly cheered and encouraged by hearing of the wonderful outpouring of God's Holy Spirit upon these poor heathen of our own land. We ourselves are witnesses of the reality of the change which has taken place in them.

Three years ago we spent several months at the mission station (Maloga), and obtained a good insight into the character and habits of the people. At that time the work appeared very hard, as scarcely any of the men were converted, and only a few of the women gave evidence of having been truly 'born again.' Some of the latter, however, held a little prayer-meeting every week, when prayer was specially made for the men. Mr. and Mrs. Matthews, finding that after years of toil there was so little sign of harvest, began to pray mightily for an outpouring of God's Holy Spirit upon the people. They recognized their own helplessness, and at the same time looked to the Lord Himself to do His own work in His own way. Believing that it was 'not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts,' they prayed that God would send down the Holy Ghost power.

"For three years this one cry went up to God day and night from the mission station and from friends in distant places, who longed for God's blessing on Maloga. All who believe that our God is faithful to His promises will not be surprised to hear that the answer came in rich abundance. The blacks themselves have told us the story in their own simple yet graphic manner. About twelve months ago, when the heavens seemed as brass, and there was no sign of a cloud, not even as big as a man's hand, the first drop of the shower fell.

"One Sunday night at the close of the usual evening service in the old school-house one man was converted. This man (Bajat) had been one of the most troublesome on the mission station, and every one was indeed astonished. He confessed it at once, and from that night 'the rains descended, and the floods came.' God's Holy Spirit was poured out with almost Pentecostal power, and in a few weeks nearly every adult on the mission was converted. Prayer-meetings were held by the people themselves night and day, and the sound of praise to our God was almost constantly ascending. Even the little children shared in the blessing, and held meetings by themselves.

"Some of the people said, 'What is this?' 'It is just like heaven.' Others said, 'Will it last?' Twelve months have elapsed, and it has lasted. The excitement has in a measure subsided, but it has settled down into joy and peace in the Holy Ghost. We have listened within the last few weeks to our black brothers and sisters speaking to us white people out of the abundance of their hearts. These people who were dumb before are now able to testify for Jesus as well and better than many Christians. 'Open Thou our lips, and our mouths shall show forth thy praise,' has indeed been literally their experience.

"It is impossible to give anything like a verbatim report of their simple testimonies, as it would take too much space, but it is not too much to say that all who listened to them, as night after night in Melbourne and suburbs they told what great things God had done for them, were astonished and delighted beyond measure."

HANCOCK'S TWO INVITATIONS.

'It was a hard life pasting those posters and sticking them on the vacant walls, and Hancock worked at it from early morning until sunset every day, and often went out with his paste-pot at night to put in a few cents by working anywhere that the gas or electric lights would give him light enough to see which was the right way up of the posters. He had not expected to spend his old age in work of that kind. He had once been well-off, with a good sum laid by for a rainy day, but in an evil hour he put his savings in an institution that promised him a better return for them, and had lost them all. A member of the American Colony in Canada was living in ease and luxury on the money which Hancock and a few others like him had scraped together by dint of hard work and rigid economy. When Hancock took his money to his disastrous investment, he did not know much about the affair, but he was impressed with the character of the leading man, who was extremely sanctimonious—"a pillar of the church" he was called at public meetings—very liberal in his gifts to benevolent institutions, and very earnest in church work. Hancock felt, as others did, that the man's character was a guarantee of integrity, and was satisfied. When the "pillar of the church" removed to Canada, Hancock was heart-broken, had an illness, lost his position, and was glad to turn to sticking posters for his bread.

He was engaged one night, under a flaring electric light, putting up a few posters, when a clergyman came along and accosted him with, "We are holding a service for the poor to-night in the chapel of St. Barnabas' Church, just around the corner; will you come, my man, when you have done your work?"

Hancock looked around and examined the clergyman from head to foot. These sleek clericals were Hancock's abomination. The ostentatious garb seemed to him a kind of advertisement of the man's calling, as of the Pharisees, who "made broad their phylacteries." The well-gloved hands, the pendulous watch-chain, the Bible carried conspicuously, even the fashionable silk umbrella, formed an item in Hancock's mind of a foundation of dislike. "A service for the poor, eh? Well, sir, I sha'n't come." He made this reply with a vigor that startled the well-meaning clergyman.

"I'm sorry for that," he said; "you might hear something that would do you good. You are getting on in years, and you should consider what your state will be when God calls you to account. You had better come to the service."

"No, I won't come," Hancock said, with increased energy. "You go and hold your service for the poor, and I pity the poor that you get to hear you. Much you care for the poor; why, I've lived this seven year close to your church, and none of you have ever been to see whether I've got a soul or not; and when I was ill none of you ever came to see if I had a doctor, or anything to eat, and if I'd died, you wouldn't ha' read your gibberish over my coffin unless you'd been paid for it. No, sir, I don't want your religion; I've had enough of it; I shouldn't ha' been one of the poor if it hadn't been for that. You go on and have your service, and let me alone," and the old man dipped his brush in the paste-pot as a sign that the conference was closed, and the clergyman, sighing heavily as he thought of the rudeness of the lower classes, went on his way.

Hancock finished his work and went to the miserable room he called his home. He was in a vexed, irritable frame of mind, by no means soothed by chuckling over giving one of the parsons a bit of his mind. When he arrived, he searched around in the darkness for a match, but could not find one, so he descended to the floor below to ask the loan of one from a family living there. They had always been civil and friendly to him, though he had not encouraged their advances. But tonight the cheery fire, and the bright light, and general aspect of comfort attracted him, so that when the husband and father, a workman like himself, asked him if he would not come in and sit with them awhile, Hancock awkwardly and a little surlily accepted the invitation. A cup of hot coffee was offered him, and that, too, he took, and gradually thawed under kindness to which, partly through his own morose disposition, he had been unaccustomed.

There were two bright little children in the family, and their bedtime being come, they knelt at their mother's knee, according to what seemed to Hancock their usual custom, and said their evening prayer. Hancock listened. It was many years since he had heard the words he had himself uttered at the knee of his mother, long since dead. The whole scene came up before him as he listened, and tears at last welled up into his eyes and ran down his cheeks. He sat silent, and his host, though observing his emotion, made no reference to it. As the children rose from their knees and bade their parents "good-night," Hancock looked longingly at them. "Will you give me a kiss, too, my dears?" he said, huskily. The kisses were given, and the children retired.

"It's many a long year," he said, "since my eyes were wet. You must excuse an old man; I've been thinking of my mother. I used to kneel just like that and say just those words. I'm a poor God-forsaken wretch now. I don't look as if I'd ever had a mother."

"You loved her very much, I guess," said his host. "It must be a great comfort to you to think you'll see her again in heaven."

The Clergyman's Invitation.

"God help me," said the poor fellow; "I never shall." Then he told his story, ending with his conversation with the clergyman that evening. His friends listened sympathizingly and labored to show him that his dislike of religion on account of his loss of fortune was unreasonable. They reminded him of his mother's religion, and showed him that the religion of the hypocritical swindler was spurious—a mere imitation assumed for the purpose of covering wickedness. The old man stayed while family prayer was offered, and for the first time in many years he bent his knees in prayer. He climbed the stairs to his own poor room afterward with feelings in his heart to which he had long been a stranger.

The ice being broken, it was not difficult to influence him further, and his new friends used the opportunity. He was induced to go with them to a church where they did not hold "services for the poor," but where the same gospel was preached to all, and all were welcome, without class distinction. The old man's life became brighter, his face lost its sombre aspect, and it was not long before he had good reason to hope that the time would come when his eyes would once more look on the dearly-loved face of the mother who had tried to lead her boy to the Saviour.

THE JEW'S WARD.

A New Sphere.

THE loneliness of her position began to oppress Carola more and more heavily, yet still there came no sign as to what she ought to do. There was neither fiery nor cloudy pillar to guide her. The idle time hung wearisomely on her hands, and the often-read story in the New Testament seemed at last but little more than words to her, over which her eye glanced without taking in their meaning. Was this the way in which Christians read the record of their Lord's history?

She resolved to quit this lonely place and useless life and go away, whither she knew not. It was a strange position to be in. It was impossible to go back among her own people in their deep misery and degradation; for there would be danger, not for herself only, but for them, in their bitter hatred of her, lest any of them should be hurried into crime. "They will learn nothing that is good from you," the policeman had said; and she knew too well that she could not venture to dwell among them.

Yet she disposed of the little furniture she had bought, and made ready to go. The last morning was come and she was sitting on her door-sill looking across the half-cleared land stretching before her, and watching the branches of the trees lifting themselves languidly in the soft autumn breeze, and shedding one by one their brown leaves, as if weary of their summer foliage, when she saw the letter-carrier plodding over the field in the direction of her cottage. He approached her garden wicket and called out loudly, "Miss Fielding." She ran down the narrow path, her heart throbbing violently, for she had not received half a dozen letters in her whole life, and here was one for her very day she was going away. She did not recognize the handwriting; how should she when there was no friend's writing familiar to her? In a moment her thoughts flew to Hazel-mountain. Suppose it was Philip writing to her!

But no; that could not be. And then the next instant came the recollection that she had written to the ladies in whose school she had been educated at Matthias Levy's urgent desire, when he lay dying, telling them frankly her whole story, and asking for their counsel and friendship. Matthias had sent a special and pathetic message to them, but no answer came before his death, and Carola had scarcely thought about it since. When she had thought of it, it had only been with a feeling that they, too, considered her unworthy of their regard. But now the answer was here. They had gone out to New Zealand, and Carola's letter had followed them; they were replying to it hurriedly, but they bade her go to Nether-ton Hospital and inquire there for Sister Elizabeth, who would certainly befriend her. They were forwarding Carola's letter to her that she might know her whole history.

In a moment the heavy burden that had weighed so heavily on her heart had rolled off. Was it possible that she had ever fancied her Lord had forgotten her? The tears stood in her eyes as she thought of it, as though she had judged her dearest friend harshly. Here were His commands; this was where she must go. She was ready; all she had to do was to get to the nearest station, and make her way to Netherton instead of London, whither she had vaguely intended to travel. The message came not an hour too soon, but not too late.

She gathered a bunch of autumn flowers to lay on the old Jew's grave as she passed the churchyard on her way to the station. The little mound was already grass-grown, and his body was sleeping beneath it, with his face still turned toward Jerusalem. Carola read his letter there in whispers, as if the deaf ear could perchance catch the answer to the message he had sent. Then she laid her head down for a minute or two on the cool turf, shedding a few tears—not unhappy ones, though she was going away, and might never see this quiet grave again. Matthias knew now who the Messiah was; he had seen Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews.

It was evening when she reached a town in the Black Country. [The name given to certain districts of the counties of Stafford and Worcester where there is coal and iron, and where the people are chiefly engaged in manufactures.] For some miles the railway had run through banks of smoking and burning slag, with here and there ponds of stagnant, drossy-looking water, and a few rows of pollard willows standing black and leafless beside them. Blotches of dark-mouthed pits and tall chimneys clamped with iron, and engines with their long cranks continually rising and falling, divided the landscape among them, while the setting sun was going down behind a thick canopy of smoke. Large skips ascended out of the pits with heavy loads, amid the clanking of chains, and mysterious metallic shrieks, and swung down again with a jarring clang into deep caverns underground.

"Can you tell me where the hospital is?" asked Carola, when the train left her behind at Netherton, and the busy porters had time to attend to her.

"Ah, I'll take you there," answered one of them; "I'm always glad of a chance to see Sister Elizabeth. She's been a rare good friend to me, and to most on us. There's a many on us been in the Orspile for one thing or another."

It was a small, plain, unpretending building, and the room in which Carola waited was bare and unadorned. Through the window she could see an extensive plain, thickly dotted over its whole extent with pits and engine-houses, and chimneys belching out volumes of smoke. It was easy to understand that there would be many accidents there, in that whirl of activity above ground and below. And Carola felt that she was come to take a share in this energetic swing of labor. She had found a home again, a place where she could work as Christ had worked on earth. There was a vast field for ministering to others before her; her passion for loving service would be satisfied here. No more lonely days and dreary, desolate thoughts for her. She could not do any great thing, but she could nurse the sick for her Lord's sake.

At last, when the night had fallen, the door opened, and there entered a tall, grave-looking, elderly woman, with clearly-cut features and keen eyes, which surveyed Carola steadfastly. The girl had taken off her bonnet, as if she knew herself already at home, and she met her gaze of scrutiny with an eager, frank simplicity, free from either affectation or embarrassment. But she did not speak until Sister Elizabeth addressed her, with a smile stealing over her grave face.

"I know all about you," she said, in a pleasant voice; "your governesses did wisely in sending me your letter, for there will be no feeling of concealment in your mind. And if you are like your letter, I shall find in you one who works for the Lord Jesus Christ, as I wish all about me to do. Are you willing to be only a servant, if I find you fitted for nothing else?"

"I shall be glad to be a servant here," answered Carola. "I'm young and very strong, and I can do anything you set me to do. I want to help to save life, not to destroy it," she said, in a low voice, as her eyes filled with tears; "you know I once helped to destroy life."

"Yes," said Sister Elizabeth; "but if that dwells in your memory at all, it must only make you more patient and more watchful if I make you a nurse. They are rough folks, are my poor men and boys, and you must be cheerful among them, and as light-hearted as possible. We must make them happy while they are with us, for many of them have hard lives elsewhere. I want no one here who does not work with all their heart and strength for Jesus Christ's sake. You must not come because you are lonely, or sorrowful, or disappointed. Whatsoever you do, you must do it to the Lord."

"Oh, that is what I want!" cried Carola, eagerly. "I am not poor, you know; I have more money than I need, and you will not have to pay me any wages. If I could be all day long doing what my Lord would have me do! Something like what His mother and His sisters would do. And you make me feel as if you were something like them," she added, looking into Sister Elizabeth's grave and beautiful face with reverential eyes.

"Well, come," she answered, with a smile, "I will take you through my wards."

It was a small hospital, with only three wards, containing ten beds each, and these were not all full, as it was set apart for accidents and surgical cases only. With a soft, steady step, Carola walked through the long and lofty rooms, glancing with compassion and sympathy on the hard, rough faces, just touched with the refining finger of illness, which were lifted for an instant from the pillows as Sister Elizabeth and she passed by. Yes, here indeed was such work as her heart would delight in; for would not Christ have paced pityingly to and fro among them, perhaps healing one or another with His words or looks?

She was glad she had strength to bring to the service of these helpless ones, glad that she could give her health to the ministry of the sick. If her Lord came, and called for her, she would not be ashamed for Him to find her there. And in some respects her early life had fitted her for this work. She had witnessed sickness and suffering under its coarsest and most repulsive aspects in the miserable and crowded dwelling-places of the East End. There was none of that natural disgust and dismay to overcome, which is the first trial of a novice. These men and boys, disfigured and repulsive as some of them were, were as brothers to her—brothers whom she had known when she was young, and who were now thrown upon her sisterly pity and help. There was nothing she could not do for them, and already her brain was busy devising loving plans for the relief of their sufferings and the diversion of their thoughts from their sad condition.

When night came she went to her little narrow room, as small and as barely furnished as a cell in a nunnery. The red light of the blazing furnaces fell upon its white walls, and the throbbing and clanging of hammers sounded all around her like the monotonous murmur of the sea beating against a shore. Over the head of the iron bedstead hung a symbol which Carola had never yet seen—a crucifix. She saw the outstretched hands, with the nails thrust through them, and the bowed head crowned with thorns, and the body drooping wearily with anguish on the cross; and she stood agast like one who comes suddenly upon a terrible and awful scene.

The thought of her Lord's death was too vivid in her mind for her to look calmly on such a memorial of it. She could hardly read the record of it in the Gospel; but to behold it thus set forth before her eyes was more than she could bear. She threw herself on her knees, and hid her face from it, weeping passionately, as Mary wept at the sepulchre when she found her Lord taken away, and she knew not where they had laid Him. "They crucified Him! they crucified Him!" she moaned again and again to herself, until at last she fell asleep, sobbing now and then as one that cannot be comforted; and Sister Elizabeth coming in softly about midnight found her on the floor, with tears upon her long eyelashes and her face pale and quivering as if she had been suffering profound grief.

Sister Elizabeth would have been surprised if she had known the cause of those tears. Her life was an active one, and though every detail of the Saviour's passion was familiar to her, it had never wrought within her the emotion that this girl felt, who had arrived almost at womanhood before that story of expiatory anguish was revealed to her. To Carola it was a vivid scene, not placed far away beyond the centuries, but clear to her view as the events of yesterday. Nay, clearer; for much that had occurred to herself since her grandmother's death she had forgotten, but not one point in the sacred narrative had passed from her memory.

Of Hazelmount she often thought sadly. It was to her like a Paradise, lost through no fault of hers. She had been very happy there, and the recollection of it was still sweet to her. But it was of the love of the villagers and the children that she thought chiefly. That she had missed being Philip Arnold's wife troubled her not at all. She gave no regrets to the loss of her lover, which might have been expected to trouble a girl of her age. But it was not so on his side. Philip had never ceased to deplore the separation; while taking the view of his family, he had reluctantly admitted the necessity of it. Carola was always in his thoughts, and he longed for her with irrepresible longing.

He became gloomy and almost morose; the boyish tenderness of his manner toward his mother had passed into reserve, and he no longer came in from the farm or the market with a budget of cheery gossip to tell her. He continued always dutiful and gentle to her, with a restrained affection; but there was not the open confidence of former days between them. He could not speak of the one subject closest to his heart. They never mentioned Carola, though they were always thinking of her, and this silence made it difficult to speak freely on any other subject.

They were drifting apart; yet who was to blame? Mrs. Arnold could fully justify herself—for what other mother could consent to let her son marry a girl springing from the very dregs of the people? The innate and hereditary vice had passed over Carola wondrously; but who could say it might not come out in her children, and their old family be brought to open and flagrant shame in the next generation? Besides all this, Carola's own name was branded. All the county had heard or read of that terrible trial of Lumley's murder, in which she had been forced to disclose the degradation of her girlhood.

It was possible for a human being to enter into the kingdom of heaven and yet be unfit to be received into a family like theirs. Mrs. Arnold did not put it to herself in so many words, but there was a dim consciousness that this was the real view of the case. Philip ought to feel that it was a sin to pine after the impossible, and she herself must shake off this dead weight, under which her soul seemed to cleave unto the dust, and be no longer able to lift itself up into such communion with God as it had once enjoyed.

But some months after Philip's vain visit to London, in half-hearted search after Carola, an event took place at Hazelmount which was altogether unexpected. Mrs. Stewart, the absentee owner of Hazelmount Park, died abroad, leaving Hazelmount to her nephew, Captain Bentley, who was an utter stranger to them all. The Hall had been shut up for several years, and Mr. Arnold, as the agent for the estate, had held a position of unusual authority and influence. But now the new landlord came down immediately after his aunt's death and took formal possession, remaining at the Hall, which he quickly filled with a retinue of servants from London, and very soon afterward he announced to Mr.

Arnold his intention of making one of his own people the agent for the estate.

GOD'S MESSAGE BY HIS SON.

S. S. Lesson for June 7, Heb. i 1-8; 2 i-4. Golden Text, 2: 3. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Message and the Message-Bearer—The Power of the Word—Sustaining All Things—The Test of Love and Service—Witnessed in Healing—How it may Become Spirit and Life Now—The Quickening Spirit—The Written Word Taken to the Living Word—The Believer's Warrant—The Living Christ—One with God—Drifting the Great Danger of the Time.

A MESSAGE is of force according to the authority of the sender and the bearer of it. In our chapter God speaks by His Spirit of His one great Messenger, and of the weight which should attach to His message. "God having of old time spoken unto the fathers in the prophets by divers portions and in divers manners, hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in a Son" (R. V.). Every word of the New Testament is God speaking, not in a servant but a Son; the Sender and the Bearer of the message being alike God. Oh how the exhortation comes home to us, "See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh" (Heb. 12: 25)! God has appointed His Son, the Bearer of His message, "Heir of all things;" "He hath put all things under His feet" (1 Cor. 15: 27). "All things are delivered unto me of my Father" (Matt. 11: 27). "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth" (Matt. 28: 18). Everything His possession, everything within His power! What weight this gives to the Word of God spoken in His Son! "Through whom also He made the worlds." All He speaks of, all to whom He speaks, is His creation; how comes it, then, that the word of a created being should be credited more than His? But more, "Who being the effulgence [or brightness] of His glory, and the very image of His substance or the impress of His substance." Fitting God the Father as a plaster-of-Paris mould will fit that which it is poured over, always retaining the impression; God's impress in human form! And upholding all things by the Word of His power.

THE BEARER OF GOD'S MESSAGE

upholds all things by the very Word which He speaks to us." "Do we believe this?" If so we shall vindicate everything which He says, though it give the lie to our experience, our wisdom, our thoughts, our present feelings, and all else. Jesus says strong words about His Word: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my Word shall not pass away" (Luke 21: 33). He says yet more: "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life" (John 6: 63); and this stupendous announcement comes also from His lips: "If a man keep my sayings he shall not see death" (John 8: 51). Life which robs death of all that makes it death comes through the Word of God spoken to us by Jesus, the living Word, who upholds all things by that same Word of power! He makes the keeping of His words the test of His disciples' love: "He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth Me" (John 14: 21, 24). "Whoso keepeth My Word, in him verily is the love of God perfected" (1 John 1: 5). "By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God and keep His commandments" (1 John 5: 2). He makes it the test of our knowing Him: "Hereby do we know that we know Him, if we keep His commandments." It was by His Word spoken that most of His mighty works were done when among men; at His Word the winds and waves were stilled, at His Word the blind saw, the deaf heard, the lame walked, the demons were cast out, the very dead arose. Do we really believe that His Word written, and left on record for us in these last days, possesses the same authority as did these words of power when Jesus walked as man on earth? Do we believe that Jesus, as the Bearer of God's message, is really with us always, even unto the end of the world; that He is dwelling within us to speak Himself within our hearts, so that His Word to us may not be in the letter which killeth, but the Spirit which giveth life? If we did, then we should cease to reason and argue over any word of God's which had come home to us; we should instantly refer the written Word to the Living Word, that by the Holy Ghost it might be made Spirit and life to us. No power of human reason brought to bear on the Word of God can make it clear to us: "it is the Spirit that quickeneth," it is by the Spirit of God that we hear Jesus say, "I say unto thee," and then He makes His Word to be what it says, to do what it says.

When the Holy Spirit makes a sinner see Jesus in person bearing the message of salvation, and it becomes

"I SAY UNTO THEE,"

"He that believeth hath everlasting life," the words glow with divine meaning and have creative power; life flows into that soul. "Sin shall not have dominion over you" (Rom. 6: 14). Men argue and debate as to what is sin, and what is not, as to how far these words are to be experienced, etc. But when a simple child of God takes the statement to the person of Jesus, He brings His personality into it, and says, "I say unto thee," "Sin shall not have dominion over thee," "I am Surety for it." Then the simple believer passes over from the old territory of what he is, how liable he is to fall, and from all his old experience. He who upholds all things by the Word of His power has spoken, and He is responsible now to do all He says; the Word is spirit and life. The same Word of God says, "The prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up;" the poor sufferer looks at the many unhealed ones, at his own experience, at his own faith, his own unworthiness, and he is paralyzed; but let him take the written Word to the living Word, and Jesus will say, "I am the Lord that healeth thee," and He who upholds all things will do His work. If we trust Jesus really as the Word of God, and deal with Him about all He says, we shall look at no side issues, see neither probability or possibility to hinder, but "keep His sayings" in spite of all which seems to gainsay. It is with no theory or doctrine with which we have to do, but with the Word of a God, the Word of a King, the Word of the Heir of all things, the Maker of the ages, the upholder of all things by His Word. Our warrant is the dignity and authority of the Speaker.

And it is this One, the very glory and image of God, who made "purification of sins" (R. V.) or, as the ordinary text has it, by Himself purged our sins! And then "He sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high; having become so much better than the angels, as He hath inherited a more excellent name than they" (R. V.). Thank God that it is not with a dead Christ we have to do, with the fact of a past atonement only, but with a living, glorious Person, yet One who comes down to all the detail of our hearts and lives! So great and yet so lowly, so really God and yet so truly Man.

NOT AN ANGEL,

but God; not an angel, but Man. For unto which of the angels said He at any time, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten Thee?" and again, "I will be to Him a Father, and He shall be to me a Son?" And again, when He bringeth in the first-born into the world, He saith, "And let all the angels of God worship Him." There was no unity of being between the angels and God, but the Son was one with the Father. And thus, while Jesus was born in a stable and laid in a manger, unknown to any but to a few shepherds, all the angels of God were charged to worship Him. When He came into the world He came as the sacrifice for sin, and said, "I come to do thy will, O God." Angel and messenger is one word in the Greek language. Therefore, not only the angels in heaven, but all the former bearers of God's messages, all the holy men of old are charged to worship Him, the one great Messenger of God.

How, then, shall we doubt one word which He has spoken?

In the Old Testament again and again the deity of the coming Son of God is referred to. "Who maketh His angels spirits, and His ministers a flame of fire; but of the Son He said, 'Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever. God, Thy God hath anointed Thee with the oil of gladness above Thy fellows.'" And then a quotation from Ps. 102: 25, 26, which would never have been discovered as applying to Christ if the Holy Spirit had not revealed it. "Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the work of Thy hands; they shall perish, but Thou remainest, and they all shall wax old as doth a garment. And as a vesture shalt Thou fold them up, and they shall be changed, but Thou art the same, and Thy years shall not fail." Once again: "Sit Thou on my right hand until I make Thine enemies Thy footstool" (R. V.) How shall we deal with every word spoken by One to whom God the Father gives such honor? "Therefore," i.e., because it is such an One who speaks, "we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things that were heard, lest haply we drift away" (R. V.). This is the great, terrible, constant danger we are in, into unbelief. A ship drifts when she has lost her anchor, when the crew have no longer any control over her, and she is driven this way and that at the mercy of the winds and waves. Whenever we attempt to try the Word of God by the opinions of other men, by our own experience, by the chances of probability or improbability which our limited reason may perceive, we are drifting, we are no longer anchored on the sure Word of promise. God has a right to our confidence. He says, "For if the Word spoken through angels [or messengers] proved steadfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward (i.e., under the law), how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?" How shall we escape if we neglect God's message brought to us by the Son of God in person? How shall we excuse contempt of the Person of God's Son? Yet every word of God which is not life to our souls and bodies we are neglecting. Lord, open our eyes! "How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation, which having at the first been spoken through the Lord, was confirmed unto us by them that heard Him, God also bearing witness with them both by signs and wonders, and by manifold powers, and by gifts [or distributions] of the Holy Ghost according to His own will." Here are three witnesses: (1) The Lord who spoke, (2) they who heard Him and who have written for us the Gospels and the Epistles, (3) the manifest power of the Holy Ghost in signs, wonders, and distributions of spiritual gifts. By all these three witnesses He speaks. How shall we escape if we refuse to hear either?

IN PERFECT PEACE.

"Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on Thee because he trusteth in Thee."—Isaiah 26, 3.

"And great shall be the peace of thy children."—Isaiah 54, 13.

"Behold I give unto him my covenant of peace."—Numbers 25, 12.

"In perfect peace have they which love Thy law."—Psalm 119, 165.

"I leave with you, my peace I give unto you."—John 14, 27.

Like strains of music, soft and low,
That break upon a troubled sleep,
I hear the promise old and new,
God will his faithful children keep
"In perfect peace."

From out the thoughtless, wreck-strewn past,
From unknown years that silent wait,
And earth's will regret there comes
The promise with its precious freight,
"In perfect peace."

Above the clash of party strife,
The surge of life's unending sea,
Through sob of pain and songs of mirth,
Through hours of toil it flows to me,
"In perfect peace."

It stills the questionings and doubts,
The nameless fears that throng the soul,
It speaks of love unchanging, sure,
And ever more its echoes roll:
"In perfect peace."

"In perfect peace." O loving Christ!
When falls death's twilight gray and cold,
And flowers of earth shall droop and fade,
Keep thou thy children as of old,
"In perfect peace."

And through the glad, eternal years,
Beyond the blame and scorn of men,
The hearts that served Thee here may know
The rest that passeth human ken,
"Thy perfect peace."

THE LATE HON. FREDERICK T. FRELINGHUYSEN, EX-SECRETARY OF STATE, AND PRESIDENT OF THE AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.

An Important Lesson in his Life—His Ancestors—A Novel Notice of Dismissal—General Frelinghuysen in the War of Independence—The Bereaved Boy—His Uncle's Care—Education—Political Life—Declines the British Mission—Made Secretary of State—His Persistent and Successful Labor—Illness and Death—Dr. Talmage's Reminiscences.

THE chief significance for us in the career of the statesman who on May 20th quitted the scene of his labors, is in the fact that he was a consistent Christian. It is generally supposed that religion is a bar to political preferment, but it did not prove so in the case of Mr. Frelinghuysen. His character offers a singularly clear evidence that a man may be a great statesman while walking humbly with his God. Even those who sneer at "Sunday-school politics" admit that a little religion is an advantage to an aspiring politician. He is helped by a religion which takes him to church regularly every Sunday, makes him contribute liberally to church funds, and gives him some knowledge of theological questions. But if he follows the maxims of the sapient mentors of the political newspapers, he will not have more religion than that. He is being constantly warned against having so much religion as to make his conscience inconveniently tender, his scruples unmanageable, and his conduct strait-laced. He should, according to advance himself by open and honorable means whenever he can, but he must not expect to get on if he has finical objections to making a secret alliance with rumsellers, and securing the support of active workers by gifts of money or promises of patronage. His religion will be a nuisance if, under its influence, he refuses to recognize the claims to office of unfit men who have worked in his interest, or will not vote for measures that are introduced for the benefit of his party and the prejudice of the nation. He must not be "righteous over much;" must have some religion—not too much; must be just religious enough to stand well with the respectable classes, and just enough of worldliness to look after his own interests and the interests of his friends. This sickening mixture of politics and piety is supposed to be the true line to success in public life, but it was not the line Mr. Frelinghuysen followed. He was true to his conscience, faithful to his God, and, in spite of the prophets, he attained one of the highest positions in the Government. That fact is worthy of consideration at a time when our national morality, almost our national existence, is being imperilled by the efforts of unscrupulous politicians to close public life against the men who are best fitted to make and execute our laws. That nation is near its fall when it can be ruled only by men void of conscience, and with no fear of God before their eyes. It is time that our young men who naturally and honorably hope to rise to high position in the Government were taught that success is possible without surrendering their principles, without selling themselves to the devil. The career of Mr. Frelinghuysen is an illustration of that lesson.

Mr. Frelinghuysen came of

A DISTINGUISHED ANCESTRY.

The founder of the family came from Holland as the pastor of a band of immigrants who came here to serve God according to their conscience, and without the interference of the Government. He settled in New York State, but subsequently removed to Somerset County, New Jersey. The Rev. Mr. Frelinghuysen, however, did not find perfect peace in his relations with his church. Pastor and people differed on a question of doctrine. Whether it was the preacher who grew into a more advanced creed, while the congregation remained stationary, or it was the people who grew while the preacher remained rigid, we are not told, but the difference grew, and a separation became necessary.

A CURIOUS INTIMATION of the wishes of the people was conveyed to the pastor by the novel but significant method of placing a pair of shoes and a stout walking-stick outside the door by which the pastor was in the habit of leaving the church. Mr. Frelinghuysen took the hint and departed. One of his descendants was a man of some military skill, who obtained renown as a General in the War of Independence. He was a Delegate to the Continental Congress, served with distinction while yet a very young man in the Revolutionary war, and was said to be the man who killed the Hessian commander, Rahl, at the battle of Trenton. He was appointed a brigadier-general by Washington in 1790, and three years later was elected to the United States Senate as a Federalist. He left two sons, Theodore and Frederick T. Frelinghuysen. The latter died at the age of thirty-two, when a youth of much promise was blossoming into the ripe fruit of maturity. At the time of his death he was acting as Surrogate of Somerset County. He left his son, the subject of this sketch, to the care of his brother Theodore, who henceforth adopted him as his own. Theodore Frelinghuysen was a man of brilliant parts. He was a militia captain in 1812, Attorney-General of New Jersey (1817-'29), a United States Senator (1829-'33), Mayor of Newark (1837-'38), Chancellor of the New York University (1839-'50), President of Rutgers College (1850-'62), and President of the American Bible Society, American Board of Foreign Missions, American Tract Society, and American Temperance Union; in 1844 he was the Whig candidate for Vice-President.

BIRTH AND EDUCATION.

The boy who was thus bereaved of his father and found a new and wise second father in his distinguished uncle, was born at Milltown, Somerset County, N. J., August 14th, 1817. His uncle from the first gave careful personal attention to his education. He was sent to Rutgers College, where he graduated in 1836 with high honors, being particularly strong in the classics, for which through his busy after life he always evinced the enthusiasm of a true student. Unlike many young men whose college achievements give promise of a brighter future than their subsequent career realizes, he scouted the idea that all that is worth learning is crammed into a youth within the academic walls, and that he is fitted for the battle of life as soon as he graduates. He was a zealous reader all his life, and by continuous study so supplemented his college acquirements that he was recognized as one of the best-read men and most accomplished scholars in the country. Immediately on graduating he threw himself energetically into the study of law and was admitted to the bar in 1839. He practised in Newark, and first attracted notice as a steady, safe young man, who devoted himself zealously to his profession and acquitted himself fairly, rather than for any brilliant qualities or ambition to shine. He soon acquired facility in speaking, and his habits of reading and close examination of his cases gave him in time a thorough and pactical knowledge of law. While yet a young man he had thus acquired a high reputation among Jersey lawyers, and got special credit for the clearness and sobriety of his judgment. He occasionally took an active part in politics, but did not seek any political office, always preferring professional distinction to the less solid and often fleeting honors conferred by the holding of a position dependent on the good will of political partisans. But in the troubles which culminated in the attempt to build up an independent Southern Confederacy he threw aside his accustomed reserve, and went heartily into the fight for the Union.

POLITICAL LIFE.

By training and family tradition he was a Whig, and stood by that party till its dissolution, when he became a Republican. He was one of the delegates representing New Jersey in the Republican Convention, which nominated Lincoln at Chicago in 1860, and, by request of both parties in the Legislature, represented his native

State in the Peace Convention of 1861. In the same year he was appointed Attorney-General for New Jersey, and during the Civil War took a very active part in all measures taken in his State for the support of the struggle for the Union. In 1866 he was re-appointed Attorney-General, but during the course of the same year, on the death of United States Senator William Wright, Governor Ward, of New Jersey, appointed him to the Senate for the unexpired term. In 1867 the Legislature re-elected him to the office, and he remained a Senator till 1869, when he was defeated by the Democratic candidate—Mr. Stockton. President Grant offered him the position of Minister to Great Britain, as successor to Mr. Motley, in 1870, and the Senate confirmed the appointment, but, to the surprise of every one, Mr. Frelinghuysen declined the honor.

The reasons which actuated Mr. Frelinghuysen in declining this much-coveted mission have not been authoritatively explained, but the following statement of them given by the New York Herald appears to come from a reliable source. That journal states that Mr. Frelinghuysen looked on the solution of the serious international questions arising out of the Alabama dispute then pending between England and the United States as beyond the power of even a clever, well-informed statesman who had no diplomatic training and but a limited acquaintance with European affairs.

Diplomacy is a trade, and even though an able man with a strong will, a thorough knowledge of what he wants, and a powerful nation at his back may foil the subtlest schemes concocted by men of less intellectual power, but having the advantage of professional training and varied experience, the first steps of an American thrown suddenly among European diplomats are always beset with difficulty. Mr. Frelinghuysen had served on the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, and thus acquired an intimate knowledge of the particular questions then in dispute, but he had, of course, no acquaintance with either the strategy or tactics of diplomacy, and might have been led into serious mistakes while undergoing his training. Many of his warmest political and personal admirers considered he did wisely in declining the tempting position.

Besides the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Mr. Frelinghuysen also acted on the Naval and the Judiciary Committees. After his defeat in 1869 he did not take a very prominent part in politics till 1871, when he was again elected to the United States Senate to succeed Mr. A. G. Cattell, and remained in that position till 1877. In the Senate his good temper, moderation, and gentleness of manner earned for him the good opinion of all who came in contact with him, irrespective of party, although on party questions his views were always expressed strongly and decidedly. He took part in all the great debates during his time, and as an orator was clear, forcible, and eloquent. One of his greatest efforts was in the debate on the Electoral Commission.

SECRETARY OF STATE.

In 1880 he favored the re-nomination of General Grant for the Presidency, but warmly supported General Garfield after the latter was made the choice of his party. In December, 1881, he was appointed Secretary of State in President Arthur's Cabinet, and he continued in this position until the recent change of the administration. He was also honored by being elected President of the American Bible Society, an office that was first filled by his distinguished uncle.

It was no light or easy task that he undertook at President Arthur's request. The policy of his predecessor had aroused the ill-feeling of other countries. A curious scheme was pending in Central America, initiated by the Administration, which had a suspicious appearance of spoliation of a weak and distressed power, and there were other troubles which were the source of no little embarrassment and danger. These to be straightened out, and the honor, and interest, and dignity of the United States vindicated. Mr. Frelinghuysen settled on to this formidable task of undoing the mischief wrought by his predecessor's blustering, bungling, with characteristic energy, and untiring exertion, and he succeeded most brilliantly. America regained her high place on the nations of the world which for some months it seemed she must inevitably lose. It was those months of protracted labor, sometimes continued without intermission for thirty-six hours, that developed, if it did not produce the order which has now terminated fatally.

LAST ILLNESS AND DEATH.

It was on March 10th that Mr. Frelinghuysen returned from Washington to his Newark residence. For several days he remained in his house. When he took a drive it was noticed that he was pale and thin, and that there were dark circles under his eyes. He looked weary and ill, and his friends attributed his condition to overwork and worry in the State Department. Mr. Frelinghuysen, who had been complaining of a cold, was suddenly stricken with paralysis. For several days his life was despaired of, and Mr. Frelinghuysen was prostrated by the shock his sudden illness gave his already weakened system. He returned to his bed in the large south chamber fronting on Military Park, Newark, N. J., and she lay in the southwest corner on the same side of the mansion. Dr. William O'Gorman, the family physician, said at that time Mr. Frelinghuysen was suffering from paralysis, or inflammation of the liver, combined with kidney disease. Six weeks before his death he fell into a stupor, and from that hour until he died he could not recognize any person, not even his children and his sister. Ex-President Arthur and other distinguished friends visited him, but saw that the end of the brilliant life was near.

Still he lingered, but on the morning of May 11th it was evident that a few hours must terminate his sufferings. An hour before the end, Mrs. Frelinghuysen was carried to the bedside and took a last farewell. He did not recognize her or anybody else in the room. There were present Frederick and George Frelinghuysen, and the Misses Tillie and Lucy Frelinghuysen, sons and daughters of the dying statesman, and Mrs. Mercer, his sister. Her son, Archibald, was also in the room. Theodore Frelinghuysen, the youngest son, was in evidence, whether he had gone on business with his father rallied, and Mrs. John Davis, a youngest daughter, was in Washington, where she resides. He passed away very quietly, without pain, and having no knowledge of the day. On Saturday, May 23d,

THE FUNERAL.

Work from the North Reformed Church, Newark, and was attended by a large body of distinguished gentlemen, including foreign Ministers, prominent members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and a representation from the Department of State at Washington. Business places and public buildings were closed, and flags at half-mast fluttered from any windows and house-tops. For hours before the funeral services, the street in front of the church was packed with a crowd of friends, and as soon as the doors were opened all the unreserved seats were taken. The interior of the church was heavily draped in black, and the light was nearly hidden with flowers. The Rev. Dr. Chambers, of the Collegiate Church, of New York, conducted the services, and spoke of the deep feeling of the character of the dead statesman.

Describing his PERSONAL APPEARANCE.

The recent writer says: "Personally he is of very imposing appearance. His dignified yet gentle bearing, his uniform courtesy and devotion to everything pure and noble in private life mark him as an exalted man, while his clean-shaven face and an abundance of iron-gray hair mind one of the ideas we form of the statesman of the early days of the Republic. In his face there is a strange blending of gentleness and resolution rarely seen, and every feature impresses one that the man is possessed of ability and honesty." He leaves a wife, three sons and three daughters.

DR. TALMAGE'S REMINISCENCES of his distinguished friend will fitly close this sketch. The doctor writes: "Nothing could be more appropriate than that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, going into all parts of this land, and with ever-widening and increasing influence, should present to its readers the features and the character of the late Christian statesman, Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, Attorney-General of his State, American Senator, decliner of the embassy to the Court of St. James, Secretary of State of the United States, and Christian. I have named his honors in order climactic.

I grew up in a neighborhood where the name of Frelinghuysen was a synonym for purity of character, high social qualities, and intellectual ability—Dominie Frelinghuysen, General John Frelinghuysen, Senator Theodore Frelinghuysen, and Frederick Frelinghuysen, the father of the man who now folds his hands at the close of an illustrious life. In my boyhood, I heard this, our departed friend, in the Somerville Court-House, and, as I told him not long ago in his office in Washington, was thrilled by his eloquence before court and jury. He was then the king of the New Jersey Bar. Boys are considered a botheration and out of place in a courtroom, but when 'Fred' Frelinghuysen, as we called him, was going to speak, I crowded in and was willing to be jostled about as I stood wondering how a man could get composed to speak like that before so many people.

Once in my boyhood, put on the witness-stand to testify in regard to the speed of a railway train that crushed a carriage, Mr. Frelinghuysen said to me: 'What were you doing at the time the train passed?' I answered, 'I was reading.' He asked, 'What were you reading?' I answered, 'I don't remember; I think it was nothing bad. I was not very much interested in it.' He replied, 'I hope that was not the reason you were not interested.' But I forgave him the boyish confusion into which he threw me, as I told him not long ago at the rehearsal of the incident. But the impression he made on young and old in the court-room was not so great as that in the Church of God, where he was elder and Bible-class teacher, and friend of old-fashioned evangelical religion.

He was buried on Saturday from the church in the building of which he was the most influential man. From first to last he has shown an uprightness of character irreproachable and beyond all criticism. Washington Life has sacrificed more Senators, and Congressmen, and Cabinet Ministers than would be enough twice over to fill all those offices. During the last three and a half years of Mr. Frelinghuysen's Secretaryship, yea, during the last nineteen years of his residence in Washington, we often read of places of doubtful gaiety at which Senators and Cabinet Ministers were present, but never once did you see the name of Frederick Frelinghuysen as among them—as consistent and Christian amid the pomp and temptation of the national capital as when a young lawyer seated, Bible in hand, before his Sunday-school class in Newark, or leading in prayer at the week-night service. He was one of the few men who could stand prosperity, and the heights of fame did not make him dizzy.

His life was a perpetual rebuke to demagogism and political fraud. No bribe ever touched the palm of his hand. No blasphemous word ever blistered his lip. No blush of dishonor ever tinged his cheek. He was never in any place where it would have been unseemly for him to die. It is this kind of salt in official life of State and nation that has kept political affairs in this country from complete putrefaction. There has been enough of wickedness in the capital of this nation at different times to invoke the wrath of heaven and sink Pennsylvania Avenue, with the Capitol at one end and the White House at the other. But ever since the foundation of this government we have had in Senate and Cabinet at least ten righteous men, like those for whose sake Abraham prayed God to save the city. Among that select and God-honored few stood the three Frelinghuysens—grandfather, grandson, and uncle.

During the last six weeks of his life our friend lay insensible under the stupor of disease, but nothing that he could have said in the shape of dying words would have added emphasis to a life all on the side of God and righteousness and patriotism. Let the American people learn that there is such a thing as honesty in politics. Credit Mobilier swept by Mr. Frelinghuysen on one side, great land-grabbing schemes swept by him on the other side, but they neither touched his head nor his heart nor his pocket. Millions of dollars of misappropriation from the United States Treasury, but not one quarter of a cent landed in his possession. Lobbyists, with money to buy up the lawmakers, dared not look into his clear, flashing eye. On a sea where there have been more shipwrecks than safe transports, he sailed without the loss of a spar. He declined honors for the obtaining of which men have sacrificed body, mind, and soul and yet failed to clutch them. He goes to his grave as much a martyr to the public service as those who fall on the battle-field, for retirement into private life one year ago would probably have assured him two more decades of earthly existence. There are heroes of civil service as well as heroes of the bloody field, and the pen is sometimes mightier than the sword.

Still further, let all the people learn that religion is not an imbecility, but a sublimation of character and honorable, even judged by worldly standards, when it has such a man in its discipleship. What a long roll of statesmen and orators and high officials Christianity holds up before this nation! They have sat in Senate and Cabinet, devout and consecrated. Seated at their desks at the national Legislature or standing on their feet discussing the great commercial, agricultural, manufacturing, educational, and moral interests of the land, they were, specimens of what religion can do for a man, refining his manners, ennobling his character, glorifying his intellect, kindling his patriotism and rounding his life into a radiant orb. The mightiest argument for Christianity is the kind of men it makes when it brings one completely under its sway.

"But now all the chapters of our illustrious friend's life are finished, and the volume is closed and clasped for the Judgment Day. Good and gracious friend, farewell! Gone out of our sight, but embalmed in the most consecrated sanctuary of the heart. We shall meet again, not amid the uncertain scenes of earth, but amid raptures that never die. Thy noble form, thy pure life, thy voice resonant for God and truth, thy exalted example, shall not pass away from our memory. Strong men shall carry thee out to thy tomb, yet the good influences thou hast started can never be buried, but will live on as long as our rivers roll to the sea and our mountains take upon their shoulders the mantle of the morning light. Peaceful be thy dust till the trumpet wakes it in the resurrection of the last day. Our deepest sympathies are aroused for his household.

Oh! what it must be to lose such a husband, such a father, such a guide! But our jubilant congratulations are for him. After the fatigues of a busy life, what a glorious thing to rest! The clangor of debate, the criticism of political factions, the struggle to know how best to settle international dispute, the anxiety to make no mistakes where the welfare of a continent was involved, the steady invasion of disease—all these have given way to everlasting quietude and supernal reward.

Life is a torrid day;

Burned by the wind and sun;

And death, the calm, cool evening hour,

When the weary day is done.

CAPITAL AND LABOR.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached last Sunday Morning, May 31, 1885.

"Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."—MATT. 7: 12.

The Antagonistic Forces—The Middle Class Disappearing—A Gigantic Conflict Impending—How the Problem Will Not be Settled—Not by Decrying the Rich—Honest Fortunes—Discreditable Poverty—Not by Unsympathetic Treatment of Labor—Nor by the Violence of Disaffected Workmen—Frederick the Great and the Miller—The True Panacea—Operating in the Kitchen and Parlor—In the Mill—Affecting the Employer and his Men—An Incident at Sheffield—Washington and the Corporal—A Diabolic Law—Victor Hugo, the Friend of the Poor—A Greater Benefactor.

THE greatest war the world has ever seen is between capital and labor. The strife is not like that which in history is called the Thirty Years' War, for it is a war of centuries, it is a war of the five continents, it is a war hemispheric. The middle classes in this country, upon whom the nation has depended for holding the balance of power and for acting as mediators between the two extremes, are diminishing, and if things go on at the same rate as they are now going, it will not be very long before there will be no middle class in this country, but all will be very rich or very poor, princes or paupers, and the country will be given up to palaces and hovels.

THE ANTAGONISTIC FORCES

are closing in upon each other. The telegraphic operators' strikes, the railroad employes' strikes, the Pennsylvania miners' strikes, the movements of the Boycotters and the dynamiters are only skirmishes before a general engagement, or, if you prefer it, escape through the safety-valves of an imprisoned force which promises the explosion of society. You may pooh-pooh it; you may say that this trouble, like an angry child, will cry itself to sleep; you may belittle it by calling it Fourierism, or Socialism, or St. Simonism, or Nihilism, or Communism; but that will not hinder the fact that it is the mightiest, the darkest, the most terrific threat of this century. All have been dead failures, and monopoly is more arrogant, and the trades-unions more bitter. "Give us more wages," cry the employes. "You shall have less," say the capitalists. "Compel us to do fewer hours of toil in a day." "You shall toil more hours," say the others. "Then, under certain conditions, we will not work at all," say these. "Then you shall starve," say those, and the workmen, gradually using up that which they accumulated in better times, unless there be some radical change, we shall have soon in this country three million hungry men and women. Now, three million hungry people cannot be kept quiet. All the enactments of legislatures and all the constabularies of the cities, and all the army and navy of the United States cannot keep three million hungry people quiet. What then? Will this war between capital and labor be settled by human wisdom? Never. The brow of the one becomes more rigid, the fist of the other more clenched.

ATTEMPTS AT PACIFICATION

But what human wisdom cannot achieve will be accomplished by Christianity if it be given full sway. You have heard of medicines so powerful that one drop would stop a disease and restore a patient; and I have to tell you that one drop of my text properly administered will stop all these woes of society and give convalescence and complete health to all classes. "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."

I shall first show you this morning how this quarrel between monopoly and hard work cannot be stopped, and then I will show you how this controversy will be settled.

FUTILE REMEDIES.

In the first place, there will come no pacification to this trouble through an outcry against rich men merely because they are rich. There is no member of a trades-union on earth that would not be rich if he could be. Sometimes through a fortunate invention, or through some accident of prosperity, a man who had nothing comes to large estate, and we see him arrogant and supercilious, and taking people by the throat just as other people took him by the throat. There is something very mean about human nature when it comes to the top. But it is no more a sin to be rich than it is a sin to be poor. There are those who have gathered great estate through fraud, and then there are millionaires who have gathered their fortune through foresight in regard to changes in the markets, and through brilliant business faculty, and every dollar of their estate is as honest as the dollar which the plumber gets for mending a pipe, or the mason gets for building a wall. There are those who are kept in poverty because of their own fault. They might have been well-off, but they smoked or chewed up their earnings, or they lived beyond their means, while others on the same wages and on the same salaries went on to competency. I know a man who is all the time complaining of his poverty and crying out against rich men, while he himself keeps two dogs, and chews and smokes, and is filled to the chin with whiskey and beer!

Micawber said to David Copperfield: "Copperfield, my boy, one pound income, twenty shillings and sixpence expenses: result, misery. But, Copperfield, my boy, one pound income, expenses nineteen shillings and sixpence: result, happiness." And there are vast multitudes of people who are kept poor because they are the victims of their own improvidence. It is no sin to be rich, and it is no sin to be poor. I protest against this outcry which I hear against those who, through economy and self-denial and assiduity, have come to large fortune. This bombardment of commercial success will never stop this quarrel between capital and labor.

Neither will the contest be settled by cynical and UNSYMPATHETIC TREATMENT of the laboring-classes. There are those who speak of them as though they were only cattle or draught horses. Their nerves are nothing, their domestic comfort is nothing, their happiness is nothing. They have no more sympathy for them than a hound has for a hare, or a hawk for a hen, or a tiger for a calf. When Jean Valjean, the greatest hero of Victor Hugo's writings, after a life of suffering and brave endurance, goes into incarceration and death, they clap the book shut and say, "Good for him!" They stamp their feet with indignation and say just the opposite of "Save the working-classes." They have all their sympathies with Shylock, and not with Antonio and Portia. They are plutocrats and their feelings are infernal. They are filled with irritation and irascibility on this subject. To stop this awful embroglio between capital and labor they will lift not so much as the tip end of the little finger.

Neither will there be any pacification of this angry controversy through VIOLENCE.

God never blessed murder. The poorest use you can put a man to is to kill him. Blow up to-morrow all the country-seats on the banks of the Hudson, and all the fine houses on Madison Square, and Brooklyn Heights, and Bunker Hill, and Rittenhouse Square, and Beacon Street, and all the bricks and timber and stone will just fall back on the bare head of American labor. The worst enemies of the working-classes in the United States and Ireland are their demoted coadjutors. Assassination—the assassination of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke in Phoenix Park, Dublin, Ireland, in the attempt to avenge the wrongs of Ireland, only turned away from that afflicted people millions of sympathizers. The recent attempt to blow up the House of Commons, in London, had only this effect: to throw out of employment tens of thousands of innocent Irish people in England.

In this country the torch put to factories have discharged hands for good or bad reasons obstructions on the rail-track in front of a night express trains because the offenders not like the president of the company; str on shipboard the hour they were going to or in printing-offices the hour the paper wa go to press, or in mines the day the coal wa be delivered, or on house scaffolds so builder fails in keeping his contract—all th are only a hard blow on the head of Amer labor, and cripple its arms, and lame its feet, pierce its heart. Take the last great strike America—the telegraph operators' strike—you have to find that the operators lost hundred thousand dollars' worth of wages, have had poorer wages ever since. Traps spr suddenly upon employers, and violence, ne took one knot out of the knuckle of toil put one farthing of wages into a callous pa Barbarism will never cure the wrongs of civil tion. Mark that!

Frederick the Great admired some land r his palace at Potsdam, and he resolved to it. It was owned by a miller. He offered the miller three times the value of the propo The miller would not take it, because it was old homestead, and he felt about as Naboth about his vineyard when Ahab wanted it. Frederick the Great was a rough and terrible n and he ordered the miller into his presence; the king, with a stick in his hand—a stick v which he sometimes struck his officers of stat said to this miller: "Now, I have offered three times the value of that property, an you won't sell it I'll take it anyhow." The miller said, "Your Majesty, you won't l." Ye said the king, "I will take it." Then, s the miller, "if your majesty does take it, I sue you in the Chancery Court." At t threat Frederick the Great yielded his infam demand. And the most imperious out against the poor and against the working-cla will yet cower before the law. Violence c contrary to the law will never accomplish a thing, but righteousness and according to will accomplish it.

THE PANACEA.

Well, if this controversy between Capital and Labor cannot be settled by human wisdom to-day Capital and Labor stand with th thumbs on each other's throat—as they do it is time for us to look somewhere else for rel and it points from my text roseate and jubil and puts one hand on the broadcloth shoul of Capital, and puts the other hand on homespun-covered shoulder of Toil, and se with a voice that will grandly and glorio settle this, and settle everything, "Whatsoe ye would that men should do to you, do ye e so to them." That is, the lady of the ho hold will say: "I must treat the maid in kitchen just as I would like to be treated were downstairs and it were my work to wa and cook, and sweep, and it were the duty the maid in the kitchen to preside in this parlo The maid in the kitchen must say: "If my e employer seems to be more prosperous than I, t is no fault of hers; I shall not treat her as enemy. I will have the same industry and ficity downstairs as I would expect from my s ordinates if I happened to be the wife of a s importer."

The owner of an iron mill, having taken before leaving home in the morning, will go in his foundry and, passing into what is called t puddling-room, he will see a man there stripp to the waist, and besweated and exhausted w the labor and the toil, and he will say to hi "Why, it seems to be very hot in here. Y look very much exhausted. I hear your ch is sick with scarlet fever. If you want y wages a little earlier this week, so as to pa nurse and get the medicines, just come into office any time."

After awhile, crash goes the money mark and there is no more demand for the artic manufactured in that iron mill, and the ow es not know what to do. He says, "Shall I up the mill, or shall I run it on half time, or all I cut down the men's wages?" He walks the floor of his counting-room all day, hardly knowing what to do. Toward evening he calls the laborers together. They stand all around, some with arms akimbo, some with folded arms, wondering what the boss is going to do now. A manufacturer says: "Men, times are very bad; I don't make twenty dollars where I used to make one hundred. Somehow, there is no demand now for what we manufacture, or but a very little demand. You see I am at vast expense, and I have called you together this afternoon to see what you would advise. I don't want to shut up the mill, because that would throw you out of work, and you have always been faithful, and I like you, and you seem to love me, and the bairns must be looked after, and your wife will after awhile want a new dress. I don't know what to do."

There is a dead halt for a minute or two, and in one of the workmen steps out from the ranks of his fellows, and says: "Boss, you have been very good to us, and when you prospered and prospered, and now you are in a tight place I am sorry, and we have got to sympathize with you. I don't know how the others feel, but I propose that we take off twenty per cent of our wages, and then when the times get bad you will remember us and raise them again." The workman looks around to his comrades, and says: "Boys, what do you say to this?" "All in favor of my proposition will say 'aye.'" "Aye! aye! aye!" shout two hundred voices.

But the mill-owner, getting in some new machinery, exposes himself very much, and takes cold, and it settles into pneumonia, and he dies.

THE PROCESSION TO THE TOMB

All the workmen, tears rolling down their cheeks, and off upon the ground; but an hour before the procession gets to the cemetery the graves and the children of those workmen are at the grave waiting for the arrival of the funeral train. The minister of religion may have delivered an eloquent eulogium before they started from the house, but the most impressive words are said that day by the working-classes circling around the tomb.

That night in all the cabins of the working-people where they have family prayers the widowed and the orphanage in the mansion are remembered. No glaring populations look over the iron fence of the cemetery; but, hovering over the scene, the benediction of God and man coming from the fulfilment of the Christlike injunction, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."

"Oh," says some man here, "that is all Utopian, that is apocryphal, that is impossible." Yesterday I cut out of a paper this: "One of the pleasantest incidents recorded in a long time is reported from Sheffield, England. The wages of the men in the iron works at Sheffield are regulated by a board of arbitration, by whose decision both masters and men are bound. For the time past the iron and steel trade has been extremely unprofitable, and the employers cannot, without much loss, pay the wages fixed by the board, which neither employers nor employed have the power to change. To avoid this difficulty, the workmen in one of the largest iron works in Sheffield hit upon a device as rare as it was generous. They offered to work for their employers one week without any pay whatever. How much better that plan is than a strike would be."

But you go with me and I will show you—not far off as Sheffield, England—factories, banks, houses, storehouses, and costly enterprises where this Christlike injunction of my text is kept, and you could no more get the employer to practice an injustice upon his men, or men to conspire against the employer, than you could get your right hand and your left hand, your right eye and your left eye, your right ear and your left ear, into physiological antagonism. Now, where is this to begin? In our homes, in our stores, on our farms—not waiting for other people to do their duty. Is there a divergence now between the parlor and the kitchen? Then there is something wrong, either in the parlor or the kitchen, perhaps in both. Are the clerks in your store irate against the firm? Then there is something wrong, either behind the counter, or in the private office, or perhaps in both.

THE GREAT WANT OF THE WORLD

to-day is the fulfilment of this Christlike injunction, that which He promulgated in His sermon Olivet. All the political economists under the arch or vault of the heavens in convention for a thousand years cannot settle this controversy between monopoly and hard work, between capital and labor. During there was a heavy piece of timber to be lifted, perhaps for some fortress, and a corporal was overseeing the work, and he was giving commands to some soldiers as they lifted: "Heave away, there! ye heave!" Well, the timber was too heavy; they could not get it up. There was a gentleman riding by on a horse, and he stopped and said to this corporal, "Why don't you help them lift? That timber is too heavy for them to lift." "No," he said, "I won't; I am a corporal." The gentleman got off his horse and came up to the place. "Now," he said to the soldiers, "all together—ye heave!" and the timber went to its place. "Now," said the gentleman to the corporal, "when you have a piece of timber too heavy for the men to lift, and you want help, you send to your commander-in-chief." It was Washington. Now, that is about all the Gospel I know—the Gospel of giving somebody a lift, a lift out of darkness, a lift out of earth into heaven. That is all the Gospel I know—the Gospel of helping somebody else to lift.

"Oh," says some wiseacre: "talk as you will, the law of demand and supply will regulate these things until the end of time." No, they will not, unless God dies and the batteries of the Judgment Day are spiked, and Pluto and Proserpine, king and queen of the infernal regions, take full possession of this world. Do you know

WHO SUPPLY AND DEMAND ARE?

They have gone into partnership, and they propose to swindle this earth and are swindling it. You are drowning. Supply and Demand stand on the shore, one on one side, the other on the other side of the life-boat, and they cry out to you, "Now, you pay us what we ask you for getting you to shore, or go to the bottom!" If you can borrow $5000 you can keep from failing in business. Supply and Demand say, "Now, you pay us exorbitant usury, or you go into bankruptcy." This robber firm of Supply and Demand say to you: "The crops are short. We bought up all the wheat and it is in our bin. Now, you pay our price or starve." That is your magnificent law of supply and demand.

Supply and Demand own the largest mill on earth, and all the rivers roll over their wheel, and into their hopper they put all the men, women, and children they can shovel out of the centuries, and the blood and the bones reddened the valley while the mill grinds. That diabolic law of supply and demand will yet have to stand aside, and instead thereof will come the law of love, the law of co-operation, the law of kindness, the law of sympathy.

THE LAW OF CHRIST.

Nave you no idea of the coming of such a time? Then you do not believe the Bible. All the Bible is full of promises on this subject, and as the ages roll on the time will come when men of fortune will be giving larger sums to humanitarian and evangelistic purposes, and there will be more James Lenoxes and Peter Coopers and William E. Dodges and George Peabodys. As that time comes there will be more parks, more picture-galleries, more gardens thrown open for the holiday people and the working-classes.

I was reading only this morning, in regard to a charge that had been made in England against Lambeth Palace that it was exclusive, and that charge demonstrated the sublime fact that to the grounds of that wealthy estate eight hundred poor families have free passes, and forty croquet companies, and on the half-day holidays four thousand poor people recline on the grass, walk through the paths, and sit under the trees. That is Gospel—Gospel on the wing, Gospel out of doors worth just as much as in-doors. That time is going to come.

That is only a hint of what is going to be. The time is going to come when, if you have anything in your house worth looking at—pictures, pieces of sculpture—you are going to invite me to come and see it, you are going to invite my friends to come and see it, and you will say, "See what I have been blessed with. God has given me this, and so far as enjoying it, it is yours also." That is Gospel.

In crossing the Alleghany Mountains many years ago the stage halted, and Henry Clay dismounted from the stage, and went out on a rock at the very verge of the cliff, and he stood there with his cloak wrapped around him, and he seemed to be listening for something. Some one said to him, "What are you listening for?" Standing there on the top of the mountain, he said: "I am listening to the tramp of the footsteps of the coming millions of this continent."

A SUBLIME POSTURE

for an American statesman. You and I to-day stand on the mountain top of privilege, and on the Rock of Ages, and we look off, and we hear coming from the future the happy industries, and the smiling populations, and the consecrated fortunes, and the innumerable prosperities of the closing nineteenth and the opening twentieth centuries.

While I speak this morning, there lies in state the dead author and patriot of France,

VICTOR HUGO.

The ten thousand dollars in his will he has given to the poor of the city are only a hint of the work he has done for all nations and for all times. I wonder not that they allow eleven days to pass between his death and his burial, his body meantime kept under triumphal arch, for the world can hardly afford to let go this man who for more than eight decades has by his unparalleled genius blessed it. His name shall be a terror to all despots, and an encouragement to all the struggling. He has made the world's burden lighter, and its darkness less dense, and its chain less galling, and its thrones of iniquity less secure. Farewell, patriot, genius of the century, Victor Hugo. But he was not the over-towering friend of mankind.

THE GREATEST FRIEND

of capitalist and toiler, and the one who will yet bring them together in complete accord, was born one Christmas night while the curtains of heaven swung, stirred by the wings angelic. Owner of all things—all the continents, all worlds, and all the islands of light. Capitalist of immensity, crossing over to our condition. Coming into our world, not by gate of palace, but by door of barn. Spending His first night amid the shepherds. Gathering after around Him the fishermen to be His chief attendants. With adze, and saw, and chisel, and axe, and in a carpenter-shop showing himself brother with the tradesman. Owner of all things, and yet on a hillock back of Jerusalem one day resigning everything for others, keeping not so much as a shekel to pay for His obsequies, by charity buried in the suburbs of a city that had cast Him out. Before the cross of such a capitalist, and such a carpenter, all men can afford to shake hands and worship. Here is the every man's Christ. None so high, but He was higher. None so poor, but He was poorer. At His feet the hostile extremes will yet renounce their animosities, and countenances which have glowered with the prejudices and revenge of centuries shall brighten with the smile of heaven as He commands: "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."

MISSION WORK IN CHINA.

MAKING ACQUAINTANCES.

THE Rev. Timothy Richard, of Tai Yuen Fu, North China, relates an instance of one of his earliest attempts to gain the confidence of the people. He says: "In North China there are annual fairs held in the neighborhood of celebrated temples. On the one hand, the people have an opportunity of showing their gratitude to their gods, while on the other hand, people of all classes bring wares there for sale, or bring money to buy them. Sometimes hundreds of thousands from all the towns and villages near and far meet on these occasions. About a fortnight before one of these country fairs I arrived at the nearest market town, which has a population of about five thousand inhabitants, in order to have an opportunity of making some acquaintances before the fair. I was on horseback, rode to the inn, and asked for lodgings. They were afraid to give quarters to any foreigner lest they should get into trouble. Seeing a big stone in the street I led my horse to it, and sat down. In a few minutes the whole town seemed to have turned out to see me. I addressed myself respectfully to the elderly people around, told them what I had come for, and continued with ordinary talk until they gained some confidence in me. One of the chief men in the place offered me a room in his own house. My host had an only son and a nephew, both about my own age. They were very glad to hear of all sorts of wonderful things existing out of China. Their friends came and called—the schoolmasters of the surrounding villages also called. I visited their schools in return. In a fortnight I got to know most of the men around that place who pretended to any knowledge of books."

PREACHING FROM A BELL-TOWER.

"Two days before the fair, I asked my host's son to come and show me the temple on the top of the hill, where the fair was to be held. He did so. It was Buddhist. It had two large courts, with a high bell-tower between. I said, I would like to preach from that, but I suppose neither the priest nor the people will be willing. Yes, he said, perfectly willing. The priest has been nominated to the place by my father, and as for the people, they won't object if I am with you. With this he told the priest to get a ladder ready by the fair day, so that I might climb into the bell-tower with ease. The fair day arrived. About ten o'clock the whole hill-top was one dense mass, or rather a sea, of living beings, tossed about by any excitement in the crowd. My appearance seemed to disturb its equilibrium more than anything, for most of them had never seen a foreigner before. There was a perfect rush from all sides, carrying us who were in the centre entirely off our feet. In self-defence, then, I patiently and slowly made for the bell-tower. There I could see village after village coming up in procession, with flying banners on the top of long poles, followed by the music of flutes, cymbals, drums, and deafening fire crackers. Each forced their passage through the crowds to the temple, which was the centre. When I saw all these thousands upon thousands ignorant of God, I longed to tell them something of that only name under heaven whereby men can be saved. The thirtieth village passed out. The last had performed its worship. It was twelve o'clock. It was a relief that the din was over at last. Then I stood up and addressed them as affectionately as I could, speaking on and on until I was exhausted and could not speak any more, and I wrestled in my soul with God to hasten the time when these thousands would meet together with their hearts centred in Him and in His Christ. I had had my desire of preaching at the fair fully gratified, and a short residence in their midst had removed prejudices, and inspired confidence."

PILGRIMAGES IN WILLOW WREATHS.

"A severe drought had come over the land. The poor people made supplications to every God in their Pantheon, made pilgrimages to every sacred spot they could imagine, formed vast processions of many towns and villages to unite in their supplications, all crowned with willow wreaths. Officials went to the temples and put on chains, in token of their sins. The whole land was commanded to fast and pray, but all in vain. At this time I wrote a short tract of only eighteen words, only saying that repentance for sin and kind deeds to each other were more acceptable to God than all fasting from meats. Prayer to the true God, and firm resolve to learn all His ways, were better than all their prayers to the other gods combined. I went about on horseback and posted these tracts in large letters throughout seven counties. It was a common thing, before I had ridden out of the town, for some anxious people to run after me, and ask most reverently how they were to pray, and how they were to learn of God? Two old women, with small feet, walked twenty miles to ask for books, and for instructions how to serve the true God."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Country Lad in the Dark.—A Minister remarked at a recent meeting: "I knew a country lad who, when he was on a dark or lonely road, was in great fear, especially when he thought of God. The poor lad had heard of God, and that He punished sin, but he had never heard of pardon through a loving and compassionate Saviour. Some time ago he was led to the feet of Jesus, and now on the lonely country roads, instead of dreading Him, he communes with his Saviour as with his dearest friend."

Cheering a Dying Man.—The Rev. Mr. Robertson said: "The other day I went to see a man who was dying. He had no rest, and no sense of pardon. I said to him, 'Jesus says: "Be of good cheer; it is I, be not afraid." Now, do not think of me at all, but think of Jesus who said these words,' and with that passage I left him. On the following night when I called there was a great change in the man's face; the passage from the Scriptures had done its work, and by God's grace he was enabled to accept Jesus as his Saviour."

A Dissipated Octogenarian.—A Devoted Temperance worker observed that a poor, miserable old woman, about eighty years of age, was seen one day hobbling along the road with a stick in her hand, and a sack on her back. The old creature slipped and tottered forward, and a bottle of whiskey was observed to fall from under her tattered shawl. Laying aside her sack, she got down on her knees, and actually lapped the horrible liquid as it ran in the gutter. It was a revolting sight, sad enough to make any one an abstainer, however firmly they were held in the chains of the liquor fiend.

Dying Game.—The Rev. Mr. Ewing said: "I heard a little while ago of a distinguished painter, who spent his life for the world and the world's pleasures, although he believed there were a heaven and a hell. When on his death-bed he was affectionately asked to give himself to Christ, but he flippantly replied, 'No, I will die game.' And he died, as he had lived, without Christ, and therefore a lost man. Was that man right in refusing salvation even on a death-bed? No, he was not, for Christ saves to the uttermost all who come unto God by Him, but he was sensible enough to see and feel the base ingratitude of living a life for the world and sin, and then throwing the scraps to Christ."

His Last Chance Gone.—Mr. J. G. Forbes said: "Friends, I wish to tell you something. A short time ago a man came into our meeting, and some of the workers asked him if he would decide for the Lord; but his answer was, 'No; I will wait until I come again, some other time.' He did attend another meeting, and again he was asked to accept Christ as his Saviour; still he put the appeal aside by saying, 'No, I will think of it, and decide the next time I come.' But, friends, the next time never came, nor ever will for him. To-night a messenger came, asking me to visit the man, for he was at the point of death. I found him dead, stupid, and tried to arouse him by saying, 'Do you know that you are dying?' I tried to repeat the question several times before showing any sign of consciousness; then slowly opening his eyes, he answered, 'Aye, aye, know that I am dying.' These were the last words that man uttered; he passed away to meet God with a mountain of unforgiveness upon his head. He died of over-indulgence in strong drink."

An Invisible Witness.—Mr. Kilpatrick remarked: "I was visiting a man in the infirmary yesterday, and said to him, 'God has been witness of all you have done,' for I knew man's evil life. 'God has been a witness of I have done!' he exclaimed, with a look of horror; 'has He been watching all my secret doings? I cannot dare to think of it.' I believe that the words which I spoke to him were blessed to his soul, and that he obtained the forgiveness of all his sins through the blood of Lamb. Yes, dear friends, the mighty invisible but omniscient Jehovah is a witness to all our doings, whether they be good or evil. 'The God, sees't me!'"

A Surprising Exclamation.—A Christian Gentleman said: "I was acquainted with an eminent minister of the Gospel who labored in a large northern city, and whom I knew to be a child of God through faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. We were walking along the street together one day, when, catching hold of a railing he suddenly exclaimed, 'God be merciful to a sinner!' It was a sudden seizure of illness from which he never rallied, and which, a few days later, resulted in death; but I was much struck with the exclamation from so true a devoted a Christian. Dear friends, how many more need have those who are out of Christ cry, 'God be merciful to me a sinner!'"

A Lady's Customary "Nightcap."—The same devoted worker says: "I went on a visit to a friend of mine who was in the habit of taking drink of beer before going to bed, by way of 'nightcap,' as it is called. Before retiring to rest, she said to me: 'Won't you take a drop of beer?' 'No,' I said, 'I am an abstainer.' She sneered at what she affirmed was only whim. Some time after I had returned home my friend's sister wrote me, saying that she was drinking herself to death, and asking what she could do to cure her. I wrote her telling her to stop the drink at once. A day or two later she sent me word, saying that she had stopped it, because it might kill her. I went and consulted a temperance doctor, who said, 'Stop it at once; there is no danger.' I wrote telling them what the doctor said, but it was too late; she had died of it. A short time afterward I heard that her husband committed suicide, and left seven children, who had to seek homes in different parts of the world."

A Victim of the Whiskey Fiend.—Mr. Leonard related: "Not long ago I was sitting in a bedroom, about midnight, when I heard a slight tap at the street door. On opening it, a little boy looked up in my face, and said: 'Please sir, mother wants to see you; will you come a speak to her?' I put on my hat, and followed my little guide, until he stopped in front of a fence. Throwing open the gate, he entered, followed close behind. I found the mother standing outside the house, with five little children clinging round her. It was a very cold night, and they had no shelter from the storm. I found that the mother was afraid to enter the house, because her husband was intoxicated, and had threatened to kill her. I asked me to go inside and speak to him. When I entered, the house seemed to be quite dark, until, looking around me, I saw a light coming from a room, which I entered. No one was there, and I stood by the fire to await the mother of the house, who in a few minutes came slowly, and seeing a stranger standing, looked at me, but did not speak. Then he proceeded to turn out the lights. I became rather alarmed, and asked, 'Why are you putting out the lights?" and placing my hand on his arm, I detained him. At this moment his wife appeared, and, turning fiercely round, he tried to strike her. "Oh, help me, help me," she exclaimed, and I stood between the man and wife to protect her from the intended blow. She slipped away, and said: "Why do you try to strike your poor wife?" Because she will not bring me whiskey. Oh, whiskey, whiskey, what would I not do for whiskey!" and the poor inebriate broke down and wept. That whole night I spent with him, but I will not attempt to describe it. A few days afterward a messenger came to tell me that he was dead, and he died as he had lived, a Christless drunkard."

THE SECOND ADVENT.

The Teaching of the Apostles.

THE main question on which the Christian Church is divided on the subject of our Lord's Coming is as to the time, some believing that He will not return to the earth until after the Millennium, while others believe that His return must be before the commencement of that thousand years of blissful life. Both views are, of course, based on the Word of God, which, both sections of the Church regard as the final and supreme authority on all questions of belief. It seems to ourselves, in common with all pre-Millennial believers, that the plain and direct teaching of the Bible is that there can be no millennium until Jesus comes, and that the opposite view can be held by sincere Christian men only by explaining away, and putting a strained meaning upon several emphatic passages of Scripture, as well as running counter to the general tenor of the prophetic books. We would not for a moment be understood as reflecting upon the sincerity of those who differ from us. Many eminent men of ripe scholarship and undoubted piety hold very strongly opinions on this subject radically opposed to our own, but we believe that if once they were convinced that their views were unscriptural they would abandon them immediately. The whole question, therefore, turns upon the true meaning of certain well-known passages.

Infidels have frequently referred to such differences of opinion in their attacks on the Bible. But the argument is worthless. In our law courts differences of opinion of the same character are seen every day, and that, not only among lawyers whose opinions may be biased by their interests, but among judges who have no desire than that of giving a sound interpretation of the law. The recent Virginia Bond cases are an instance in point, nearly one half of the judges of the United States Supreme Court being opposed to the judgment of their learned associates. In the law courts we are accustomed to hear a great deal about "the authorities," and in legal arguments citations of authorities form an important element. It is in this sense that the ancient manuscript called the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, to which we have before referred in these columns, is of importance. Scholars have had it before them now for five years, and have examined it carefully. While a few believe that it is not genuine, others, by far the greater number, have arrived at the conclusion that it is a true and genuine statement of the doctrines taught by the Apostles, and that it was indorsed by them, and copies of it were in circulation among the churches within four hundred years, if not within a much shorter time, after our Lord's ascension. The Teaching must therefore be considered in the legal sense an "authority" of no mean value. What, then, do we find in it about this much debated question of the Second Advent? What did the Apostles teach with regard to it? The following extract is the sixteenth chapter of the Teaching [page 27 of the new edition published by Scribner's Sons]:

"Watch for your life's sake; let your lamps not go out, and your loins not be loosed, but be ready; for ye know not the hour in which our Lord cometh. But ye shall come together often and seek the things which befit your souls; for the whole time of your faith thus far, will not profit you, if ye be not made perfect in the last time. For in the last days the false prophets and the corruptors shall be multiplied, and the sheep shall be turned into wolves, and love shall be turned into hate; for when lawlessness increaseth they shall hate one another, and shall persecute and deliver up, and then shall appear the world-deceiver as Son of God, and shall do signs and wonders, and the earth shall be given into his hands, and he shall commit iniquities which have never been done since the beginning. Then all created men shall come into the fire of trial, and many shall be made to stumble and shall perish. But they that endure in their faith shall be saved from under ever of this curse. And then shall appear the sign of the truth; first, the sign of an opening in heaven, then the sign of a trumpet's sound, and thirdly, the resurrection of the dead; yet not of all, but as it hath been said; the Lord will come and all the saints with Him. Then shall the world see the Lord coming upon the clouds of heaven."

This chapter, which is a verbatim copy of the translated portion of the manuscript, shows that when it was written, whether in the lifetime of the Apostles or at a later date, the expectation was that the Lord might come speedily, and that no such interval as a thousand years was expected to intervene. That His coming would find the world a scene of sin, sorrow, suffering, backsliding, and persecution, not a scene of millennial blessedness; and finally that there would be two resurrections. All this we inferred from the Scriptures; the manuscript indicates that the early Church had the same belief.

REMINISCENCES OF GEN. GORDON.

THE Rev. J. R. L. Hall, a missionary who has been laboring in Palestine, thus describes his acquaintance with the noble Christian hero who was slaughtered in Khartoum: "I first met General Gordon at Jaffa. Five or six weeks afterward I went to Haifa to visit the missionary who was working there. The next morning the door of my room opened and in stepped General Gordon, and we speedily became great friends. He said, 'I have been praying for you ever since I left Jaffa. That day I put your name down in my prayer list, and I have been remembering you in prayer ever since.' He seemed to be in sorrow. He said to me, 'I am very restless; I came here for rest and quiet, to study the Word of God, and at the same time to discover different sacred sites. I am not satisfied; I am restless. I want Christian work. Do you think that, if I were to come to Jaffa, you could give me any work to do?' I replied, 'Most assuredly, there is plenty of work to be done, not by one person only, but by many, and I shall be very thankful if you will come.' 'Very well,' he said, 'when I come to Jaffa be sure you take a house for me.'

"I stayed at Jaffa three or four days, and General Gordon went with me to see different portions of the work. He went with me to the schools, and he stayed while I examined the children. He went with me to Akka, and in the evening when we walked along the shore he would be sure to speak of some passage of Scripture which he had been thinking about.

"He took a house and for eight months from that time—that is, from April, 1883, he remained in Jaffa, spending nearly every evening at my house. It is needless to say that he was a very pleasant and a very profitable companion. I have learned from this man more spirituality than I have learned from anybody else in this world. He always took a deep interest in missions, especially in the missions in Africa and in Japan. In Palestine it was the same. One day I received a letter from the Committee of the Society stating that they were very anxious to erect a mission-house at Nablous, but that they did not wish anything to be done till plans had been drawn and sent home.

"Mr. Fletcher, the missionary at Nablous, went with me to General Gordon's house. We wanted to go in the forenoon, but General Gordon spent the whole of the forenoon in prayer and the study of the Scriptures, and his servants were strictly forbidden to let anyone come in during that part of the day. I was admitted on one or two occasions in the forenoon, but it was on account of the kind interest he took in our work. I was obliged to see him on business that morning; when I went into his room I found him at the table in his shirt sleeves. He asked me what I wanted with him, and I replied, 'We want your advice with regard to the mission-house at Nablous.' Then I began very gradually to tell him what our object was. I said, 'We want to erect a mission-house at Nablous, and Mr. Fletcher has come down to talk to me about the plans.'

"General Gordon interrupted me in my long apology. He said, 'I know what you want; you need not speak to me in that way—you want a contribution.' I told him that we did not want a contribution, but we wanted something of more value, in fact we wanted to know if he would draw the plans.

"'Draw the plans!' he said, 'yes, certainly.' He at once got a piece of paper, wrote down the number of rooms we wanted, the number of doors and windows, and the position of the house, and he told me that he would at once set to work. In the evening he came to my house with most beautiful plans. The next evening I saw a carpenter and a mason, and he put down for the information of the men full specifications, and made a complete estimate of what the expense of the building would be; and that house has been erected at Nablous for the sum which General Gordon said it would cost.

"A few days after I told General Gordon how afraid I had been to ask him to draw the plans. 'At first,' I said, 'I did not know how you might take being asked to do the work.' He said, 'You thought I should be annoyed at being asked to draw out plans for a mission-house. If there is anything I can do for the cause of missions I am delighted to do it. What did I come to Jaffa for? Did I not tell you at Haifa that if you could give me some work to do for the Lord that would set my mind at rest? I was restless because I had been shutting myself up in Palestine and had not been putting out my powers for service in the Lord's work.'

"General Gordon did very much for me in Jaffa. He twice took our English service. He visited a number of people; he went with me on nearly every journey that I took to the different mission fields, and in many ways he assisted and encouraged me in my work. He constantly spoke to me about God's blessed promises, and when I was in difficulty he urged me to put away all care, and said that God would be sure to help me in my mission work.

"At last, in the autumn of 1883, he came to me, and said he thought he must leave, as he had made a promise to the King of the Belgians some months before that if Stanley wished to retire from the Congo, he would go and undertake the work. One day there came to Jaffa a gentleman who seemed to be an agent of the King of the Belgians, and he said that Stanley wished to go home, and that His Majesty wanted General Gordon to go to the Congo. General Gordon asked what time the king would give him to start, and the agent said not later than the beginning of January, 1884. I did my best to dissuade the General from going. I told him that, great as the work at the Congo might be, beneficial as it might be to Africa and to the world at large, he should remember that there was no one else who could do the work which he could do in Egypt. 'I am convinced,' I said, 'that Egypt is the place for you to go to.' He said all his own thoughts turned toward Egypt. He said his heart yearned for the people there. 'I do feel with my whole heart and soul,' he said, 'that there is work for me to perform in Egypt, if it were only possible.'"

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscribers may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Decoration-Day was Observed on Saturday as a general holiday in New York and most of the Northern cities, and the graves of the dead heroes were decorated by their comrades. President Cleveland came to New York to review the procession and was greeted with general enthusiasm. On their way to take position in the line of march the Seventh Regiment passed the residence of General Grant, in East Sixty-sixth Street. The shades of the house, which had been closely drawn, were rolled up by General Grant himself as the regiment approached. In his dressing-gown, with his skull-cap drawn tightly over his head, he stood unsupported in the bow-window while the regiment passed. Mrs. Grant was at the front window on the same floor, and Colonel Fred Grant and wife and Mrs. Jesse Grant watched the regiment from the floors below. Reno Post, No. 44, and Gilsa Post, No. 264, marched by General Grant's house about an hour after the Seventh Regiment. This time the general took a prominent place at the front window, the bands playing, "Hail to the Chief." It was a picture long to be remembered, as rank after rank of veterans passed with uplifted faces, each one eager to get a glance at their old comrade and commander, and many a voice choked when speaking of his appearance. General Grant stood at the window until both posts had passed, returning the salutes of the members. He was evidently much affected.

The National Commercial Convention, which has been holding its sittings this year at Atlanta, Ga., is chiefly remarkable for the indications noticed of a change of opinion in the South. On both the questions of bankruptcy and the silver coinage there was a notable difference. When the motion was put that the public interests require the enactment of a general bankruptcy law, one hundred and five delegates from Southern States voted in its favor, and one hundred and twenty-seven against. Heretofore there has been an overwhelming majority of Southern delegates against the principle, but the movement in its favor has evidently been general. On the silver question the South has usually coalesced with the West, but at this year's convention the motion demanding the suspension of the silver coinage received one hundred and thirty-three Southern votes to eighty-nine against it. On both questions Northern opinion is in harmony with the Southern movement.

The Dolphin Made a Successful Trial Trip after her three failures, on Thursday last. Mr. Roach managed to get her over the six-hour test demanded by Mr. Whitney, at the rate agreed upon. He was in high spirits over the result, which doubtless surprised him as much as any one. She has now to pass the ordeal of a sea trip before she is accepted by the Government. Mr. Whitney, in a recent letter to the commandant of the Mare Island Navy Yard, called attention to the cost of the Mohican, a small wooden ship which has been under repair nearly thirteen years, and has cost in repairs alone $900,000, or three times the amount that a new ship of the same style would have cost. The Omaha, which originally cost, with machinery, $756,764, has cost in repairs $683,395, bringing up her entire cost to $1,440,159, more than three times her value. These are two cases the knowledge of which has doubtless rendered Mr. Whitney cautious in accepting the Dolphin.

Serious Outrages by the Apaches are Reported. Geronimo's band has killed, with fearful atrocities, several men and women at Benton. They also butchered, near Deming, N. M., some thirty men, women, and children, after torturing them in a fiendish manner. General Crook and General Bradley are making the best of their way to the scene of the disturbances. The Apaches have broken up into several marauding parties in the neighborhood of the Black Mountains. It is expected that when the United States troops arrive the Indians will try to escape into Mexico, but the passes are guarded by cowboys, who are wild with excitement and thirsting for vengeance. Their passion was intensified when the mutilated body of a girl was brought in. The Indians had hung her up alive on a meat-hook by the back of her neck. Worse atrocities still are reported.

The Surrender of Poundmaker Last Week reduces the north-west rebellion to a small compass. Big Bear and his braves are still out, but with Riel and Poundmaker in custody they cannot, it is thought, hold out long. His followers do not number one half of those Poundmaker had. Efforts are being made to obtain mercy for Riel and the other prisoners. In the course of his "talk" last Friday evening, Dr. Talmage uttered some wholesome truths on the Indian question generally. He said, after advocating the release of Riel: "Let Canada and the United States cease their exasperation of the Indians, and neither nation will have any more trouble with the red men. They have endured more wrongs from government officials and suffered more outrages from white men than we would have endured from any other people, of whatever color. A general of the United States Army, who has been in more battles against the Indians than any other officer, told me that in all the Indian wars the white men were most to blame. Canada and the United States have crowded the savages back and off, and disregarded solemnities of treaties, and swindled these men of the forest so grievously that it is a wonder they have been quiet a moment for the last forty years. Canada and the United States can afford to be merciful to these barbarians when, after a season of belligerency, they wash off their war-paint."

War Between Russia and England is Now said to have been finally averted. The London Daily News on Saturday announced on "the highest authority"—believed to be that of Lord Granville—that Russia's reply to England's counter proposals was received in London on Friday. The reply, it says, "involves the acceptance of the proposals and practically settles, in a satisfactory manner, the whole question of the Afghan boundary. Both Maruchak and Zulikar remain in the possession of the Ameer. The main features of the work of delimitation have been finally fixed, and the Boundary Commission will settle the details. The negotiations have been conducted in a most friendly spirit on both sides." The News in an editorial says: "Mr. Gladstone has crowned his illustrious career by again rendering the country a signal service. We must not forget, now that peace is secured, how near we came to a war such as this generation has not seen." It is difficult for outsiders to realize what the valuable service consists in. Mr. Gladstone appears to have given up Penjdeh, to have failed in his attempt to fetter Russia with a treaty as to the line where her aggression must stop. He has not involved the country in a war with Russia, which is a matter for thankfulness; but it is not clear what he has gained by the disturbance he has made and the large expenditure of money which he authorized.

A Serious Communistic Disturbance Occurred in Paris on Sunday, May 24th. A large body of Communists assembled and marched to the Cemetery of Pere la Chaise to decorate the graves of the men who were executed for participating in the orgies of the Commune in 1871. They carried red flags and other communistic banners and emblems. The police ordered them to give up the red flag, and when they refused the police made a bayonet charge, and there was a fight, in which the Communists used paving stones. Ultimately the police were re-enforced and drove their opponents out of the cemetery. On the following day the Communists returned with their red flags and were permitted to demonstrate in peace. It is feared that this vacillation on the part of the Government will be interpreted as a sign of weakness by the Communists, and that there will be more trouble.

A Reprieve of Two Years has been granted to the Czar by the Nihilists, according to a cablegram published by the New York Herald. It states that a congress of the order has been held during the past week at Kharkoff, which decided that for two years no attempt shall be made against the life of the Czar nor any member of the Imperial family. Every possible effort will be made to induce the Czar to issue the constitution that was actually signed by the late Czar on the very day of his assassination, but which was never promulgated. At the congress a copy of this ukase for a constitution, the tenor of which has been guarded as a profound secret by the Imperial family, was read and discussed and unanimously approved. It is of the most liberal character, based on that of Germany, and if promulgated will be the virtual end of Russian autocracy. If at the expiration of two years the Czar refuses to grant the constitution, then the policy of assassination and terrorism will be inaugurated on a scale never yet attempted. It would appear from this statement that in murdering the late Czar the Nihilists committed a blunder as well as a crime. They are now craving from his successor the constitution he would have promulgated if they had permitted him to live.

The Seizure of an Island in the Pacific by England is one of the significant events which show that she is alive to the exigencies of the situation, and is strengthening her strategic position in the East. The island seized is in the Korean Straits, which it commands almost as completely as Gibraltar commands the entrance to the Mediterranean. It belongs to the Nan How group, consisting of two large islands—Sodo and Sunhodo—which almost touch each other at their southern extremity, and Observatory Island, which occupies a position that makes a natural harbor capable of accommodating a fleet. The harbor is called Port Hamilton, and this England has seized. The harbor will form a convenient depot for coals, and if that and Observatory Island are fortified, the position will be impregnable. Its main advantage in time of war would be that it controls the passage to the sea of Japan, and is exactly the kind of important isolated position that England for centuries has shown so remarkable a tendency to seize whenever she could do so. How Corea will take this proceeding remains to be seen.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South and others with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD were received last week to the amount of $6, in the following sums: A Friend, $1; from Leesville, Mich. $1; Toronto, Can., $2; a Friend, $2. This enables us to add six more names to our gratist list, of which we are very glad, as are the ministers who will now receive the journal for a year.

The Death of the Rev. R. L. Stanton, D.D., occurred on board the Nevada on Thursday last, when the vessel was nearing Queenstown. Dr. Stanton was on his way to attend the Convention on Faith Healing being held this week in London. Dr. Stanton had been in feeble health for some time, and had in addition suffered from malarial fever. He was seventy-five years of age, but was still full of energy. He was an Old School Presbyterian, and in 1866 he presided over the General Assembly of that branch of the Presbyterian Church. He had also held the office of President of the Miami University at Oxford, Ohio. He was a brother of Henry B. Stanton.

The Progress of the White Cross Society has received an impetus from the visit of Mr. Henry Varley, the famous English evangelist, to this country. He has been preaching and lecturing in our principal cities during the past few months, and holding meetings for young men, in which he has presented the work of the society in its true light. His lectures on Chastity have been productive of much good, and it may be hoped their effect will be permanent. Mr. Varley preached in Dr. Talmage's Church last Sunday night.

One of Bishop Taylor's Band of Missionaries has fallen on the field of labor. Mr. John A. Condit, a promising young man, only twenty-one years old, died on March 24th. As announced here last week, the party were all well on March 13th, and spoke hopefully of their prospects. They afterward pushed on inland and stopped at the Baptist missionary station to arrange about purchasing land and materials for starting an undenominational station. During their journey young Condit was butted in the stomach—accidentally, it is claimed—by a negro who was carrying him across a stream. The young man was injured, but he had to tramp sixty-seven miles in the hot sun to reach his destination. When he reached there he was taken ill with a burning fever, and after three days' suffering he died. Another of the party was not expected to live when the letter containing the sad news was written. The body was buried by the Baptists in Africa, but they will endeavor to have it brought home. Mr. Condit was an active worker at Jerry McAuley's Mission and a member of Mr. A. B. Simpson's Twenty-third Street Tabernacle.

Arrested for Preaching is Happily an Unusual item in police-court news in our day, but it appeared in the record of a court in Boston, Mass., last week. The Rev. H. L. Hastings and the Hon. W. F. Davis were brought into the Municipal Court of that city, on May 27th, charged with preaching on the common on the previous Sunday. It is stated that there is a law of the commonwealth of Massachusetts prohibiting preaching in that and other public places. If the assertion is correct, it is time such a law disappeared from the statute-book of any State in which it is found. The trial of the two preachers was adjourned; its result will be awaited with much interest.

The Heroism of a Judge was Displayed Last week in Pennsylvania, under painful circumstances. A young man committed a murder at Warriorsmark, Pa., on May 27th. He fled from the police and took refuge in his father's house at Huntingdon, Pa. His father is Judge Laporte, and to him he confessed his crime. The judge listened in agony, but his sense of duty was not overcome by parental love. "John," he said, "this is horrible. When I was made a judge I swore to obey the Constitution and enforce the laws of the Commonwealth, and I cannot do otherwise than surrender you to the officers. If you are justifiable in this thing, you will be cleared and our name vindicated; but if not, the law must take its course." The judge immediately harnessed his horse and drove his son to the nearest railroad station, where they boarded the first train, and the son was surrendered to the sheriff. This course, the judge's friends aver, was taken from a pure sense of duty. While we honor the father for his lofty principles, we cannot but sympathize with him in the pain it must have cost him. An attempt to realize what that pain was may help us to understand something of the meaning of that great sacrifice which was made in our behalf (Rom. 8: 32).

A Clergyman's Torn Trousers Afforded some amusement and also an opportunity for inculcating a good lesson last week. Toward the close of the prayer-meeting at Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, on May 29th, Mr. Beecher, shaking his finger gravely at those who sat on his left, said to those who sat on his right: "The edification hasn't been evenly divided this evening. My friends on the left have been industriously engaged in laughing at me because I have a big hole in the left leg of my pantaloons. Allow me to inform them that these are a new pair. If they were old and I couldn't afford new ones, I should be dreadfully ashamed. As it is, I'm not, though my wife is. In making a call this afternoon my leg came in contact with a barrel and it had a nail in it, hence the tear. I tried to close it with a pin, but the pin dropped out. So it is with our sins. We can't pin them up. The pin will drop out and disclose the bare spot." The great preacher was right; sin may be covered up for a time by skillful sinners, but eventually it will be disclosed—at the Day of Judgment, if not before, unless it is blotted out by the atoning blood of the Saviour (Prov. 28: 13).

A Fraternization of Union and Confederate soldiers took place at Baltimore, Md., recently. A reunion of the Army of the Potomac was being held in the city, when the Robert E. Lee Camp, of the Confederate Volunteers, arrived. When the fact was reported at the reunion a resolution was passed appointing a committee to invite their old opponents to seats on the floor. At the conclusion of business the committee returned, bringing with them a long string of men in gray suits. They were greeted with great applause, and in return filed the house with a responsive cheer that threatened to pull down the ceiling. The ex-Confederates were scattered among the blue-coats and their officers invited to occupy seats on the stage. Colonel McGinnis, of Montana, welcomed them with a graceful speech, to which Commander-General Cooke responded. Short but brilliant addresses were made by Colonel Charles Marshall, who was chief of General Lee's staff, and Colonel Evans, of Richmond, Va. Prior to this reception General Grant had been re-elected President with enthusiasm. The general has accepted the office with much pleasure, though warning his old comrades that his health will not admit of his attending to its duties. We know that a time is coming when the soldiers of the Cross who have so long been separated into various and often hostile companies will come together and recognize each other as brethren (1 Cor. 3: 4-9).

The Tail of a Tigress was Operated upon at Salem, Mass., on May 27th. Several weeks ago a Bengal tigress belonging to the Van Amburg show, in a frenzy bit off the end of her tail. The animal is a splendid type of the carnivorous species, but this mutilation spoiled her appearance, and the wound would not heal, but caused her so much pain as to render her more dangerous than ever. Week after week passed by, but the bob-tailed tigress grew no better. Innumerable little pieces of bone projected from what was left of the vertebra, and as long as these bones remained there was no chance for the beast to recover. Her owners, therefore, sent for a well-known dog doctor of Boston, to operate on the tail. The beast was securely tied, and the doctor set to work removing the pieces of crushed bone. The operation lasted twenty minutes, during which the vicious beast was in a paroxysm of fury. A thick board was given her to bite, to prevent her inflicting further injuries on herself, and this she chewed into fragments. At last the final piece of bone was taken out, and the wound washed in carbolic acid. Then the tigress was released, but instead of bounding up, as was expected, she lay exhausted by her pain and fury on the floor of her cage. The beast paid dearly for the gratification of her anger, first in the pain she inflicted on herself, and afterward in the pain of the operation which her folly rendered necessary. It is a pity that sinners do not see that they are doing a similar thing; their sin is not only an offense against God, but an injury to themselves (Prov. 8: 36).

A Horse's Memory Settled a Dispute in Penn-sylvania recently. Mr. Wells, a farmer of Susquehanna County, a few days ago saw a valuable bay mare which he felt sure was one stolen, when a colt, from his stable six years ago. He challenged the owner, who was also a respectable farmer. The owner gave a perfectly clear account of how he had become possessed of the mare, and mentioned the name of a well-known dealer from whom he had purchased her. He, too, was a man not to be suspected of dishonesty. But still Wells insisted that the mare was the one of which he had been robbed. The dispute grew animated and appeared likely to end in a fight, when it was settled by an ingenious device. It was agreed that the mare should be turned loose in the road, and if she went of her own accord to Wells's stable and to a particular stall there, Wells's claim should be considered proved; if she went anywhere else or to any other stall, he was to abandon his claim. The mare's harness was accordingly taken off and the spectators watched her eagerly. She stuck up her ears and appeared to be familiar with the place. Then she went directly to the stable, passed three or four empty stalls, squeezed her way between a wagon and a mowing-machine, and entered the stall which Wells said she would. Then she began at once to nose around in the manger in search of food and appearing to be perfectly at home. The incident may well remind those whom Satan has decoyed away from their God of the gentle reproach uttered through the prophet (Isa. 1: 3).

Imprisonment in a Capsized Ship was Endured by a lady and her child for seventeen hours recently. The London Standard relates that on May 11th a brig struck on a sandbank near Hull and turned over, keel uppermost. The captain and every man on board were drowned, being entangled in the rigging and so prevented swimming. The captain's wife and her three children were in the cabin, and it was thought they too must be dead; but on the following morning the crew of a steam-tug that passed near the wreck heard some one knocking. Intent on rescue, they decided to cut a hole in the side of the capsized ship. After several hours' labor this was accomplished, and the captain's wife and one of her children were rescued alive, after an agonizing suspense of seventeen hours. The mother said that when she was aroused by the overturn of the ship and the in-rush of the water, she contrived to get hold of the children, who all held on by the hair of her head, and in that way for some time all of the little ones were kept alive, but during the day two of them died. Just as the man who rescued them got into the cabin, the water flowed in and reached to the woman's mouth. All the children were still clinging to her hair, and she and the live child were in a terribly exhausted condition. The mother's hands were raw with knocking at the side of the keel. Poor woman, it was all she could do; she could not rescue herself, and though she could not know whether any one would hear her, she continued knocking with her bruised hands. In a condition as desperate spiritually, sinners have more encouragement to knock at the gate of mercy, for God's ear is ever open (Matt. 7: 7, 8).

DELIGHT IN THE ALMIGHTY.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For then shalt thou have thy delight in the Almighty, and shalt lift up thy face unto God."—JOB 22: 26.

The Mistake of Job's Friends—Other People Puzzled—A Right Principle Misapplied—A Company of Self-Appointed Judges—Two Blunders—The Humble and the Arrogant—I. A Desired Position—What is Meant by Delighting in God—Rejoicing in His Existence—In His Character—In His Acts—The Upraised Face—Its Signification—II. When it is Realized—After Reconciliation and Renewal—Purification of Life—Constant Trust—A Terrible Doom.

THE Lord said to Eliphaz and his friends, "Ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath;" and, therefore, we must always regard what they said with careful discrimination. They were wise men according to their light, but they were quite at sea in their judgment of Job. However, in this particular verse Eliphaz declared that which is taught in many other parts of Holy Scripture, and we may profit by his utterance. God grant that by His Spirit we may fully experience the joys described in the words before us.

Eliphaz and his friends had judged Job from their own point of view, making their own experience to be the standard. They themselves had prospered, and, therefore, they inferred that if a man served God he must necessarily prosper in worldly things; and that if he did not succeed as they had done, he must have been guilty of great crimes. Though they could not discover any actual fault in Job, they concluded without further evidence that he must have been a hypocrite, and have acted oppressively to his servants, or have been unmindful of the claims of the poor, or in some other way have brought upon himself the wrath of God. It never entered their mind that so terrible a sickness and such a list of dreadful calamities could have befallen any man except as a punishment for special sin. They inferred virtue from prosperity, and sin from adversity. Unrighteous and

CRUEL LOGIC!

At once false and brutal! It renders men at once false witnesses and Pharisees; condemning the innocent because of their sorrows, and flattering themselves because of their ease. To judge according to outward circumstances has been the tendency of men in all times; even David could not understand how it was that the wicked were so free from troubles, while all the day long he was himself plagued, and chastened every morning.

A right principle lay at the bottom of this wonder; for, indeed, the Lord will reward the good and will punish the wicked; but a great mistake is made when we suppose that this life is the time for meting out rewards and punishments. God will, undoubtedly, when the time shall have fully come, discharge the full vials of His wrath upon the ungodly, but the present is a period of long-suffering, wherein the wicked spread themselves like a green bay tree. As for the children of God, it often happeneth that gall and wormwood are mingled with their drink; waters of a full cup are wrung out to them. We must not judge according to the sight of the eyes, or according to present conditions, or we shall make gross mistakes. The richest may be the most wicked, and the poorest may be the most gracious; those who suffer least may deserve to suffer most, and those who are most afflicted in this life may have the highest glory in the life to come.

SELF-APPOINTED JUDGES.

I suspect that Eliphaz and his friends had enjoyed smooth sailing. How should they judge the man who had done business amid tempests? Their mental life was not disturbed by great conflicts; they had not gone deeply into things, nor searched to the bottom of spiritual matters; they had no knowledge of their own hidden corruptions, and had endured but little of the rod of chastisement, and, consequently, they had been at ease. Their mistake was that they sat in judgment upon another who was more tried than themselves, and condemned him for being in sore distress. Their own serenity led them to judge the troubled one very harshly. This ought not to be. If any of us are inclined thus to judge and condemn, it is time that we put this mischievous spirit far from us.

I remember a company of terribly despondent believers who were for years a severe scourge to their happier brethren. Having a deep sense of their inward corruptions, being sorely tempted of the devil, and having only a weak and trembling faith, they tyrannized over others who were more happy than themselves. They judged that those who were not as much tempted as themselves did not exhibit the spot of God's children. None were more bitter than these humble people in denouncing those who had not been as much humbled as themselves. Those who did not sit in the dust, and groan to the same tunes as themselves, they judged to be very dubious Christians, and took care to scald them with that kind of hot pity which is not much different from contempt.

This was as wrong as wrong can be. But it is equally evil when judgments are pronounced from the other side. For persons in good health, whose livers act well, who have abundance of this world's good, and very little care and trial, who have not often had to stand by the grave and weep because the arrows of death have struck their dearest ones, who have never known what it is to be wounded in spirit—for these to set up their standard and condemn the weak and the sad, is a crime against the Lord. To say—"If you do not believe as firmly as we do, if you do not rejoice as we do, if you are not as sensible of sanctification as we are, you are not in Christ at all, is very grievous to the Spirit of the Lord. Oh, my strong brother, listen to one who knows by experience the heaviness of a child of sorrow. Who made thee a ruler in Israel? God's children always play the fool when they play the judge; they are never in order when they act as if they were the head of the family of grace. Here was the fault of Eliphaz. He was right in many of his statements, but he was wrong in his ungenerous application of them to holy Job.

I want, this morning, as God shall help me, to lead you up to the pastures on the hill-tops. I pray that I may help you to a higher and joyful experience in the things of God, while I shall speak, first, of a desired position toward God. "Then shalt thou have thy delight in the Almighty, and shalt lift up thy face unto God;" and, secondly upon the question—when can this happy experience be realized? "Then," says the text, and, therefore, there is such a time when we can have delight in the Almighty and lift up our face unto God.

I. First, here is

toward God. Many men forget God: He is no object of delight to them, for they ignore His existence, and they would even think it a great relief if it could be proved that there were no God—no God to observe them, no God to record their misdeeds, no God to call them to judgment, no God to punish them for their iniquities. Great numbers of men go a stage further: they believe in God, they cannot doubt that there is a Most High God who judgeth the children of men; but their only thought toward Him is that of dread and dislike. They do not want to hear of Him: if the things of God are forced upon their attention they are soon weary of such distasteful themes, for they only look upon God as a just and terrible Judge, who will certainly punish them for their transgressions. They think of God with dread, dismay, despondency, and despair.

I am grieved to add that this principle even tinctures the thoughts of true friends of God: for when they bow before God it is not only with the reverence of a loving child, but with the terror of a slave; they are afraid of Him who should be their exceeding joy. Their view of God is incorrect, for it is not such as the Spirit of adoption would give them. They are really trusting in Him and in the great propitiation which He has set forth, but they have not come to know Him under that blessed term which our Saviour puts into our mouth when He bids us say, "Our Father, which art in heaven."

WHAT THE POSITION IS.

Let us meditate awhile upon what is here meant by delighting in the Almighty. The man who experiences this delight is glad that there is a God. That atheistic philosophy which makes the whole world to be a chance production which grew of itself, or developed itself by some innate force, is a very dreary piece of fiction to the man who delights himself in the Almighty. I tremble at any teaching, religious or scientific, which seems to place God further off than we have believed Him to be. To draw Him nearer to me, and myself nearer to Him, is the innermost longing of my soul.

To go a step further, the delight of the believer in his God is a delight in God as He really is; for there are in the world many false gods of men's own manufacture. Remember that your own thoughts of what God is are far from being correct unless they are drawn from His own revelation. This sacred book is infallible, but not our thoughts; and wherein we differ from God as He has revealed Himself we differ from the truth. It is as easy to make an idol out of your own thoughts as it is for the Hindoo to make a god of the mud of the Ganges. There is but one God revealed in Holy Scripture, and in nature, and in providence: His name is Jehovah, the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, who has still further declared Himself as the God and Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

COMPLETE CONFIDENCE.

Further, he that delights in God delights not only in God as He is, but in all that God does, and this is a higher attainment than some have reached. "It is the Lord," said one of old, "let Him do what seemeth him good." Concerning any event we simply ask—Has God done it? Then we bow before His decree, and say no more; for what He has done must be right and wise. When the Lord afflicts us, and hides the reason from our eyes, let us not contend with Him; but if we cannot go further, let us be silent before Him; even as was the afflicted man of God, of whom we read, "Aaron held his peace." Better still will it be if we can complete our confidence, and say, with Job, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, and blessed be the name of the Lord."

Practically put, this delight in the Almighty shows itself in the Christian when nothing else remains to Him. If He be stripped of everything, he cries, "The Lord is my portion." When the cupboard is bare, and the garments are worn out, and poverty stares the man in the face, he says, "My God is such a satisfactory and all-sufficient portion that I am rich and increased in goods while possessing nothing but my God." The same is true when such a man is surrounded with every earthly comfort, for He still feels, "The Lord is my portion." One saint, who suddenly became poor, was still as happy as ever, for He said, "When I had abundance, I saw God in all things, and now that I have lost my property I see all things in God." These are equally blessed states of mind. It were well to combine them, and see God in all things, and all things in God, at the same time! So it should be with the believer.

"Delight thyself in the Lord." This will give you pleasure in the midst of pain. Do you know what it is to have many aches, and sufferings, and, perhaps, a throbbing head, and yet to feel that you have another self which has no pains, because it dwells in God, where all is calm and quiet? You felt that it would be a great mercy to be released from this painful life; and yet you have not raised the question with your God, but have waited his good pleasure. Faith has made you feel, "Wherever I am, whatever I feel, so long as God is near me, and His sweet love fills my bosom, I will greatly rejoice and triumph in the God of my salvation."

I call your attention to the special name by which Eliphaz describes the ever-blessed God. He says, "Delight thyself in the Almighty." What a mercy it is that there is a power that makes for righteousness!—that at the back of all these wars and confusions, and behind all sin and false doctrine, there is an infinitely powerful God! During the last few weeks you have felt an intense joy in the omnipotence of God. You have whispered to your forebodings—"It is all right. The Almighty is not paralyzed, his arm is not shortened: the Lord reigneth." Brethren, the pendulum swings to and fro, advancing and retreating, but yet there is a real progress made: you cannot see it by watching the pendulum, but up higher on the face of the clock there is evidence of an onward march, and of a coming hour. The kingdom of God is coming; righteousness shall prevail.

THE UPLIFTED FACE.

Now, let us turn with intense satisfaction to the other expression used by Eliphaz: "Thou shalt lift up thy face unto God." What does it mean? Does it not mean, first, joy in God? When a man hangs his head down he is unhappy: it is the attitude of misery; but oh, when our thoughts of God are changed, and our relationship to God is different, we lift up our faces and sun our countenances in the light of God's favor. Does it not signify, also, that this man is reconciled to God, and clear before him? How can he look up who is guilty? Guilt makes a man hang his head. Does not our text indicate fearlessness? Fear covers her face, and would fain hide herself altogether, even though to accomplish concealment the rocks must fall upon her. May it not also signify expectation? "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help." "My expectation is from Him," says David. Oh, to lift one's face toward God, looking for deliverance, safety, and rest, and expecting both grace and glory from his right hand! Brethren, I am talking very simply of things well known to me, and yet I cannot convey to you a sense of the joy of a face uplifted unto God. You must feel it for yourselves, by lifting up your own faces.

II. I must close by noticing our second point, and that is,

WHEN CAN WE REALIZE THIS?

I have not confidence enough in Eliphaz to make his answer to the question the only one that I shall give you: I must give you something fuller and better than was known to him. First, a man can realize all this when he knows that he is reconciled to God. Yet even this could not effect our delight in God unless there was something else; so there must be, in the next place, a renewed nature. Our old nature will never delight in God. The carnal mind is enmity against God; it is not reconciled to God, neither indeed can be; it is an alien from the life of God, and an alien it will always be. So, then, ye must be born again; but when a man is born again of the Spirit of God, and receives a new nature, that new nature delights in the Almighty. There is an old nature in us which fights against God still; but the new nature, which is of divine origin, cries after God as a child after its mother.

What would some of you give to see the dear face of that dear father who was taken from you years ago! I can understand Cowper saying of his mother's picture,

"Oh, that those lips had language!"

Oh, that our departed ones could speak to us again; but our heavenly Father ever lives; and never let it be said that we dare not lift up our faces unto Him. We look up, and say in our darkest moments,

"For yet I know I shall Him praise

Who graciously to me

The health is of my countenance,

Yea, mine own God is He."

I cannot tell you the inexpressible sweetness of that last line to my soul. Thousands of times it has fallen from my lips. If I have nothing else, I have a God, and my soul lays hold on Him as Jacob grasped the angel.

THE HEAVENLY PATH.

To come to Eliphaz, and to conclude with him. We shall delight ourselves in God, and lift up our face when we do as Eliphaz here tells us. First, when we live in communion with Him. "Acquaint now thyself with Him, and be at peace." If we do not know God, how can we delight in Him? What delight can there be in an unknown God? Brothers, you are not half as happy as you might be, because you do not study this Book, wherein, as in a glass, you may see the face of Jehovah your God. Oh, that you knew more of His dear Son, for He that hath seen Him hath seen the Father! There must also be added to this delight in the Word a constant cleansing of the way. "If thou return to the Almighty, thou shalt be built up, thou shalt put away iniquity far from thy tabernacles." God cannot manifest himself to us if we continue in sin. If you professing Christian people are as greedy and hard as other people in your dealings with the world, and if in your families you are as quarrelsome and untruthful as the ungodly, God cannot come to your tabernacles. Put away sin wherever you perceive it, and ask for grace to be helped to detect it in all its lurking places. Seek out the Babylonish garment and the wedge of gold which Achan has hidden, for else the Lord cannot abide with you. Get rid of your idols.

In addition to this, there must be a constant trust. "Yea, the Almighty shall be thy defence, and thou shalt have plenty of silver" (see verse 25). He who does not trust God cannot delight in Him. You cannot lift up your face to Him while you think Him untrue. A childlike confidence is essential to a holy joy. We sometimes know a great deal too much of what we ought not to know. I see some of God's children very anxious to feed upon the tree of the knowledge of good and evil; but as for me, I am content with the tree of life. The old serpent still persuades men to pluck forbidden fruit from that evil tree. I know children of God who hold their hands to their heads and cry, "Would God we had never read that sceptical book, and never learned how to distrust the Lord!" Let the time past suffice for the feeding of doubt. Be it yours and mine to come to Christ, to live on Him, and to believe on Him with unstaggering faith; so shall we delight ourselves in God, and lift up our faces to Him. Lastly, let us abide in continual prayer. Verse 27: "Thou shalt make thy prayer unto Him, and He shall hear thee, and thou shalt pay thy vows." Want of prayer is a great want indeed; slackness at the mercy-seat will soon take away the spring and elasticity of our spiritual walk. If we are to have a closer walk with God, we must have closer communion with God in supplication.

A TERRIBLE FATE.

Now, dear children of God, I have set all this before you, but what power can be in my word unless the Holy Ghost blesses it? I have watered this sermon with strong desires for the spiritual benefit of you all, and now I am mourning over the many who do not know anything at all about it. They are still devoid of the knowledge of God, and of all desire for Him. I am very, very sorry for you. My heart pities you. We have heard of "the Bitter Cry" from the slums of London, and a bitter cry it will may be; but there is a poverty, compared with which mere want of bread is riches; there is a degradation, compared with which the low estate of the pauper is nobility itself. To live without your God—how terrible a death!

If there were no hereafter, the immediate peace and joy of trusting my God are an overflowing reward. But there is a hereafter, and what will you ungodly ones do when that hereafter dawns upon you? You have done without God all your days, and God will do without you to all eternity. What terror lies in that fact!

He will say, "Depart!" because you always did depart; He will decree your continuance in the path which you chose, and bid you keep on going away from Him for ever. He will say, "He that is filthy, let him be filthy still," and what more dreadful doom can fall upon any one of you? Oh! ye immortal spirits, ye need an immortal God! May the uplifted Saviour draw you and uplift you! May you begin the life of heaven by an immediate delight in the Almighty, and from that delight may you never cease! To Him be glory forever and ever. Amen!

NEW BOOKS.

PROSE WRITINGS OF NATHANIEL P. WILLIS, selected by Henry A. Beers. It is well that the writings of Willis should be rescued from the oblivion into which they have unhappily fallen. There are many reasons why this generation of American readers ought to be acquainted with a writer who, if he did not possess the highest type of genius, is so far above mediocrity as to deserve something better than the chilly neglect of his countrymen. It may be hoped that the selection his biographer has made in this volume will attract attention to Willis's work, and lead to a better appreciation of his talents. It ought not to be necessary to remind American readers that England has no monopoly of genius, or to assure them that they may find good in a book that has not crossed to us from the other side of the Atlantic.

Professor Beers has selected for this volume the sketches in which Willis drew most largely on his own reminiscences. His reason for adopting this principle was that in those sketches Willis was at his best, and also because they most clearly show the range and variety of his powers. From "Pencilings by the Way," the series of letters he wrote while mixing in fashionable society in England, Professor Beers gives us three extracts: "A Dinner at Lady Blessington's;" "A Breakfast with Charles Lamb;" and "A Week at Gordon Castle." Two sketches, "Love in the Library," and "Trenton Falls," are from "Edith Linsey," and there are three of the famous sketches he wrote while at Glenmary, under the title, "Letters from Under a Bridge." Besides these and other good sketches, Professor Beers includes a number of the short pieces which Willis wrote later in life while he was editing the Home Journal, and some of which were originally published in that journal. Among them is the famous sketch, "Broadway and the Battery."

Of Willis himself, there is no need that we should speak here. The public has not been left in ignorance of his faults, and his sins of omission and commission. Being human, he was not perfect, and his imperfections were of a type that provoke hostility. In his lifetime he bore a heavy punishment for many of them, and now that he has been dead more than twenty years, we may well cease from the ungrateful task of casting stones at his name and memory, and see whether in the contributions he made to the world's treasury of literature, there are not reasons for thinking and speaking kindly of him. We think Professor Beers has done wisely in issuing this selection from his writings, if not a reversal of the judgment, somewhat hastily pronounced against him. Pp. 365. Price, $1.50; published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

THE PATTERN IN THE MOUNT and other sermons, by Charles H. Parkhurst, D.D. Besides the sermon which gives the title to the book, it contains the following sermons: "Human Spirit and Divine Inspiration," "Coming to the Truth," "Walking by Faith," "Walking in the Spirit," "Methodical Piety," "Piety and Business Compatible," "Christian Love," "Light the Outcome of Life," "Prosperity a Test," "The Unjust Steward," "The Pharisee's Prayer," "The Good Samaritan," "The Hidden Leaven," "Things Seen and Things not Seen," "The Life There Continuous with the Life Here," and "The Perfect Peace." There is more thought and originality in these sermons than is usually displayed in pulpit utterances. Dr. Parkhurst evidently desires to make the Gospel a power in the life of the present day.

Canon Edward Hoare, M.A.

A Durbar in Herat.

The character of these sermons will be best indicated by an extract, which, though not the most powerful or graceful in the book, is a fair specimen of the style and principle of the whole. Dr. Parkhurst in his sermon on the Human Spirit and Divine Inspiration, says: [page 29] "It is infinitely less the outward administration of method that needs conserving among us than the inward administration of the Holy Spirit. That was the special and distinguishing glory of the Apostolic Church, and just in this is our distinguishing point of poverty; church machinery enough, culture enough in the pulpit, elegance enough in our churches, style enough in our service and our ritual, but a dearth of the Holy Ghost; too much man-power, too little of the inspirations of the Almighty. . . . The demand is not for new Scripture, nor for men that can write it, but for men that are under the control of the same inspiring power that at one time moved men to write, and that would move and amply fit men to write more Scripture now, if more Scripture were the thing needed." It is undeniable that in this passage, Dr. Parkhurst has laid his finger on the weak point of our Christian warfare, and it is astonishing how frequently the thoughtful reader of these sermons is impelled to make that same remark as he finishes the perusal of one weighty passage after another. These sermons of the eminent Presbyterian clergyman deserve and will well repay an attentive reading. Pp. 254. Price, $1.25. Published by Messrs. Anson D. F. Randolph & Company, New York.

CANON HOARE.

ONE of the most popular clergymen in the evangelical section of the English Protestant Episcopal Church is the Rev. Edward Hoare, M.A., whose portrait appears on this page. The evangelicals in the church are neither so learned as their brethren of the Broad Church, nor so cultured as their High Church brethren, but they are undoubtedly doing valuable work among the people, and are aiding the Nonconformists in their efforts of evangelization. Among them Canon Hoare is conspicuous. He is a little over sixty years of age. He studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1834. Two years later he was ordained, and having served in various curacies in London and country places, he became incumbent of a church in Holloway, one of the northern suburbs of London. After holding that appointment about a year he removed to Ramsgate, and in 1853 he settled at Tunbridge Wells, of which place he is still Vicar. He was appointed Canon of Canterbury Cathedral in 1868. He takes much interest in foreign missions, and one of his sons is a missionary in China, laboring under the auspices of the Church Missionary Society.

A DURBAR IN AFGHANISTAN.

THE vexed question of the boundary between Afghanistan and Asiatic-Russia, which is not yet settled, has now been pending nearly two years. The continual encroachments of Russia in the direction of India led to uneasiness in England, and an attempt was made to have the frontier line on the north of Afghanistan clearly defined. Russia would have preferred to let the subject remain unsettled, so that a further advance would not have been a clear violation of a treaty. England, however, pressed for a definite settlement, being well aware that the constant nibbling at Afghan Territory on the part of Russia must sooner or later bring that power to the very borders of India. It was therefore arranged that three commissioners, representing respectively Russia, England, and Afghanistan, should meet on the territory in dispute and agree upon the line of demarkation.

To refuse so fair a proposition would have been on the part of Russia a confession of her aggressive policy. She therefore fell back on her usual policy and evaded it. For a year the English and Afghan Commissioners waited at the rendezvous, and still the Russian Commissioner did not arrive. He has not yet turned up, and now Sir Peter Lumsden, the English Commissioner, has been ordered home. During the period when he was waiting for the Russian Commissioner, the durbar depicted in our illustration took place. It was a public and formal ceremonial of state, in which Sir Peter was received with honor by the Governor of Herat in his official residence in that city. The Afghan chief was extremely cordial, though he probably now looks back on his cordiality with some chagrin as he sees that the English Government discredits its own envoy by recalling him.

OLD CLARK'S DEATH.

"WHAT'S become of old Clark? Have you seen the wretched old money-grubber lately? He used to go by regularly every morning and evening, but I haven't seen him for two weeks or more."

"No, nor don't want to. We've had two weeks' peace, anyhow. He's sick. His asthma has got firm hold of him, and likely he'll go off duty permanently this time. The devil will get his own if he does die, and I shan't be sorry."

"Don't say that, Cooper," said a bright, cheery voice behind him; "we have all reason to be sorry when any one dies without hope of something better than the fate you spoke of."

"Ah! Dominie, is that you?" said Cooper, as the new-comer stepped into the light and stood revealed, the respected clergyman, the personal friend of every dweller in that squalid precinct.

"I didn't know you were within hearing, parson, or I wouldn't have said anything to hurt your feelings. It's old Clark, the collector, we were talking of, and he's a hard one, as any one can tell you. He's sick and like to die."

"Where does he live?" asked the clergyman. "In the Baltic building, second floor back, all by himself—him and his money; it's my opinion his greenbacks are wife and children to him—he couldn't love anything else."

"Well, I'll go and see him," said the good clergyman; "a man that's friendless has all the more need of God for his friend. We all need Him, but none so much as the old, and solitary, and the sick."

The clergyman hurried away on his errand of mercy, and having found the desolate chamber in which the sick man lay, he knocked and entered. His practised eye saw at the first glance that the hand of death was laid on the old man. The sufferer knew his visitor, for they had met often in the district where their visits had had such different receptions, and on more than one occasion the clergyman had paid him some small sum owing by an unfortunate debtor.

"I am sorry to find you so sick," said the clergyman; "can I do anything for you?"

"No," said the sufferer, as he gasped for breath; "it's kind of you to come and ask, but you can't help me. I shall soon be dead."

"May I pray with you?"

"No; God would not hear you if you prayed for me. There's no hope for me in this world nor the next."

"May I read to you?"

"I do not mind your doing that, as you are so kind as to offer; it's very lonely lying here alone."

The clergyman seated himself, and read passage after passage, telling of God's inexhaustible patience and love. He read on without interruption, while the sick man lay with his eyes closed, but evidently listening. At last he spoke. "Stay," he said; "read that over again, and then do not read any more." "Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord," were the words; "though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow."

"There," said the sick man; "please leave me; I must think. Come again to-morrow, I may want you badly. Don't fail."

Without a word the clergyman went away, praying silently that the Word of God thus read without comment might bear fruit. Time, he knew, was very precious, and early the next morning he was again at the bedside of the dying man.

Clark was sensibly weaker, but his mind was clear. He said, "I've been thinking all night about that passage you read. I've made up my mind to make a confession to you, and you can tell me, perhaps, if there is any hope for me. I believe there is none; but I shall die easier if I tell some one. Sit down." Briefly the old man related his early history, with frequent pauses as his breath failed him. Suddenly he turned on his side, and seizing the clergyman's coat, he drew him close, so that he could whisper in his ear. What that whisper was the clergyman never told, but the horror on his face as he listened showed that a frightful crime was being confessed. Then the old man threw himself back on his pillow, panting and exhausted. The clergyman, too, was shaken by the revelation, and a struggle was fought in his mind before he spoke again.

"I have heard all—it is horrible. But the word of the Lord is sure. I am simply doing my duty as God's messenger when I offer you pardon in His name. I can do no other. It is almost incredible to me that you can be forgiven, but there is no mistake. By repentance and faith in Christ you may be pardoned, for He died for you. God is true, and His promise stands fast. I am commissioned to offer you mercy on those terms, and you may be saved if you will. God help you."

Two hours later the clergyman was again in the sick chamber. The physician and a nurse were there, and the former by a sign intimated to the clergyman that the end was near. The dying man held out his hand as the clergyman approached the bed, and drawing him near, he whispered, "Are you quite sure?"

"Yes, there is no doubt; His blood cleanseth from all sin."

"I am trusting it," said the dying man. "It seems too good to be true; but as you say, God's Word is enough." He spoke no more, and a few minutes after he had entered into the great unseen, trusting convulsively to the hope by which men enter into life.

THE JEW'S WARD.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Merciless Landowner.

It was something of a shock to Mr. Arnold to learn that the new proprietor was inclined to change the arrangements of the estate. He had come to look upon the land almost as his own. Every year, of course, he had paid his rent, as his father and grandfather had done before him; but he had always felt secure in his holding. He was a conscientious farmer, who did not take too much out of the land, and his farm was in excellent condition. Any landowner who understood his own interest, Mr. Arnold thought, would be unwilling to disturb a tenant of that character, especially as the farm had been so long held by members of the same family. But still he knew that Captain Bentley had the power to turn him out if he were so minded. He knew that such things were done by landowners, though he had never heard of so cruel a case as his own. It could not be, he told himself over and over again; this change in the agency might be a mere matter of business, and it was not to be expected that Captain Bentley would have the same confidence in him as the former owners, who had known him so many years, and his father before him. He might feel better contented with an agent of his own appointing; but still the old man could not quite overcome his disquietude by his own arguments.

"He's a man with a stubborn will of his own," said Mr. Arnold, musingly, after he had told his wife of this fresh arrangement, "and it will lead him into difficulties that he doesn't foresee. He has served all his tenants with notice to quit, even me; and there are some that will leave their farms on his hands, and he'll have to take a lower rent for them, and maybe get a set of poor men that will starve the ground. He's as good a set of tenants as any in the county, and his rents are high. Why can't he let well alone?"

"We could never quit our farm," replied Mrs. Arnold.

"Oh, no, no!" he said, with a hearty laugh; "it's a mere matter of form. Think of turning Arnold of Hazelmount away! It's only a step toward taking a fresh valuation, and our farm is worth double what it was thirty years ago. But he'll give me nothing to compensate for the time and toil and money I've put into the soil."

"We can afford it?" she asked, anxiously.

"Oh, ay!" he answered. "I don't say we can't pay double rent; but there are other tenants that won't, and it will make a difference to the country-side if we get a lot of new neighbors. And it will make it heavier by and by for Philip; and who knows what Philip's son may have to pay by the time it comes into his hands?"

"You are looking far ahead," said Philip, with a sad smile.

"No further than my grandfather looked," he continued; "if old families like ours don't look ahead they must go to the wall sooner or later. It seems to me when I come across an Arnold in the parish-registers three hundred years back, that he must have had some thought of me when he was alive. Ay, and the old fruit-trees in the orchard and the flint hedge in the garden were planted by men who knew they were planting them for us, nor for themselves. I've grafted many a tree myself, thinking of my grandchildren and their children, God bless them! And I hope you will do the same, Philip, and hand on the old unblemished name; for 'a good name is better than great riches.' I've only one great joy in store for me now, and that's to see your son laid in the old cradle you were rocked in, and me before you. I never knew a joy like that when I saw your little head lying there."

There was great commotion throughout the whole neighborhood. Those tenants who thought themselves over-rented prepared to quit their farms; but Mr. Arnold did not take much thought of the insecurity of his own position. He could not believe in it being insecure. He was ready to pay a double rent, if it came to that. And when the rent day came he went down to the inn at the nearest village, where he had been used to receive the rents for Mrs. Stewart, and paid his own to Captain Bentley's new agent.

"You are prepared to give up possession of the Grange next Christmas, Mr. Arnold?" said the agent in a business-like tone.

"Give up the Grange!" he repeated.

"The Grange, to be sure," said the agent.

"Give it up?" he asked, in a puzzled tone.

"Yes," answered the agent, curtly; "Captain Bentley has another tenant to put in."

"It's a mistake," said Mr. Arnold, in a voice which he forced to be steady; "we've been at the Grange these three hundred years; all the country knows it. I am ready to pay any rent Captain Bentley pleases, and there is not a better farmer in the county, though I say it myself."

"You are a tenant farmer?" said the agent.

"To be sure," he replied.

"Then your landlord chooses to do what he likes with his own," he continued, "and he has promised the Grange to an old friend of his, who has been of service to him many a time. He has promised it to me. You will give up possession at Christmas."

"I cannot!" exclaimed Mr. Arnold; "it would kill me. I must see Captain Bentley myself."

"You can see him, of course," replied the agent, "but it will make no difference."

The old farmer turned away, and walked steadily out of the room, and through the assembly of smaller tenants in the adjoining hall, but he could see none of their familiar faces clearly for the mist that was in his eyes. He called sharply to the hostler to bring his horse, and when his old friends asked him if he was not going to stay for the rent-day dinner, at which he had always presided, he made no answer. He did not hear that any one spoke to him. In a stupor of bewilderment he rode slowly homeward, up the steep roads that climbed to the top of Hazelmout. Leave Hazelmout! He could see himself a little lad running at his father's side along this road, and he could see Philip a little lad running at his side. There had never been a time when there had not been an Arnold and his son. He checked his horse at the gate of one of his large fields, and looked across it till the tears filled his eyes. It did not seem to him that it was he who had sown the corn springing up in those furrows, so much as those forefathers of his. How many seed-times and harvests had found them there! He could almost see a band of shadowy men passing through the fields, each one carrying on the work of the one who had gone before him; so long a line of good men and true, and he was to be the last of them! This was a worse thing to befall them than if Philip had married Carola.

For there was this bitterness in his grief: no one would feel as he did. His wife had not always dwelt in Hazelmout; and once Philip had spoken of a wish to emigrate, if by that means he could marry Carola. The lad loved her better than his forefathers and their old home.

At last he roused himself and went on, turning into the great kitchen when he reached the house, and sitting down, pallid and trembling, in the old chimney-corner. His bedimmed eyes roamed round the place. There was not a crack in the quarried floor, or a rafter in the roof that was not familiar to him. Up yonder, swung to the central beam, hung the old oak cradle, with "God bless thee" carved on the head of it, in which he had hoped to see Philip watching his sleeping son, as he had himself watched Philip in his babyhood. The heavy, well-scoured table at which his workmen ate and drank; the settle where they sat warmly on winter nights; the wide old chimney with a huge fire always roaring in the grate; these things were dearer to him than he knew. He could not leave them.

Mrs. Arnold's indignation and incredulity partly reassured him. It was ridiculous, she urged, that a mere upstart like Captain Bentley could uproot an old family like theirs. The whole country would rise up against such injustice and tyranny, and the force of public resentment would bring him to reason. He would not like to be sent to Coventry by all his fellow land-owners. It could never be that the Arnolds of Hazelmout should be turned off their farm as if they were poverty-stricken, unthrifty, or unskillful farmers.

But it was not long before they discovered that Captain Bentley was resolved to have his own way, if it set the whole country against him. The neighboring gentry and the clergy took up the matter warmly, and representations were made, by the most influential persons in the county, to the new-comer at Hazelmout of the cruelty and injustice of driving so old a family from their ancient birthplace. Captain Bentley replied that he was not a sentimental man, and he should take his stand on his legal rights. The farm was his, and the Arnolds must go.

The blow fell scarcely less heavily on the village than on the farmstead. The people, too, belonged to the soil; if they quitted it, it would be like uprooting their very lives, yet how could they live and work under a new master? Even the children, from the first dawn of their memory, had been accustomed to toddle up to the farm-house kitchen for their wages, receiving a penny or two from the hand of either the master or the mistress, and learning to feel that they were born their servants. Old men and women could talk of little else but of by-gone Arnolds, who were lying peacefully at rest amid generations of by-gone laborers in the parish churchyard. What would become of them when their old master had gone away, and a new man ruled in his stead? Hazelmout would be scarcely like a home to them, though their own cottages remained. But who could tell how long these humble homes would be left untouched by change? Mr. Arnold's successor was already known, and disliked. He would probably bring laborers and servants of his own choice; and they, also, would be turned adrift to seek new dwelling-places on strange lands.

"Father, there is no hope," said Philip, after seeing the lord-lieutenant of the county, who had made the question a matter of personal favor from Captain Bentley, and had been refused; "we shall have to go."

"Yes," answered the old farmer, with bowed head and in a broken voice.

"Where would you like to go best?" asked Philip.

"I've no care for any thing," he replied. "It's no use thinking of an old stump of a tree like me. Go where you like, Phil, and carry me with you for the little time I shall live."

"I do not wish to be a tenant-farmer again," said Philip, "and there's no land to be bought in England. If you could but make up your mind with me, now we must quit Hazelmout, to go and buy a place for ourselves in America, no landlord could turn us out again. Let us make another Hazelmout, altogether our own. There are places as fertile as this, and as beautiful as this. You shall found a family instead of being the last of one."

"You mean to marry, then?" said Mr. Arnold, while his mother listened anxiously for Philip's answer. She could find him a wife to go out with him—a daughter-in-law after her own heart—if he would but make up his mind to marry.

"Yes," said Philip, "if I can find Carola. Don't think I have ever forgotten her. But you will not be afraid of anybody knowing her history there; and there will be no old house for her happiness and mine to be sacrificed to. Mother, if I cannot marry Carola I will never marry. She is the only woman I have ever loved, or can love; there is nothing in herself that you can find fault with. Father, you would be glad to see Carola my wife?"

"Ay, my lad!" he answered, "as glad as I could be about anything; but nothing will gladden me again."

"Mother?" said Philip, in a pleading voice. "If it must be, it must be," she replied, with tears in her eyes; "but, oh, Philip, you might have done so much better! Still, if we leave England it will not signify so much; and she was a good girl, I own."

It was a grudging consent; yet Philip expected nothing more. His own trouble at leaving Hazelmout had been deep and poignant, but this hope had been lying secretly at the root of it, and now his spirits rose again. The prospect before him brightened—to be himself a landowner, to build a new house altogether his own, in a free country, where he would not be at the mercy of an unfeeling landlord, and to see a family growing up around him, free and independent, was a future better in his eyes than the carrying on of the name of Arnold of Hazelmout.

But there was very much to be done. At Christmas they must quit the old place, and no arrangements had yet been made. He must start for America immediately to find a suitable spot for founding their new home; and Carola must be traced, and her consent won. It was not altogether a fresh plan to him, and he had already provided himself with some important information concerning lands in the United States, but he had scarcely hoped to get his parents to agree upon leaving England. Now there was no time to be lost.

The news soon spread through Hazelmout, and all the villagers came up to the great kitchen to ask if it was true, and to talk the matter over with their masters. The last harvest was ready to be gathered in, but he, the last Arnold, would be absent. It seemed impossible that it could be true. The gathering under the old rafted roof was a mournful one; the men looked downcast and sullen, and all the women were weeping. The oldest among them, Jack Windbank's father, an aged man, over eighty years of age, stood in their midst, leaning on a strong and rugged thorn-stick, with his white head shaken and palsied, and with a tear or two slowly stealing down his furrowed face. But he was first to speak, in a slow labored utterance, while all the young folk kept a profound silence.

"Maister," he said, "we've been talkin' over this thing among oursens; and it's a deadly bitter shame. The land's yours and ours more than hisn that has never done a day's work for it, or on it. There's never been a time, maybe from the creation, when there wasn't Arnolds o' Hazelmout; ay! and Windbanks, and Foxes, and Cartwrights, and the whole lot on us; and there never were a Bentley afore, and he can turn us out wi' a word. I conna say, 'God bless him!'"

"No, no!" cried all the men, "it's the contrary o' that."

"But they dunna want to turn we laborers out," continued the old man; "no, no! there's work as we can do, and we know the lie o' the land, and all about the crops it'll bear best; and they'll keep we on a bit to serve their turn. But a new maister 'udn't suit us; and what we've got to say, me and all the men, ay! and all the women, too, if Arnolds o' Hazelmout, go, we go. Choose all as are any good to yo', Maister, they're ready to pack up and go away with you. Maister Philip says as he'll make a new Hazelmout in Ameriky; but there couldn't be no real Hazelmout wi'out Windbanks, and Foxes, and Cartwrights, and the rest of us."

Mr. Arnold had buried his face in his hands as if he could not look at his old work-people; but Philip answered the palsied old man.

"But, Richard," he said, kindly, "it would never do for you to try to go so far away from home."

"Ay, ay," he interrupted, "I'm too far on i' years; but never yo' think on me, Maister Philip. It conna be long afore I find my lodgin' in the grave; and I'll just wait about here till the time comes. And if Captain Bentley drives me away from Hazelmout, anyhow, there's the poor-house, and they're bound to find me shelter there. But my son Jack and his wife and family's ready to go wi' yo'. And we're all o' one mind. Yo' conna' make a real Hazelmout wi'out us; but, Lord love yo', if we Windbanks, and Foxes, and Cartwrights, and the rest on us go along with yo', the old master 'ill soon feel himself at home out yonder."

Old Richard Windbank came to a sudden pause, for the sound of his master's heavy sobs broke in upon his speech. For some moments there was no other sound to be heard; but when Mrs. Arnold laid her arm fondly on her husband's bowed neck there burst a storm of weeping and lamenting such as Hazelmout had never known before.

THE PRIESTHOOD OF CHRIST.

S. S. Lesson for June 14, Heb. 9:1-12. Golden Text, 7:25. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Consideration of the Subject Enjoined—Can Only be Understood Through the Holy Spirit—The Shadows of the Old Dispensation—Our Priest and Scapegoat—The Priest Ministering Within the Temple—How to Deal with Besetting Sins—Salvation to the Uttermost—The Effectual Ministry of Those Who are Real Temples—The Lesson of Subjection.

WE are taught to "consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus" (Heb. 3:1). Thank God, He has given us His Holy Spirit to guide us into all truth, for by no other power than His can we consider and understand all which the blessed Word of God tells us about the priesthood of Christ. Every high priest . . . is ordained . . . that he may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sin—i.e., both sin and trespass offerings and also the freewill offerings which have the nature of gifts, and which presupposed that sin had been atoned for by the shedding of blood, and that he who offered the gift was himself in a state of acceptance with God. Jesus in His wondrous unspeakable love, represents us to God in His High Priesthood in every possible relation. Are we lost sinners, far off from God? "The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all" (Isa. 53:6). And rightly to understand the force of these words we must go back to "the shadow" of heavenly things in the Book of Leviticus, where the day of atonement is described. "And when he (Aaron) hath made an end of reconciling the holy place, and the tabernacle of the congregation, and the altar, he shall bring the live goat, and Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and shall send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness: And the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities unto a land not inhabited (of separation marg.); and he shall let go the goat in the wilderness" (Lev. 16:20-22). Jesus is our Aaron, but at the same time our scapegoat. Every sin of ours has been confessed over Him, and laid upon Him, or there could be no atonement for us. And Jesus Christ our great High Priest is our guarantee that these sins of ours are gone "into a land not inhabited," God calls us to

to take in fully all He is, and all He has been to us, so that our heart's love will flow out to Him unhindered.

Are we saved sinners, and yet some power of besetting sin clings to us, some loathsomeness, impure thing which we hate and which yet baffles all the power of our will? Or some infirmity of temper? or some pride or envy, some unkind feeling toward others, against which we strive and pray, yet which has continually the mastery over us? Again, our High Priest, ordained and made priest by the oath of God, having "an unchangeable priesthood," and made "after the power of an endless life" (Heb. 7:16, 21, 24), stands ready to minister for us to God. We have failed, are always failing. What is the root of the evil? Surely this, that we are attempting an impossibility; trying to serve God by some power in ourselves, and by some efforts of our own to make ourselves perfect. God's order is quite another. The work of perfecting us lies with Him and not with us. He came as the Sacrifice to do the will of God. "By which will we have been sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all. For by one offering He hath perfected forever them that are sanctified" (Heb. 10:10-14, R. V.). But, you say, "All this is outside of me, How can that which Christ has done independently of me, make me holy?" The place where the priest ministers is within the temple, and God calls us "the temple of the living God" (11. Cor. 6:16). Paul calls us to present our bodies a living sacrifice to God which is our reasonable service (Rom. 12:1). What for? For Him to come in and dwell, for Him to come in and minister. Our great High Priest, coming into us as His temple, brings with Him his own renounced will, and becomes in our hearts all that He is in Himself, just as we give Him place and let Him in us minister to God. What chance has a besetting sin to rule in a being completely given up to Christ's government, where He is recognized as having possession of spirit, soul and body? "He is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him" (Heb. 7:25). Blessed be His name, there is no bondage so great, no habit so inveterate, no unbelief so desperate, but that He can conquer; the very uttermost is within His reach, and His work is complete. He expects nothing from us but complete abandonment to Him and entire trust in His doing the work; "Ye died, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ who is our Life, shall be manifested, then shall ye also with Him be manifested in glory (Col. 3, 4, R. V.).

Are we stirred up by the Holy Ghost to intercede for precious souls? Are we conscious how weak is our faith? how little trust we really have in our precious Lord? how miserably little love to souls there is in us? Let us consider Jesus, "He ever liveth to make intercession." Where? In heaven where He dwells, but also in our hearts where He dwells. He said to His Father, "I know that Thou hearest Me always" (John 11:42). Jesus, our High Priest in us, interceding, is always heard. God cannot, will not cast away His Son. It is His faith which prevails, "the faith of the Son of God," exercised in our hearts where He dwells, "the faith of God" (Mark 11:24, margin). "The Spirit also helpeth our infirmities, for we know not how to pray as we ought; but the Spirit Himself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered; and He that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because He maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God" (Rom. 8:26, 27, R. V.). Given up to God as simple instruments through which He works, and which He uses as He wills, prayer and faith become divine, proceeding not from us, but from Him within us. And He lets us share His joy in seeing the answer.

The priests, the sons of Levi, were chosen by the Lord "to minister unto Him, and to bless in His name" (Deut. 10:8). Jesus calls us "to be priests unto His God and Father" (Rev. 1:6, R. V.), and thus it is our privilege to minister to God and to bless man. But how shall fallen and redeemed man, however good his intentions are, rightly minister to God? Jesus alone could say, "I do always those things which please Him." Just as we deny or ignore ourselves, and give all the place to Him, He in us does those things which please God, and thus ministers to Him. But how shall we, poor helpless creatures less others in the name of the Lord? There are, thank God, many successful evangelists in our day, many souls are being brought to Christ. Is it by the talent of the preacher, or by any special power vested in him? No; it is only as souls are brought quickly and surely in contact with God that they are really blessed. The preaching which Christ has ordained is all divine. "It shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak. For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you" (Matt. 10:19, 20). How often have we found that words which God has spoken once through us when used by us a second time have fallen powerless? We have attempted to bless, while it is Christ in us, who is the Priest blessing in the name of the Lord; we have taken His office, forgetting that, like Paul, we have "the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead" (11 Cor. 1:9). We may have valued ourselves upon methods which have proved successful, and soon we have found that those very methods failed. Why? Because they ceased to be divine. We had adopted them as ours, and our commission to bless is never in our own name, but only in the name of the Lord. As we learn our utter powerlessness, and our privilege to make Jesus dwelling in us responsible for all the service to man which He permits us to render. All our work for God changes. We let Him take the lead, we let Him make the plans, we learn to work under orders. Not having a burden of responsibility upon us, and knowing the almightiness of our Lord. He leads us to be more occupied with His will and power to save than with the difficulties of the work, however great. There are none whom Jesus cannot bless; none whom Jesus will not bless. The hindrance to His blessing is almost always unbelief, "He could there do no mighty work, save that He laid His hands upon a few sick folk, and healed them. And He marvelled because of their unbelief" (Mark 6:5). Our great High Priest wants us as His temples, to be so yielded up to Him that, wherever we go, and whatever we do blessing may flow out from us, or, rather, from Him in us. He that believeth on Me out of him "shall flow rivers of living water" (John 7:38). Looking at difficulties we look away from Jesus; looking at ourselves we look away from Him, and thus prevent Him from blessing others through our own unbelief. Jesus wherever He went dispensed blessing. Sorrow, sin, sickness, blindness, deafness, evil spirits, death itself laid at His approach. Our great High Priest dwelling in us is the same Jesus, and if He had entire possession as He wills to have, men and devils would not recognize us but Jesus. "They took knowledge of them, that they had been with Jesus" (Acts 4:13). Our place is with Him "in the heavens," in the divine; above the human. Our dwelling-place is in God where nothing is impossible, we are members of His body who is able to save unto the uttermost, How shall we do anything but bless?

"If this be so," unbelief says, "why not then claim blessing for the whole world and falsify the prophecies of Christ about the time of trouble, the great tribulation?" When Jesus was upon earth, He went nowhere, and did nothing until His hour was come; He was always under orders. We as His disciples have the same lesson of subjection to learn. We are never masters of the situation with almightiness at our command. But almightiness takes us up into union with Himself, that as instruments He may use us for His glory. Thank God, Christ is "come an High Priest of good things to come!" Thank God He makes us His temple! Thank God "the exampled shadow of heavenly things" is passed away, and in Him we have the very Substance.

First Protestant Missionary to China.

THE great work now being done in China by the China Inland Mission and other agencies is deeply indebted for its success to the pioneer labors of the great and good man whose portrait appears on our first page. Dr. Morrison was to China what Carey was to India, and Moffat and Livingstone were to Africa. Almost single-handed he labored for sixteen years amid sorrow, trial, and privation, upheld only by his faith in the Master whose banner he bore. If he had done no other work, neither preaching nor teaching, his name would deserve immortality in the records of the Christian Church because he gave to China's millions the Word of God in their own tongue.

Robert Morrison was born at Morpeth, England, on January 5th, 1782, and died at Canton, China, on August 1st, 1834, at the age of fifty-two. He was the son of godly parents, and from his earliest days was habituated to a constant and regular attendance at the house of God. His father was a Scottish peasant, who, having developed a skill for mechanical industry, travelled southward and settled in Northumberland as a maker of shoemakers' lasts. This, too, was the first occupation of Robert, his famous son, who was the youngest of his family of seven children. He received much advantage from the instructions of the Presbyterian clergyman, the Rev. J. Hutton.

SELF-EDUCATION.

At the age of fifteen he gave more direct attention to religious matters and was led to give himself entirely to the Lord. He broke off from his evil companions, and gave himself to reading the Word of God and prayer, and publicly united with the Church of Christ. From this period he commenced a diligent improvement of his time. He had to labor from twelve to fourteen hours a day at his father's business, so that his time for study was limited, but he carefully turned to account every opportunity. Early in 1800, in order to secure a larger portion of quiet retirement, he had his bed removed to his workshop, where he would often carry on his studies till one or two o'clock in the morning, and when at work his Bible or some other book was placed open before him, that his thoughts might be profitably engaged while his hands were busily employed. Even at that early age—he was now eighteen—he often conducted the domestic worship of his father's house, and was actively engaged in visiting the poor and the sick, with whom he read the Scriptures and prayed (see picture on first page), and to whose relief he every week assigned a portion of his scanty earnings.

The year 1801 was an important era in his history, as he then entered on a more regular course of study. He thus mentions the fact in his journal: "Friday, June 19th. This day I entered with Mr. Laidler to learn Latin. I know not what may be the end, God only knows. It is my desire to serve the Gospel of Christ as He shall give me opportunity." He mentions with characteristic minuteness of detail the cost of acquiring this accomplishment, which in his circumstances was considerable—$2.50 entrance money and $5 a quarter afterward. This entry is very significant if taken in connection with the statement made in to the London Missionary Society, and from which we reproduce the following extracts:

"I formed the design of engaging as a missionary. It was hardly a design—it was only a wish, an ardent desire. I indulged it, though I saw no probability of its ever being fulfilled. I was then in an obscure situation, nearly three hundred miles from London, and had no one to encourage or second me. I conceived that nothing was to be done without learning; I therefore saved a little money from what my father gave me, to pay a teacher of Latin. Continuing in this manner about fourteen months, my mother died, whereby one hindrance to my leaving home was removed. Yet my affectionate friends pressed me to stay with them; my father wept and prayed over me, but at last consented. I endeavored to weigh every side of the case, sought direction of the Lord, and finally, in His strength, determined to give myself up to God's service in the foreign mission field."

To qualify himself for the work, he entered Hoxton Academy as a student. His preference for missionary effort increased, and at length, in 1804, he applied to the directors of the London Missionary Society in the letter from which we have just quoted. The result was perfectly satisfactory to him; he was accepted without delay, and ordered to proceed to the Missionary College for special preparatory study, "where," he says, "I was well received by the president and students; and this commences a new period of my life." After some deliberation it was determined that Mr. Morrison should be as the scene of his future labors, and his attention was at once directed to the acquisition of the language. He believed that his destination to China was in answer to prayer, for his expressed desire was that he might be sent where the difficulties were the greatest, and to all appearances the most insurmountable. He therefore cordially acquiesced in the decision, and from that time gave himself unreservedly to the work of the Lord in that populous but benighted land.

It was no easy matter for Mr. Morrison to gain even a rudimentary acquaintance with the Chinese tongue. That difficulty was at last surmounted by his obtaining an introduction to a young native of the Celestial Empire, named Yong-Sam-Tak, from whom he obtained his first insight into the language. For a few months he was laboriously engaged in various studies which it was thought would be of use to him in his mission; and in addition to them all, he found opportunity for preaching the Gospel and for efforts to do good to the Christless around him.

HIS DEPARTURE

for his sphere of labor took place on the 31st of January, 1807, when he was twenty-five years of age. He embarked in company with two fellow-missionaries appointed to India, their route being via America. Their ship was detained for some time, awaiting a favorable wind. On the night of February 17th, a violent gale sprang up, which occasioned immense devastation among the shipping, so that many vessels went ashore, and some sank. Out of a large fleet anchored in the Downs at the time, their ship—the Remittance—was the only one which was able to pursue her voyage. The passage was a very protracted and in some respects painful and disastrous one, owing to the prevalence of contrary winds. They did not arrive at New York till the 20th of April, having been at sea one hundred and nineteen days.

HIS SOJOURN IN AMERICA

was always remembered by him with pleasure, and led to the commencement of many a holy friendship which death alone terminated. The gentleman at whose house he stayed in New York, referring to his visit, says, "Mr. Morrison had been with us only a day or two when he was seized with sudden indisposition. As I sat beside his bed he took my hand, and in language which told of a mind at ease and prepared for every event, expressed his resignation to the divine will. After urging me to greater devotedness in the cause of the Saviour, he closed with these words, which I afterward found were ever on his lips—his own motto: 'Dear brother, look up—look on!'

"As the notice of his projected visit to us had been very short, he was placed for the first night in our child's bedroom. Beside his bed stood a little crib, in which the little girl slept. On awakening in the morning, she saw the stranger and roused herself with a look of alarm; but, fixing her eyes steadily on Mr. Morrison's face, inquired, 'Mum, do you pray to God?' 'Oh, yes, my dear,' was the reply, 'every day; God is my best Friend.' At once reassured, the little girl contentedly laid her head on her pillow, and fell fast asleep." (See Illustration.)

On May 12th, he sailed from New York for China by way of Cape Horn. He and his friends set out together to the counting-house of the shipowner. When all business matters were arranged, this man, who evidently regarded Morrison as a deluded enthusiast, said to him, with suppressed ridicule, "And so you expect, sir, to make an impression on the idolatry of the great Chinese Empire?" "No, sir," said Morrison, with unwonted sternness, "I expect that God will!"

The voyagers entered the Chinese Sea on August 29th, and on September 8th, writing from

THE AMERICAN FACTORY.

Canton, his first residence in China, Mr. Morrison says: "By the good hand of God I am brought at length to the place of my appointed labor. Last evening I arrived here. The noise and bustle amid the working of ships, and the rowing of hundreds of boats, in which were thousands of Chinese shouting and calling to each other, were extreme. About eight o'clock, as I passed among their boats, I saw thousands of little splinters of wood, similar to matches, lighted up in honor of their imaginary divinities. I said to myself, 'Oh, whatever can be done with these ignorant yet shrewd and imposing people?' But what were our fathers before the Gospel reached them?"

Having worked at his studies with tireless assiduity for some months, a change was judged necessary for his health. Accordingly he went, in June, 1808, on a small island about ninety miles from Canton. There he remained for three months, spending most of the time compiling a dictionary of the Chinese language, preparatory to attempting a translation of the Scriptures. Upon returning to Canton, however, he found that, owing to some political disturbances, all foreigners were peremptorily ordered to leave that city. He therefore returned to Macao, and this second visit was connected with events of the greatest interest in his personal history. These were his marriage to Mary, daughter of Dr. Morton, and his official relation to the Honorable East India Company's Factory as Chinese at a salary of $2500 a year. It was on the very day of his marriage, February 20th, 1809, that the proposal of the East India Company was made. Without hesitation he thankfully accepted it, for by this appointment he not only relieved the funds of the missionary society, but secured the powerful protection of the Company, and was able to stay and work in China for Christ when, if he had not been so protected, he would have been expelled. Upon this circumstance the great usefulness of Dr. Morrison's life turned.

TRANSLATOR AND SECRETARY,

During the following two or three years Mr. Morrison pursued his laborious occupations, happy in these and in the affection of his wife, who, he says, "labored much with me in the study of the Chinese." One trial there was connected with his engagement to the British Factory; it necessitated his absence from his family every year for nearly six months, during which his presence was required at Canton. Often there were stormy scenes to be encountered there. The alleged murder of a Chinaman at one time brought on a discussion with the Government. "I obtained great clat," he writes to a friend, "by the examination of the nesses; every one being astonished that I could so soon write the language and converse with the Mandarin and vulgar dialects. Through the summer I had frequent conferences with the mandarins. They are extremely haughty, overbearing, and clamorous; sometimes three or four of them will speak at the same time, and as if they were scolding. A want of truth is the prevailing feature in the Chinese character; hence, mutual distrust, low cunning, and deceit. I want some humble, persevering fellow worker."

DOMESTIC TRIALS.

No wonder he felt this want. In addition to that came to him "from without," he was led to endure domestic grief and anxiety. His gentle Mary pined away under a mysterious lady affecting the nervous system, and oppressing both mind and body. Her life was desired of, and the infant son to whom she gave birth breathed but a few hours. "Great is my grief," said the sad husband, "on account of the sufferings of my poor helpless Mary." There was at that time no proper burying-place for the English. It was necessary to find a spot to be set apart for this sad use. In China there are no inclosed cemeteries, the sides of hills being the favorite sites. Accordingly, the old's grave was dug on the top of a hill at the northern extremity of Macao. The Chinese at first opposed the interment of the child, but afterward yielded. The life of the mother was spared, but her health was never fully restored. Her husband's heart was often pierced with anguish on her account, but in holy resignation, he said, "It is the Lord; let Him do as seemeth Him good."

COADJUTORS.

His desire for a companion and fellow-helper was fulfilled in July, 1813, when he was joined by the Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Milne. "A companion in labor," wrote Mr. Morrison, "whose rival for six long years I have been wishing, did actually set foot on shore in this remote island. My Mary, who had longed for a companion, was overjoyed at receiving Mrs. Milne—'t would they be allowed to remain, or be even away?' Ah! that was the question; and it was soon answered in the peremptory order for Mr. Milne's departure. 'In vain I treated the governor not to persist in this order; his answer was conclusive—'My own duty, the senate, and the Roman Catholic shop, require that he be sent away; no Europeans can remain here but those connected with the Companies.' " Accordingly the poor ejected missionary—leaving his wife with Mrs. Morrison—proceeded to Canton, there to pursue the same course as his predecessor had done, to fag away, in solitary estate, at the terribly difficult language. Thus he expressed his opinion respecting it: "To acquire the Chinese is a work for men with bodies of brass, lungs of steel, hands of oak, hands of spring-steel, eyes of eagles, hearts of apostles, memories of angels, and lives of Methuselah!"

Mr. Morrison had now, by his own unassisted power, completed the translation of the New Testament, and at the commencement of 1814 he had the satisfaction of sending a copy of the work to the Bible Society. Very soon it was arranged that Mr. Milne should make

A MISSIONARY TOUR TO JAVA,

Malacca, and Penang, for the purpose of distributing the New Testament among the Chinese settlers in those places, and to obtain a residence for the whole or a part of the mission. Subsequently the junior missionary, with his family, went to Malacca to establish a branch of the mission there.

Here he was soon joined by the missionary steward so widely known as Dr. Medhurst whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on October 4th, 1833, then an enthusiastic and devoted young man, just twenty years of age. His arrival was hailed with delight by Mr. Milne, who at once transferred to his new colleague the sole care of the printing department. He was an evangelist of the true apostolic stamp, and wherever he went he scattered with an industrious hand the seed of everlasting life. For twenty-seven years he labored in succession at the various stations then occupied by the Christian missionaries in the Indian Archipelago—studying various languages, making translations, teaching, printing, and preaching the Gospel of Christ, being "instant in season and out of season." A picture on the first page represents him distributing tracts, etc., to a crowd on the sea-shore. Dr. Medhurst removed to Shanghai, after the ratification of the Nanjing Treaty in 1842, when several of the Chinese ports were opened to foreigners. After forty years' toil in the mission field, he left China in 1856, and died four days after his return, in 1857.

MISSIONARIES IN A SNOW-STORM

is the subject of the sketch in the upper portion of our frontispiece picture, showing the perils of the life these three brave men were living. The incident occurred during a journey of missionaries to Fuh-chau. The further they went the thicker became the drift, and they lost their way; and so, to avoid any unnecessary risk they resolved to stay where they were for the night. Their journal says: "About noon next day, as the drift did not in the least abate, we opened our boxes, took our silver, and tried with the aid of two sticks to reach some dwelling. We had, however, counted without our host; we could with difficulty keep footing, and staggering on, could see only a few yards. We were nearly blinded by the snow-drift covering and freezing on our faces; and after battling for some time, great drifts caused us to pause, and we resolved (after prayer to God for help) to endeavor to find the cart again. This was very hard work, as we had to make our way against the wind and drift. When we had gone, as we thought, about the right distance we saw no cart, and found ourselves among slight hills and drifts which were very perplexing. We were now glad to sit, rest, and consider in shelter of a bank; but it was too cold, so we tried to cover ourselves with snow for warmth, and when this failed, again rose, resolved not to give in without a good fight. We turned our faces toward the direction in which the city lay, in hope of finding it at last; after prayer we marched on, and, thank God, had not gone far when we saw the cart. Getting in, we praised God."

THE MANDARINS

were the cause of no little trouble to the missionaries. On one occasion, when Dr. Morrison and Mr. Medhurst were distributing tracts together, the Mandarin dismounted, and threatening them with severe penalties if they disobeyed, ordered them away. Of course they obeyed the irate functionary, but as soon as he was out of sight, went on quietly giving away the silent messengers of mercy as before. Chinese Mandarins are officers of state, chosen from the men of letters or scholars, from every part of the empire. They have obtained their degrees; have passed the prescribed examinations; and have had their names inscribed in a register of qualified men. When an office in the administration is vacant the court presents to the emperor a list of those who stand foremost on the register, from among whom the monarch appoints one to fill the vacancy. They are the recognized representatives of the emperor in all the provinces of the gigantic empire.

HONORS

began to fall upon! Dr. Morrison as his services were recognized. In the year 1818 the University of Glasgow created him Doctor in Divinity, and the London Missionary Society, desirous to conduce to his comfort, proposed his return home for a time; but "One thing I do" was the motto and watchword of the missionary. "I should like much to visit Europe," he said, "but wishes and the lesser duties must give way to the greater." The translation of the Old Testament was still unfinished, and until that was done he could not leave his post. It was completed in 1819, and by the end of 1823 it was printed and in process of circulation; then, after sixteen years of exile, he turned his face homeward. Before then his beloved wife and Mr. and Mrs. Milne had all fallen asleep in Jesus.

He thus recorded his reflections on leaving China: "December 7th. This is now the close of A.D. 1823. I arrived in China in 1807. Sixteen years have I lived in that land; a country full of idols; a land in which the Creator is forgotten and unknown, as much as in any part of the earth. My public life in China has been a period of great industry; my domestic life has been a checked scene of pleasure and of pain, but even the painful circumstances are very dear to my recollection. I have some misgivings or apprehensions that I may not live to return and be buried in China, but, all circumstances considered, I hope the voyage will be for my own good, for that of my children (Mary and John), and for the good of the heathen. Oh, may the Lord grant it for Jesus' sake!"

After a happy time spent in the land of his birth, and filled up the measure of the work given him to do. The next few years were occupied in the diligent discharge of his engagements. They seemed as numerous and as urgent as in former times, but now he no longer toiled alone.

HE RETURNED TO CHINA,

The return of the hot season brought with it every year an access of suffering, and it became evident, in 1840, that his strength was rapidly failing. On Sunday, the 27th of July, he gathered around him his little Chinese congregation, and they joined together in prayer and praise. It was his last service. Five days later his friends, having heard alarming reports of his weakness, came to take him to Macao for change of air, but he died in the night. They carried the forsaken body and laid it in the tomb, beside his first wife, the gentle, suffering Mary. There they rest together, waiting the day of resurrection.

Among Several Medical Opinions on the Use of intoxicating liquors published in the latest number of the Voile, is one by Dr. Cyrus Edson, whose abilities and wide experience give the highest value to his utterance. Dr. Edson states that he has kept no record of his cases, but believes that not less than seventy-five per cent of those involving an accident to life or limb are due directly to drink. "My hospital experience in the lower wards of the city," he says, "makes this percentage large. Chronic diseases of the more important organs contained in the abdominal cavity, such as of the liver and kidneys, and digestive disorders, are the most usual resulting from intemperance. If the manufacture of alcohol were entirely suspended, the average length of human life would undoubtedly be increased, unless a more pernicious substitute took its place." Dr. Edson further expresses his belief that "the use of beer is an evil, little if any less than that of whiskey."

Social Purity is a Leading Topic in the minds of the Christian workers in Europe, who are the closest observers of the times. At a public meeting recently held in England, the Bishop of Newcastle said: "Strongly as I feel with regard to intemperance and the harm done by an excessive use of alcohol, yet I declare deliberately that I believe the evil will not bear comparison with the awful malignity of the poison of impurity which is not only affecting society but decimating the Church of God." Clergymen from other parts of England spoke of the manifestations of the evil in country places as well as towns, and of the appallingly awful fact that England was getting familiar with the idea of fallen children. It is true that the Christian Church has been too long silent on this subject, and that the policy of silence has failed. But ministers of religion who will do their duty in the matter must tread the way of the Cross. Men in good standing, all before the evil here as well as there, perhaps more frequently here. We therefore hail the organization of the White Cross Societies as a sign that the church is awaking to a sense of her duty.

THE DAY WE LIVE IN.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached last Sunday Morning, June 7, 1885.

"Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?"—ESTHER 4: 14.

Esther's God-Appointed Work—Every Man Has a Work—What the Age Needs—I. Aggressive Christians—The Useless, Self-Examining Christian—Juvenile Gardening—Flower-pot Christians—More Brawn of Piety—No Time for Inertia—II. Conservative Progress—Novel Enterprises Always Desired—A Fortress not to be Starved Out—A Work for All—Hedley Vicars Called to Work—Havelock's Sermon in the Heathen Temple—A College Servant's Prayers—III. Men of Unbounded Faith—Victory at Hand.

ESTHER the beautiful was the wife of Ahasuerus the abominable. The time had come for her to present a petition to her infamous husband in behalf of the Jewish nation, to which she had once belonged. She was afraid to undertake the work, lest she should lose her own life; but her uncle, Mordecai, who had brought her up, encouraged her with the suggestion that probably she had been raised up of God for that peculiar mission. "Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" Esther had her you and I have ours. It is my business to tell you what style of men and women you ought to be in order that you meet the demand of the age in which God has cast your lot. If you have come expecting to hear abstractions discussed, or dry technicalities of religion glorified, you have come to the wrong church; but if you really would like to know what this age has a right to expect of you as Christian men and women, then I am ready, in the Lord's name, to look you in the face. When two armies have rushed into battle the officers of either army do not want a philosophical discussion about the chemical properties of human blood or the nature of gunpowder; they want some one to man the batteries and swab out the guns. And now, when all the forces of light and darkness, of heaven and hell, have plunged into the fight, it is no time to give ourselves to the definitions and formulas and technicalities and conventionalities of religion.

WHAT WE WANT

is practical, earnest, concentrated, enthusiastic, and triumphant help.

I. In the first place, in order to meet the special demand of this age, you need to be an unmistakably aggressive Christian. Of half-and-half Christians we do not want any more. The Church of Jesus Christ will be better without ten thousand of them. They are the chief obstacle to the Church's advancement. I am speaking of another kind of Christian. All the appliances for your becoming an earnest Christian are at your hand, and there is a straight path for you into the broad daylight of God's forgiveness. You may have come into this Tabernacle the bondmen of the world, and yet before you go out of these doors you may become princes of the Lord God Almighty. You remember what excitement there was in this country, years ago, when the Prince of Wales came here—how the people rushed out by hundreds of thousands to see him. Why? Because they expected that some day he would sit upon the throne of England. But what was all that honor compared with the honor to which God calls you—to be sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty; yea, to be queens and kings unto God? "They shall reign with Him forever and forever."

"HEALTHY CHRISTIANS,"

But, my friends, you need to be aggressive Christians, and not like those persons who spend their lives in hugging their Christian graces and wondering why they do not make any progress. How much robustness of health would a man have if he hid himself in a dark closet? A great deal of the piety of the day is too exclusive. It hides itself. It needs more fresh air, more outdoor exercise. There are many Christians who are giving their entire life to self-examination. They are feeling their pulses to see what is the condition of their spiritual health. How long would a man have robust physical health if he kept all the days and weeks and months and years of his life feeling his pulse instead of going out into active, earnest, every-day work?

I was once amid the wonderful, bewitching cactus growths of North Carolina. I never was more bewildered with the beauty of flowers, and yet when I would take up one of these cactuses and pull the leaves apart, the beauty was all gone. You could hardly tell that it had ever been a flower. And there are a great many Christian people in this day just pulling apart their Christian experiences to see what there is in them, and there is nothing left in them. This style of self-examination is a damage instead of an advantage to their Christian character. I remember when I was a boy I used to have a small piece in the garden that I called my own, and I planted corn there, and every few days I would pull it up to see how fast it was growing. Now, there are a great many Christian people in this day whose self-examination merely amounts to the pulling up of that which they only yesterday or the day before planted.

Oh, my friends, if you want to have a stalwart Christian character, plant it right out-of-doors in the great field of Christian usefulness, and though storms may come upon it, and though the hot sun of trial may try to consume it, it will thrive until it becomes a great tree, in which the fowls of heaven may have their habitation. I have no patience with these flower-pot Christians. They keep themselves under shelter and all their Christian experience in a small, exclusive circle, when they ought to plant it in the great garden of the Lord, so that the whole atmosphere could be aromatic with their Christian usefulness. What we want in the Church of God is

MORE BRAWN OF PIETY.

The century plant is wonderfully suggestive and wonderfully beautiful, but I never look at it without thinking of its parsimony. It lets whole generations go by before it puts forth one blossom; so I have really more heartfelt admiration when I see the dewy tears in the blue eyes of the violets, for they come every spring. My Christian friends, time is going by so rapidly that we cannot afford to be idle.

ONLY A YEAR FOR WORK.

A recent statistician says that human life now has an average of only thirty-two years. From these thirty-two years you must subtract all the time you take for sleep and the taking of food and recreation; that will leave you about sixteen years. From those sixteen years you must subtract all the time that you are necessarily engaged in the earning of a livelihood; that will leave you about eight years. From those eight years you must take all the days and weeks and months—all the length of time that is passed in childhood and sickness, leaving you about one year in which to work for God. Oh, my soul, wake up! How darest thou sleep in harvest-time with so few hours in which to reap? So that I state it as a simple fact that all the time that the vast majority of you will have for the exclusive service of God will be less than one year!

"But," says some man, "I liberally support the Gospel, and the Church is open, and the Gospel is preached; all the spiritual advantages are spread before men, and if they want to be saved let them come to be saved; I have discharged all my responsibility." Ah! is that the Master's spirit? Is there not an old Book somewhere that commands us to go out into the highways and the hedges and compel the people to come in? What would have become of you and me if Christ had not come down off the hills of heaven, and if He had not come through the door of the Bethlehem caravansary, and if He had not with the crushed hand of the crucifixion knocked at the iron gate of the sepulchre of our spiritual death, crying, "Lazarus, come forth"? Oh, my Christian friends, this is when all the forces of darkness seem to be full blast; when steam printing-presses are publishing infidel tracts; when express railroads are carrying messengers of sin; when clipper ships are laden with opium and rum; when the night air of our cities is polluted with laughter that breaks up from the ten thousand saloons of dissipation and abandonment; when the fires of the second death already are kind in the cheeks of some who, only a little while ago, were incorrupt. Oh, never since the sun fell upon the earth, has there been a time when it was such an unwise, such a cruel, such a fearful thing for the Church to sleep. The great audiences are not gathered in the Christian churches; the great audiences are gathered in temples of sin—tears of unutterable woe in baptism, the blood of crushed hearts the avowal of their sacrament, blasphemous litany, and the groans of the lost world under the dirge of their worship.

CONSERVATIVE PROGRESS.

II. Again, if you want to be qualified to do the duties which this age demands of you, must on the one hand avoid reckless iconoclasm and on the other hand not stick too much to things because they are old. The air is full of new plans, new projects, new theories of government, new theologies, and I am amazed to how so many Christians want only novelty in order to recommend a thing to their confidant and so they vacillate and swing to and fro, they are useless, and they are unhappy. I plan—secular, ethical, philosophical, religious, transatlantic, transatlantic—long enough to make a line reaching from the German universities to Great Salt Lake City. Ah, my brother, do take hold of a thing merely because it is new. Try it by the realities of a Judgment Day.

But, on the other hand, do not adhere to things merely because it is old. There is no single enterprise of the Church or the world has sometimes been scoffed at. There was a time when men derided even Bible societies; when a few young men met near a haystack in Massachusetts and organized the first mission society ever organized in this country, they were laughed and ridiculed all around the Christian Church. They said the undertaking was preposterous. And so also the work of Jesus Christ was assailed. People cried out, "I never heard of such theories of ethics and government? Who ever noticed such a style of preaching as Jesus has?" Ezekiel had talked of terrible wings and wheels. Here came a man from Capernaum and Genesaret, and he gave his illustrations from the lakes, from the sea, from the ravine, from the lilies, from the cactuses. How the Pharisees scoffed! How He derided! How Caiaphas hissed! And Jesus they plucked by the beard, and they derided him in his face, and they called him "this fellow." All the great enterprises in and out of the Church have at times been scoffed at, and yet have been a great multitude who have thought that the chariot of God's truth would have been pieces if it once got out of the old rut.

And so there are those who have no patience with anything like improvement in church architecture, or with anything like good, healthy, earnest church singing, and they deride the form of religious discussion which goes on in the walking among everyday men rather than the walking among the great and the noble, which makes an excursion on rhetorical

Oh, that the Church of God would wake up and

ADAPTABILITY OF WORK!

We must admit the simple fact that the Church of Jesus Christ in this day do not reach the masses. There are fifty thousand people in Edinburgh who never hear the Gospel. There are one million people in London who never hear the Gospel. There are at least three hundred thousand souls in the city of Brooklyn who come not under the immediate ministrations of Christ's truth, and the Church of his day, instead of being a place full of living titles, read and known of all men, is more like dead-letter" post-office.

But," say the people, "the world is going to be converted; you must be patient; the kingdoms of this world are to become the kingdoms of Christ." Never, unless the Church of us Christ puts on more speed and energy. Instead of the Church converting the world, the world is converting the Church. Here is a battle at fortress. How shall it be taken? An army comes and sits around about it, cuts off supplies, and says: "Now we will just wait until from exhaustion and starvation they will give up." Weeks and months, and finally the fortress surrenders through that starvation and exhaustion. But, my friends, the fortresses of sin never to be taken in that way. If they are in for God it will be by storm; you will have to bring up the great siege guns of the Gospel to the very wall and wheel the flying artillery online, and when the armed infantry of heaven confront the battlements you will have to give the quick command, "Forward! charge!"

WORK FOR ALL.

Oh, my friends, there is work for you to do for me to do in order to this grand accomplishment. Here is my pulpit and I preach in it. Your pulpit is the bank. Your pulpit is the re. Your pulpit is the editorial chair. Your pulpit is the anvil. Your pulpit is the house of God. Your pulpit is the mechanic's shop. I may stand in this place and, through word or through self-seeking, may keep the word I ought to utter; while you, with eyes rolled up and brow besweated with toil, utter the word that will jar the foundations heaven with the shout of a great victory. Oh, at this morning this whole audience might feel that the Lord Almighty was putting upon them the hands of ordination. I tell you, every one, forth and preach this gospel. You have as much right to preach as I have, or as any man. Only find out the pulpit where God will have you preach and there preach.

HEDLEY VICARS

He is a wicked man in the English army. The voice of God came to him. He became an earnest and eminent Christian. They scoffed at him and said: "You are a hypocrite; you are as bad as ever you were." Still he kept his faith in Christ, and after awhile, finding that they could not turn him aside by calling him a hypocrite, they said to him: "Oh, you are nothing but a theodist." That did not disturb him. He went on performing his Christian duty until he formed all his troop into a Bible-class, and the whole encampment was shaken with the presence of God. So Havelock went into the Indian temple in India while the English army is there, and put a candle into the hand of each of the heathen gods that stood around in the Indian temple, and by the light of those candles, held up by the idols, General Havelock reached righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come. And who will say, on earth or heaven, that Havelock had not the right to each?

In the minister's house where I prepared for college, there was a man who worked by the name of Peter Croy. He could neither read nor write, but he was a man of God. Often theologians would stop in the house—grave theologians—and at family prayer Peter Croy would be called upon to lead; and all those wise men that around, wonder-struck at his religious efficiency. When he prayed he reached up and seemed to take hold of the very throne of the Almighty, and he talked with God until the very eavens were bowed down into the sitting-room. Oh, if I were dying I would rather have plain Peter Croy kneel by my bedside and commend my immortal spirit to God than the greatest archbishop, arrayed in costly canonicals. Go and reach this Gospel. You say you are not censured. In the name of the Lord Almighty, this morning I license you. Go preach this Gospel—preach it in the Sabbath-schools, in the prayer-meetings, in the highways, in the hedges. Woe be unto you if you preach it not.

III. I remark, again, that in order to be qualified to meet your duty in this particular age you want in the triumph of the truth and the overthrow of wickedness. How dare the Christian Church ever get discouraged? Have we not the Lord Almighty on our side? How long did it take God to slay the hosts of Sennacherib or burn Sodom or shake down Jericho? How long will it take God, when He once arises in His strength, to overthrow all the forces of iniquity? Between this time and that there may be long seasons of darkness—the chariot-wheels of God's Gospel may seem to drag heavily; but here is the promise, and yonder is the throne; and when omniscience has lost its eyesight, and omnipotence falls back impotent, and Jehovah is driven from His throne, then the Church of Jesus Christ can afford to be despondent, but never until then. Despotism may plan and armies may march, and the congresses of the nations may seem to think they are adjusting all the affairs of the world, but the mighty men of the earth are only the dust of the chariot-wheels of God's providence.

NEARING TRIUMPH.

I think that before the sun of this century shall set the last tyranny will fall, and with a splendor of demonstration that shall be the astonishment of the universe God will set forth the brightness and pomp and glory and perpetuity of His eternal government. Out of the starry flags and the emblazoned insignia of this world God will make a path for His own triumph, and returning from universal conquest He will sit down, the grandest, strongest, highest throne of earth His footstool.

Then shall all nations' song ascend
To Thee, our Ruler, Father, Friend,
Till heaven's high arch resounds again
With "Peace on earth, good will to men."

I preach this sermon because I want to encourage all Christian workers in every possible department. Hosts of the living God, MARCH ON!

March on! His spirit will bless you. His shield will defend you. His sword will strike for you. March on! march on! The despotisms will fall, and paganism will burn its idols, and Mohammedanism will give up its false prophet, and Judaism will confess the true Messiah, and the great walls of superstition will come down in thunder and wreck at the long, loud blast of the Gospel trumpet. March on! march on! The besiegement will soon be ended. Only a few more steps on the long way; only a few more sturdy blows; only a few more battle cries, then God will put the laurel upon your brow, and from the living fountains of heaven will bathe off the sweat and the heat and the dust of the conflict. March on! march on! For you the time for work will soon be passed, and amid the out-flashings of the judgment throne, and the trumpeting of resurrection angels, and the upheaving of a world of graves, and the hosanna and the groaning of the saved and the lost, we shall be rewarded for our faithfulness or punished for our stupidity. Blessed be the Lord God of Israel from everlasting to everlasting, and let the whole earth be filled with His glory. Amen and Amen.

A BISHOP'S EXPERIENCE OF TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

The new Bishop of London is a total abstainer. At a recent temperance meeting he presided, and thus explained his position:

"The cause of temperance is emphatically the cause of the great mass of the people. It is true that the evil against which we are contending is to be found in all ranks of society; it is true that there are sinners of this particular sort among the highest classes; it is true that there is much in all ranks which deserves to be severely reprobated, and it is an important part of the work of the Christian ministry to preach strongly against such an evil. But above all others do the poor suffer from the presence of this evil among them; above all others does this sin tend to brutalize poverty and to separate it altogether from the consolations of religion; above all others do the poor feel that from this evil alone the greater proportion of their sufferings is derived. And it is quite certain that of all the things that could be done to elevate the laboring classes there is none to be compared with the work that might be done by those who by their sympathy, and by the necessary personal sacrifices, did their best to induce all their fellow-countrymen, down to the very lowest ranks, to cast away from them this great temptation, and to seek to elevate themselves, their characters, the position of their families, and their own souls by rising above all that is associated with and is a necessary consequence of the present intemperance of the people.

"It is not that the poor are more intemperate than others, but it is that intemperance has a more certain, and a more deadly effect upon them and upon their position; and while it might be possible to leave all others to face the consequences for themselves, the laboring man is just in that condition which is in itself a call upon every Christian to help him, if he can, to resist the sin of intemperance and to rise above temptation. If I could do anything among my fellow-countrymen, if by laboring among the poor I could make them in the slightest degree to find it easier to win for themselves a more religious and more moral condition by casting out all the temptation and the provocations of temptation entirely, then, indeed, I should feel I was doing a bishop's work—a true superintendence of the religious life of the people at large; a work which the bishop is bound to encourage and his clergy to pursue. To work, it is necessary that he should be ready always to set an example, and if any sacrifices are to be made, to be the first to make them.

"The day was when those who took up the cause of total abstinence, believed as they did so, and as experience has since proved, that this is, and necessarily must be the main instrument to be used in fighting this great evil. They who first began had much to face and to fight. They had to fight the scorn of their neighbors all round, and they bore that scorn in order that they might shelter from the same scorn their weaker brethren whom they desired to help. When I became a total abstainer, from the conviction of the necessity which, as it seemed to me, that God had laid upon me already, it was a comparatively easy thing. I had no doubt once or twice to face an unpleasant meeting; once or twice I have seen men get rather angry about it, and I have seen attempts made to terrify all the speakers on the platform by all sorts of threats which, likely enough, might have come to something if those on the platform had been cowards enough to run away from them. But, after all, this was a very small matter to face.

"But, as time has gone on, the total abstainers have not only found that the sacrifice which they have been called upon to make is, after all, no such very great matter in the face of society; they have found also by experience that there is no very great matter as regards their personal enjoyment. And I am quite certain that, taking them body for body, in spite of the unpleasant remarks sometimes made that total abstainers look pale, and thin, and stunted, and as if somehow or other they were taken from the unwholesome portions of society—in spite of all these remarks I do not think we feel that we have really lost anything whatever in the way of health or enjoyment. But to the end we shall insist upon pressing on all concerned, that they will sacrifice very little indeed if they will join our ranks, and that meanwhile they will be doing all that they can to render a greater service to their fellow-men than all the charities in this country put together."

THE UNION OF THE SECTS.

By Dr. Talmage.

ONE of the most significant meetings ever held was the recent Congress of Churches at Hartford, Conn. All denominations were represented in an effort to bring Christians together in combined work for God. Episcopal and non-Episcopal, Baptist and Pædo-Baptist, Calvinist and Arminian, side by side, as if there had never been any belligerency. The simple fact is that there are too many denominations of Christians, the difference between many of them being only imaginary or trivial. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are annually expended in keeping up the walls, for each sect, however small, must have its secretaries, and its church courts, and its newspaper organs, and its ecclesiastical machinery. The tendency is now toward coalescence and unification, and the next fifty years will see marvels of brotherhood, of which the Hartford Convention is a radiant prophecy.

Unless you have investigated for yourself you have no idea into what the Church is split. The Baptists are divided into: First, regular; second, Campbellites; third, Dunkers; fourth, Free Will; fifth, Anti-Mission; sixth, Winnebrennarian; seventh, Seventh Day; eighth, Six Principle; ninth, General; tenth, Mennonites. The Methodist Church is divided into: First, Methodist Episcopal Church North; second, Methodist Episcopal Church South; third, African Methodist Episcopal Church; fourth, Methodist Episcopal Zion Church; fifth, Colored Methodist Church; sixth, African Methodist Church; seventh, Union American Methodist Episcopal Church; eighth, Congregational Methodist; ninth, Primitive Methodists; tenth, Independent Methodists; eleventh, Free Methodists; twelfth, Welsh Calvinistic Methodists; thirteenth, Wesleyan Methodist Connection; fourteenth, Methodist Evangelical Association; fifteenth, Methodist Protestant; sixteenth, United Brethren in Christ. The Adventists are divided into: First, Second Adventists; second, Seventh-Day Adventists; third, Evangelical Adventists; fourth, Non-Resurrection Adventists; fifth, Age-to-Come Adventists. The Quakers are divided into: First, Orthodox; second, Hicksite; third, Wilbur, or Friends on Original Principles; fourth, Kingsties; fifth, Lambornites; sixth, Progressives. The Presbyterians are divided into the Northern Presbyterians, Southern Presbyterians, Cumberland Presbyterians, United Presbyterians, Reformed Presbyterians, Associate Reformed Presbyterians, and many other denominations more in number than I have mentioned are more or less absurdly cut up into a great ecclesiastical hash, with enough salt of real grace to keep it, and enough pepper of biting controversy to spice it, but nevertheless hash. With some it is a question of robes; with some a question of days; with some a question about non-essentials so small that the theologian has to get out his dictionary to find them.

The mere recital of their names shows the necessity that something be done for their combination. If this world is ever taken for God, and its sins overthrown, it will be by the marching of all the hosts of God in solid column to attack. The sixteen kinds of Methodists will come under one wing, the ten kinds of Baptists must come under another wing, and the seven kinds of Presbyterians under still another wing. After all the branches of each denomination have united, then the great denominations nearest akin will unite, and this absorption shall go on until there shall be one great Millennial Church, divided only for convenience into geographical section, and as of old it was the "Church of Laodicea," and the "Church of Philadelpheia," and the "Church of Thyatira," so it shall be the "Church of America," and the "Church of Europe," and the "Church of Asia," and the "Church of Africa," and the "Church of Australia." Of that world-wide Church there will be only one article of creed—Christ first, Christ last, and Christ forever.

Among the grandest events of the century is this Hartford Congress, and by its pacification of churches it has done and will do more good than a thousand conventicles to decide about dogmas and legislate concerning a hair split between north and north-west side, and building line fences between non-essentials, while the world wants light, wants sympathy, wants bread, wants God, and wants them now. Come on, then, men of voice, and men of type, and men of all callings and of all work, men in high position and low, and let us make one strong pull to help ourselves and help others. If we can do nothing to rescue the inmates of a dwelling-house, let us give three cheers to the firemen as they go up the ladder. If we cannot manage an oar well enough to fetch a drowning man through the breakers, let us huzza for the men of the lifeboat, as they pull for the rock. Our glorious neighbor, Noah Hunt Schenck, of the Episcopal Church, who is not here because God took him to rest, beautifully and appropriately transposed a somewhat familiar poetic verse so that it says, in the close of one of his sermons which I have been reading to-day:

Men of prayer, be up and stirring

Night and day;

Sow the seed; withdraw the curtain;

Clear the way!

Men of action, aid and cheer them

As ye may.

There is a faint about to stream,

There is a light about to beam;

There is a warmth about to glow,

There is a flower about to blow;

There is a midnight blackness

Changing into gray;

Men of prayer and men of action,

Clear the way!

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Something at Second-Hand.—At a recent meeting Mr. Graham related: "The other day I stopped a man whom I knew in the street, and said, 'Is it not a grand thing to be going to heaven?' 'Aye, it is that,' he replied. 'Are you on the road, my friend?' I asked, and looking rather doubtful he said, 'Well, I do not know about that.' 'How do you know it is grand going to heaven?' 'Oh, by hearsay,' was the answer. How many are there like this man, who know that it is a good thing to be going to heaven by hearsay of it, but yet will not accept Jesus Christ as the Saviour, the way to the Father, and 'the hope of glory'?"

Given Back by the Sea.—A Scotch Minister narrated: "Last year I was in Berwickshire, where you may remember a terrible disaster occurred to the fishing fleet about three years ago. A sudden gale arose one night, and the entire fleet of fishing smacks went down into the sea. There was one instance of a lad, who was supposed to have gone down with the rest, but a minister told me he was visiting at his home one night, when the lad, who was thought to have been drowned, walked in. Words cannot express the joy of that family. The glad father rising exclaimed, 'Oh, my son who was lost and was dead, but is alive and is found!' So also it is with God, when a child, who was 'dead in trespass and sin,' returns to Him repenting, will be welcomed as a son to his father's bosom."

An Old Lady's Query.—Mr. Craig, a Well-known evangelist, said: "Last week I was preaching in Edinburgh, and when I had finished an aged woman came to me and said: 'Mr. Craig, I have heard you speaking seven times, and each time you have spoken on the Prodigal Son. Why don't you change your subject?' 'Well, mother, I will tell you,' I replied. 'The first time I spoke on it there was a poor fallen woman in the meeting whose heart the story touched, and she repented of her evil way, and gave herself to the Lord, and she is now a faithful servant of Jesus. I am also a returned prodigal myself. Years ago I left my father's home, enlisted as a soldier, and was sent to India, where my life was so bad that all recollections of good seemed to have left. On my return to Edinburgh, the Assembly were sitting, and a friend took me into one of the halls where the minister of my youth giving his yearly report on Home Missions. The figure and the well-remembered tones of the venerable man awoke those recollections which I thought had been gone forever, and then flashed upon my memory one of the sermons I had heard him preach, when his subject was the Prodigal Son. With tears I saw my Father's face, and He received me glad. These are two of the reasons why I like to speak on the Prodigal Son."

Poison Instead of Physic.—Mr. McLaughlin said: "In the east end of Glasgow, where I live, there was a woman sent by a doctor to druggist with a prescription. The assistant I saw behind the counter, and prepared a prescription in a rather careless way. The woman went home, and gave the medicine her little boy, and shortly afterward the child died from the effects. Instead of physic it was poison the child had taken. The child of 10 years had to give up its life, and a mother lose her darling child through the carelessness of a clerk. Dear friends, how much misery happiness we may bring on others by our actions. If we would think of it we should more careful. 'More evil's wrought for me of thought rather than want of heart.' 'Not of us liveth unto himself,' therefore 'what ever we do, let us do it heartily, as unto the Lord.'"

The Passport Demanded.—Mr. Graham related: "At the time of the Franco-German War a gentleman went over to France, and knew that he could not go without a passport, applied for one before starting. After he crossed the Channel, he was asked, 'Where your pass?' Putting his hand into his pocket he found that it was gone. He searched everywhere, but without success. He told the officials that he had had it, and appealed to his fellow passengers for confirmation, but it was no use; they still insisted on the passport be produced. Vexed and disappointed he had returned home. On entering his office, he found the pass lying upon a desk; he had neglected to take it with him. Hastily grasping it, he crossed the Channel, and this time he was allowed to pass without a word. Dear friends, there is a time coming when each of us will be asked, 'Where is your passport?' Many avaricious will be the excuses, but it will profit nothing unless you have your pass—a living unshaken faith in the Lord Jesus Christ!"

The Divine "Save-All."—Dr. McKay of Haverhill was once on his way home from addressing a meeting, when a man came running up to him and exclaimed: "Dr. McKay! can you point me the way of life?" The good doctor opened his Bible at Isaiah 53: 6, and all we sheep have gone astray," etc. After reading the verse, he said, "You see that there are thousands in this verse, the one at the beginning and the other at the end. Well, you just go at the one 'all,' and come out at the other, your salvation is secure. 'All we like sheep have gone astray.' Is not that true?" The man said it was. "We have turned every one to his own way. Is not that also true?" "Yes," was the reply. "But the Lord hath laid upon him the iniquity of us all." And bidden the man good-night, the doctor hurried away. In a few days the man, now a true believer in Christ, called to tell the doctor the great charity that had taken place in him, and to thank him for showing him the way of salvation. Perhaps many of you have gone in at the one 'all,' I have you come out at the other?"

A Drummer-Boy's Triumph.—A Convert soldier, who is now engaged in Christian work, said: "When I was in India there was a man the same regiment with me who was so wicked in his life and profane in his language that even evil men, to whom habitual swearing was no sin, shrank in fear from him, so appalling was it. One day, after a hard fit of drinking, he was seized with an attack of illness, from which the doctor said he would never recover. When this was known the chaplain, the Biblewoman, and the evangelist each went to see him, but they were all driven from his bedside with maledictions. The evangelist was telling a company of Christian soldiers the reception which Whitehouse had given him, when a little drummer-boy, stepping forward, said, 'May I visit him?' 'You! What good could you do, when we have failed!' said the evangelist. But the boy replied, 'You forget, sir, that David slew Goliath,' and, so saying, he turned away, and entering the colonel's presence with his sword (God's Word) tucked under his arm, and giving the military salute, said: 'May I visit Whitehouse, sir?' 'What do you want with him?' asked the colonel. 'I have a message from his Father, sir.' 'Oh, I did not know that he had any friends; go and give him the message at once, my boy.' The boy gladly obeyed, and, bending over the dying man, he said: 'Whitehouse, I have brought a message from your Father.' 'You must be mistaken; I have no friends.' 'Yes, you have,' replied God's messenger, and, turning to John 3:16, he read, 'For God so loved the world,' etc. After hearing the verse read, the man burst into tears, and exclaimed, 'Ah, my boy, you have been sent right from God with that message to me.' Before the little drummer-boy left him, he had fully surrendered himself to the Lord, and a few days afterward he died trusting in Jesus."

MR. SPURGEON AND THE COLPORTEURS.

CONNECTED with Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle is a society which employs ninety men, who go about from place to place selling Bibles and religious literature, and giving away tracts. At the annual meeting recently held, it was stated that last year the men had sold eight thousand six hundred and sixty-five Bibles and thirty-six thousand three hundred and seventy-one New Testaments, beside other books. Mr. Spurgeon congratulated the men on their success. He remarked that, though many had found it otherwise, the past year had been a good time for colporteurs; the sales had not declined, and the higher success achieved had encouraged them all. Though he was not going to preach on the text "Sell the books," that was the first thing a colporteur had to do. They might be good men in other respects, but they did not excel as colporteurs if they did not push the sales. It was just the same with students in the college; they had first of all to be good preachers. Thus, the main object of their calling must not be missed. Yankee book-agents had the reputation of being terrible fellows; they would never leave a house without an order, even though it might be an order to get off the premises; and one of the fraternity was said to have had so much "cheek," that when struck by lightning in the face—his strongest point—the fluid glanced off to kill an animal some yards off. In a way this "cheek" was a good thing, and they would not do much without perseverance. They wanted men to sell books to people who thought that they did not want them. They had no reason to be ashamed of their wares, which were good to sell and good to buy.

It was then shown that a colporteur would be judged of in a district by his usefulness. As they loved their Master, therefore, let them abound in all good works to His glory, forasmuch as their labor was not in vain in the Lord. In regard to general procedure, no one could lay down rules for another; each man best knew his own capacities, and all had undeveloped abilities. There were dangers to be avoided in their career of usefulness. They must avoid getting into ruts, doing things always in the same old style. A disposition to stray into new roads was also to be avoided. They should get out of jog trot ways, and go forward as though they were always working by the piece.

Then small things in personal character might be as important as the linch-pin in the wheel—actions not absolutely wrong in themselves might become wrong if they hindered the work. The greatest dangers came from themselves; they were weakest where they thought themselves to be strongest, and needed always to be kept by the Spirit of God. It was necessary that they should like their work and be happy in their spheres. If they had dangers and discouragements, they also had many encouragements. To do anything for God was better than doing anything for themselves. They could not work like educated men, but they could all speak naturally and keep near to the Word of God. The people needed to be taught; the only body of divinity was Jesus Christ; and if only made acquainted with Him they would be fed; in places where the teaching was unevangelical the best rebuke was to preach the Gospel.

In conclusion, Mr. Spurgeon advised the men to do what they could to promote temperance, whether pledged abstainers or otherwise; and always to look after the many bed-ridden saints whose prayers evidently drew down showers of blessing on the Church.

THE LIMITS OF THE AGE.

By the Rev. M. Parsons, D.D., of Buffalo, N. Y.*
The Declared Purpose—The Separation at the End of the Age—The Predicted Character of this Age—A Search for Individuals—Civilization is Not Godliness—The Object of Christianity—Not to Make the World Better—To Save Men Out of It.

THE song of redemption uttered by the ransomed Church in the vision of the prophet John (Rev. 5:9) declares the purpose of the age to be the gathering out of the nations a people who shall afterward reign on the earth. And that the gathering is not the conversion of all men—but the evangelizing of the nations—is plain from the teaching of our Lord in the thirteenth of Matthew's Gospel. There He says tares and wheat "grow together until the harvest." "The harvest," He adds in His interpretation, is "the completion of the age." This chapter contains the history of the kingdom of heaven in mystery during this present age. The above parable refers to the corruptions aroused within it by Satan.

A CORRUPT AGE.

The parable of the leaven represents the results which will be manifested in the same kingdom during the age, from the corruptions introduced by those who are within the Church. The meal will be leavened with heresies, and perversions during all this dispensation. The heat of the Lord's chastening, and discipline, and judgment has arrested this process, during the age thus far, to bring the bread out of each generation, and will continue so to perfect His own work until the end. The gathering of the fish out of the Gospel net is at the completion of the age. Then a separation occurs. The good are gathered. The bad are cast away. These declarations of our Saviour clearly limit and define the boundaries of this age.

The distinction of the good and bad does not hint at any universal conversion of men previous to the close of the age. On the contrary, it expressly predicts what has already been confirmed by history, and is patent all over Christendom at this moment. Not for one moment, in the nineteen centuries nearly passed, has a single spot on the globe presented the glorious spectacle of an entirely converted population. If this dispensation is for the conversion of the whole world to Christ, then, for more than eighteen hundred years, anyone can see it has been a stupendous failure. But if the Paraclete has come to reveal Christ to those in every generation of the age who would receive Him, and if the Lord has commanded His disciples to preach the Gospel in all the world "to every creature," to accomplish this blessed and glorious end, then but in every nation and each generation, from Pentecost to the present moment, "he that feareth God" and "worketh righteousness" has been accepted by Him. The only failure has been on man's part. Instead of dispersing the Church in its representatives to the end of the earth, to preach the Gospel to every creature—that the seed of Christ might be speedily gathered—we have been massing the best forces upon a few favored spots, to convert all the people, without success, hitherto, in a single case.

THERE HAS BEEN NO FAILURE.

There is a law of progression in regard to the power and results of Christianity in the ages of the world deserving notice. Each age has shown greater fruits, and a vast increase of the numbers of the saved. Each age has also presented the similar rapid growth in the elements and forces of evil opposed to the kingdom of God. Each age had its assigned work in the recovery of this earth. Our own age has its section. It is to gather from, or out of, the nations (Gentiles) the redeemed people of God. It is a mission to Gentiles as distinct from Jews. In this mission the search and the appeal of the Spirit is for the individual—and no condition, or character, or nationality can exclude.

There are many large and precious promises that apply to a period or age to follow the present. These promises affirm the ingathering of all nations, the prevalence of knowledge and holiness—to such an extent as to fill the earth. But we are now concerned with this one age, and we are not left in doubt. Let us dwell for a few moments on its predicted character.

The parables of our Lord to which we have alluded, all betoken a mixed and corrupted state of things to the end of the age. The spirit confirms this in the revelation of great apostasy. 1 Tim. 4:1-3; Also, that shall be in the last days, that formality and hypocrisy will abound, that all who adhere to godliness shall suffer persecution, that "evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." 1 Tim. 3:1-13: The world is declared to be the enemy of God, and as evil men constitute the world—as that term is used in Scripture—the world around us is growing worse and worse every year.

This is not saying that gross and rude forms of barbaric sin may not disappear under the increasing light of Christianity, but it declares that civilization without Christ, and refinement without the Gospel, are as much greater sins in guilt and condemnation, as the light under which they have been born and have grown is greater than the darkness of heathendom. This is not saying that pure Christianity does not increase and have great power in the world. But it declares what God declares of the works of the flesh, and of the world. They are abomination in His pure eyes. And Christianity is so saturated with this abomination to-day that only the power of rebuke which the Spirit of God can exert through faithful and loyal witnesses, will prevent its overthrow by the united hordes of lawlessness and infidelity. On every hand the signs of the times fit the words of the prophecy I have cited. The boasted powers and promises of this age, to which even Christian men vauntingly point, are not the power of godliness, nor the presence of divine life in the multitude of those who are filled with the progress of arts, and science, and new inventions.

The Word of God declares that the purpose of preaching the Gospel of the kingdom in the world is to save the people out of it called the Church, and not to make the world better. The same Word declares "a friend of the world is an enemy of God" (James 4:4). If the world is a world growing better, and is in a more hopeful condition, every year, then it is strange to read these words, from 1 John 2:16, "For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world."

per annum, payable in advance.

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Monthly Treasury Statement. Issued last week, shows that the month of May was rather better than the average for this year. As compared with the same month of last year the expenditure was smaller, and the receipts, though less than those of May, 1884, were not so much less as other months of this year have been. There was a falling off in revenue of only $1,663,000, about two thirds of the average monthly decline. This occurred in the internal revenue, the customs being only $50,000 less than in May, 1884, and the miscellaneous receipts about $300,000 more. In the expenditures, on the other hand, there is a decrease of nearly $3,000,000, of which $1,228,000 is in "ordinary," $1,440,000 in pensions, and $315,000 in interest. The net gold balance is now $115,120,533. There are silver dollars on hand to the amount of $166,342,998. The public debt was reduced during the month by $3,350,833.

The Great Strike of the Iron Workers, which has thrown one hundred thousand men out of work, is the most serious event of the day. The iron and steel, nail, plate, and bar mills are now shut down, and preparations are being made for a protracted struggle. Many interests will be affected, as there will be a much smaller demand for coal, and the railroads will suffer by a large diminution of freight. The strike has long been impending, and was precipitated by the Manufacturers' Alliance deciding to reduce wages by twenty per cent in some branches, and twenty-five per cent in others. The workmen, represented by the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Steel Workers, as soon as the reduction was ordered, directed a strike, and were promptly obeyed. There appears to be no dispute between the men and the employers about the facts. It is admitted on both sides that there is unusual depression in the trade, and that the manufacturers are not able to obtain ordinary prices for the raw material nor the finished product. It is about the remedy that there is a difference of opinion. In these cases the manufacturers generally try to make the men bear the first brunt of the bad times, and the men know it. Nothing, however, is said on that point at present. The theory of the men is that by ceasing work an artificial scarcity will be produced, and prices will rise to a point at which the manufacturers can afford to pay the men their present wages. The strike is felt worst at Pittsburgh, Pa., but it extends to all the mills west of the Alleghany Mountains, and north of the Ohio. In the present attitude of both parties, there is an opportunity for arbitration which may not exist after a bitter and protracted struggle. It may be hoped that it will not be allowed to pass away unused, as much suffering is inevitable if the strike continues.

The Apache Outbreak had no further development last week. With the exception of Geronimo's band, all the Indians are reported on their reservations. The United States troops are watching the avenues into Mexico, and as reinforcements arrive efforts are being made to surround the insurgents on the Black Range. Isolated murders and thefts of cattle are still reported, and on June 3d a trail was found near Hillsboro, N. M., which showed that the Indians are driving the captured cattle before them. General Crook is in the field himself, and is hopeful of catching the marauding band.

The National Conference of Charities and Corrections, now in session at Washington, D. C., has been anticipated for some time, in the hope that some practical suggestion might issue from it for the much-needed reform of the prison system. At the opening session on June 4th the President, Mr. Philip C. Garrett, of Philadelphia, in the course of an exhaustive address thus summarized his views of the reforms most urgently needed: "It is the duty of every State—a duty from neglect of which the commonwealth will be the sufferer—to provide a system of institutions properly planned and equipped for the criminal class. These should comprise: First. Reform schools for children, situated in the country, in separate, home-like cottages, accommodating not over fifty pupils each, and with honor as the basis of discipline. Second. Reformatories for first offenders between sixteen and thirty years of age, on the Elmira plan. Third. Penitentiaries to which a limited number of local places of detention, properly distributed over the State, for untried persons only, should be tributary, and connected with these comfortable quarters for witnesses. These places of detention should supplant the jails. The penitentiaries should provide for as much classification as possible, hardened criminals and determined desperadoes, old or young, being kept quite apart, without possibility of communication by sign or signals with others, and never to be seen by them. The reformation of those who may reform requires this. The only class entirely excluded from this beneficent plan for reformation is the professional criminals, who have devoted themselves to a life of crime and by long habit have become so hardened in evil ways as to be incorrigible and unreformable. For these the purpose of reformation disappears, and society owes it to herself to save the community from absolute certainty of fresh depredations every time the prisoners' terms expire by keeping them in limbo."

Victor Hugo, the Great French Poet, was buried on June 1st in the Pantheon, at Paris. His body was borne from the Arc de Triomphe, where it had been lying in state, to its last resting-place, with a pomp never equalled in the memory of the oldest citizens. Large bodies of cavalry occupied the streets leading to the Palace of the Elysée, the residence of President Grévy. Minute guns were fired from the Hôtel des Invalides and from Fort Valérien. The crowd was very orderly, and there was not a sign of that trouble with the Communists which had been expected. The funeral procession started punctually at noon. Many chariots heaped with the offerings of the people of France followed the hearse, which, in obedience to the late poet's express orders, was plain and unornamented—exactly the kind used in the funerals of the very poor. Enormous crowds of people lined the streets that formed the route of the procession, while other masses of people possessed the intersecting streets for a great distance on either side. The buildings were black with people, as was indeed every point from which could be had a view of the unparalleled spectacle, even the trees along the line being alive with human beings. Eulogistic orations were delivered at the Arc de Triomphe and at the Pantheon. M. Le Mat, an ex-officer of the Confederate army, who served under Beauregard at Charleston, made a short speech and, in the name of the National Institute of Washington expressed the grief felt by all Americans, from one end of the land to the other, at the loss sustained by the civilized world in the death of Victor Hugo. It was not until four o'clock that the dead poet's remains were lowered into the crypt and placed beside those of Rousseau.

Negotiations Respecting the Afghan Frontier are the subject of contradictory reports from Europe. Both the governments concerned are reticent, but the impression grows that, in spite of numerous difficulties as to details, the negotiations approach a pacific settlement. The Pal Mall Gazette, a newspaper usually well informed, stated on Friday that an agreement has been arrived at on all questions of principle. The commissioners will forthwith commence to mark precisely the delimitation of the boundary. They are now on the spot. The Gazette believes that the Penjdeh incident will be referred to the King of Denmark, who has informally agreed to accept the office of arbitrator. The arbitration will be rigidly confined to the interpretation of the Sacred Covenant of March 16th. The Paris Gaulois states that the Princess of Wales is endeavoring to bring about a meeting of the Prince of Wales and the Czar of Russia at Copenhagen. It is the hope of the Princess that a permanent peace may be secured through the meeting. On Saturday a disquieting rumor was in circulation that the Ameer of Afghanistan had been assassinated by his suite while travelling in Persia. The rumor is discredited, because the Ameer was little likely to have gone to Persia while his own country was in difficulties. It may refer to Ayoub Khan, the cousin of the Ameer and the next claimant to the throne of Afghanistan, who is in Persia.

A Cordial Welcome to Minister Phelps has been accorded by the press and people of England. He appeared in public for the first time on June 3d, at a banquet given by the Lord Mayor of London, and delivered a felicitous speech. Referring to his first appearance, the London papers speak editorially in congratulatory terms. The Globe says: "Mr. Phelps, taken for what he is, without reference to his brilliant predecessor, is an acquisition to the highest social and official society of London. With delicate art he conveys, even in his modest acceptance of the welcome accorded to him as a compliment to his country rather than to himself, a subtle flattery and dignified sense of obligation." The Echo concludes: "The new American Minister made a decidedly good impression last night at the Mansion House when he delivered his first speech. Mr. Phelps has a good voice and smooth, graceful delivery."

A Destructive Earthquake Occurred in Cashmere on May 31st. A dispatch from Srinagar, the capital of the country, says that the shocks, which occurred at intervals of ten minutes, were of great violence. The greater part of the city was destroyed, and the cavalry barracks is a mass of ruins. Ninety persons are known to have been killed, and hundreds of the injured have already been taken from the general wreck. The total loss of life or the number of the maimed must remain unknown for some days, as many of the inhabitants still lie buried in the ruins. When the shocks were first felt and the people realized that they were being subjected to the awful possibilities of an earthquake, the wildest panic seized them. Every one able to do so rushed from the trembling houses and fled to the boats on the river and on the lakes, or sought the open country. The terrified inhabitants camped in the fields that surround the town. Other cities in the vale of Cashmere also suffered heavily, but owing to the overthrow of the telegraph poles the facts cannot be learned.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South and others with the CHRISTIAN HERALD were received last week to the amount of $7, in the following sums: From Boston, Mass., $2; Sterling, Kan., $3; New Milford, Ill., $2.

A Fine of Thirty Dollars Each Has Been Imposed on the Hon. William F. Davis and Rev. H. L. Hastings for preaching on the Common, at Boston, Mass. We hear from Mr. Hastings that the service was merely one of singing, reading, and prayer, and was not preaching, as alleged. Three chapters of the Bible were read, with current comments, and there was no sermon delivered. It has been the custom since 1882 to hold services there, and a part of the Common is selected where no damage will be done to the grass by trampling on it. The two evangelists have appealed against the decision of the Municipal Court.

The Christian Commission will Hold its sixth reunion on June 26-30th. The President, Mr. George H. Stuart, has issued the invitation, in the course of which he says: "We have received a cordial invitation to hold our sixth reunion at Old Orchard, Me., eleven miles from Portland, by the sea. This kind offer has been accepted by the committee, and I hereby invite all delegates of the Christian Commission, the Sanitary Commission, and army and navy chaplains (Federal and Confederate) to assemble in friendly union at the time and place named. In issuing this announcement, I again embrace the opportunity of extending fraternal greetings to all who were associated with us in aiding suffering humanity on the battle-field, in the camp, and in the hospitals."

The New Mission Church in New York, which is located at Broome and Centre streets, in the midst of a densely-populated neighborhood, was opened last week. It has been built by the New York City Mission and Tract Society. It occupies a plot of ground seventy by one hundred and ten feet, and is built on the site of a once celebrated dog-bit owned by Harry Jennings, an Englishman. The building is of brick, plainly and solidly constructed. The auditorium and rooms connected with it have a seating capacity of fourteen hundred. The Tabernacle when finished will have cost about $150,000. This money was willed at different times and by different persons to the New York Mission and Tract Society, and was laid aside for church extension purposes. Pews in the Tabernacle are free. Prayer and temperance-meetings will be held almost every day. The pastor of the Tabernacle is the Rev. John Dooly, who has been engaged in mission work in this city for thirteen years. There is an excellent unpaid choir.

A Believer's Meeting for Bible Study will be held at Niagara, Ont., July 23-30th. This will be the ninth of these annual meetings, which have been heretofore much blessed to those who have attended them. Beside the clergymen who have assisted at the former conferences, and who have promised to attend this year, are: Dr. J. H. Brooks, of St. Louis; W. G. Moorehead, Xenia, Ohio; S. H. Kellogg, Allegheny, Pa.; G. C. Needham, Mass.; L. W. Munhall, Indiana; and from Canada: H. M. Parsons, T. C. Des-Barres, and others. The singing will be led by Mr. James McGranahan. A number of brethren from Great Britain are also expected. Another conference for the special consideration of the second coming of our Lord will meet at Niagara, in the same tabernacle, July 14-17th, and in charge of Canadian brethren. All persons desiring to attend are welcome. Applications for entertainment, and reduction of fares below the usual rates, and for programmes, should be addressed to Alfred Sandham, Secretary, Toronto, Ont.

A House was Stolen Bodily in Chicago Last week. A dispatch from that city says that on June 2d a large two-story frame house at the corner of Archer Avenue and State Street was vacated by its tenant, a hardware dealer. Immediately after a force of men appeared and tore the structure down, carting off the material as fast as it was taken from the building. The corner is one of the liveliest outside of the business district, being close to the main building of the cable road, and the neighborhood is full of busy retail places. No attention was paid to the removal of the building until the new tenant appeared to see about changes on the premises, and found nothing left but the brick foundations. The whole building had been stolen under the very eyes of the police, and the latter find it now very difficult to discover the thieves. This is a new element of insecurity for wealthy men. Property of other kinds is often stolen, but real estate has hitherto been considered safe from thieves. Christians, however, who obey Christ's injunction (Matt. 6:19, 20) need be under no apprehension; their treasure is secure (II Cor. 5:1).

A Desperate Struggle with a Maniac Occurred last week in Chicago. On May 31st a telegram was received at police headquarters in that city, from the conductor of an incoming train on the Wabash Line, who asked that a strong body of police might be sent to the depot to meet his train. He said he had a maniac on board who was promenading the cars with a revolver in one hand and a huge bowie knife in the other, and frightening the passengers, of whom there were about fifty on the train. So long as the cars were in motion the demented man continued walking through the aisles of the cars, from one end of the train to the other, flourishing his weapons; but when the train approached a station he would retire to the chair car, out of which he had driven all the passengers, and would sit there ready to shoot any man who entered. He actually did shoot at and slightly wound the face of one man who jumped on the platform of the car at Kansas City, Mo. The Kansas City police were afraid to arrest him, and the conductor wanted the Chicago police to do it. They were in readiness for him when the train arrived, but the maniac defended himself in the car and killed a policeman before he was driven out and overpowered. A man so afflicted is not punished for his crimes, being irresponsible, but those to whom the wise king likens the maniac (Prov. 26:18, 19) cannot escape God's punishment on that ground, and they are very numerous in these days.

A Battle with Rattlesnakes Took Place last week at Port Jervis, N. Y. Three young men started out armed with clubs to kill a rattlesnake which had been seen in the woods near the village. They soon found it and killed it, but not before it had sounded its rattles. Almost instantly the ground seemed alive with snakes, about half of which were black snakes. They crawled out of the bushes and from holes in the ground to the number of fully one hundred, completely surrounding the young men. Flight was impossible, and the young men laid about them with their clubs with the energy that comes of love of life. The fight seemed likely to end disastrously for them, when suddenly they noticed that the snakes were fighting each other, each of the black snakes engaged with a rattlesnake. The young men took the opportunity to make their escape. On visiting the spot the next day they found it covered with the carcasses of dead snakes, the largest number of which had evidently been killed by other snakes and not by the clubs. It was well for the young men that the snakes turned against each other or they might not have escaped. In that great battle yet to come, when that great serpent, the devil, gathers his forces for a supreme effort against the children of God, there will be a similar scene, every man's hand being turned against his fellow (Haggai 2:22).

An Apparatus to Prevent Collision with Icebergs has been invented. It is described in the current number of Science, and if all the advantages claimed for it by that journal are substantiated, it will probably come into general use on transatlantic steamers. The inventor, Mr. Frank De la Torre, of Baltimore, had his device tested at sea recently, with satisfactory results. Professor Alexander G. Bell, who was present at the experiments, says that the apparatus consisted of a musket, to the muzzle of which a speaking trumpet had been attached. This gun was aimed at passing vessels, and blank cartridges were fired. After a longer or shorter time distant echoes were returned. The river steamboats and passing schooners returned perfectly distinct echoes about a mile distant. At shorter distances the effects were, of course, still more striking. The inventor claims that a steam whistle or siren apparatus for projecting the sound impulse directly ahead of a moving vessel will prove as efficacious as the firing of a gun. The recent collision of the City of Berlin with an iceberg, and the narrow escape of other steamers, show that there is urgent need of some such device for discovering the approach of icebergs or other vessels in the fog. The danger of disaster is so frightful that captains will be warned even by an echo. It needs a great deal more than an echo to prevent spiritual shipwreck. The earnest warnings of Christian friends and even the solemn words of God's Book, do not always turn the sinner from destruction (Prov. 1:25-31).

A Bride of an Hour Appeared in a Circuit Court in Illinois last week, as an applicant for a divorce. She stated that about three years ago a young man became a suitor for her hand, and she accepted him on condition that he could provide her with a home. The young man seemed to have some difficulty in fulfilling the condition, and the engagement went on from month to month, until the lady began to get tired. Recently, however, the suitor informed her that a home was ready for her, and the marriage was celebrated. An hour afterward, when the bride wished her parents farewell and was about to depart with her husband, the latter told her that they were going to boarding, and that he had been unable to provide a house to themselves. She was much incensed at this evasion, and said she did not consider a boarding-house a home. She finally refused to go with him, and taking off her wraps declared she would remain at home. She did so, and commenced a suit for divorce, which was granted her last week, with the right to resume her maiden name. So ends that marriage, in which there was evidently little love on either side. How different is the union between Christ and His Church, which Paul describes under the type of a marriage. The heavenly Bridegroom has prepared a mansion for His bride (John 14:2), and she is ready to endure poverty for His sake (Rom. 5:3-5).

A Fraud and a Fool was the Uncomplimentary description given by Judge Tuley, of Chicago, last week of two litigants in his court. The plaintiff alleged that he had advanced $13,000 to the defendant on the security of six deeds on as many mines in Nevada. Becoming uneasy after he had advanced the money, he went to Nevada to examine the mines, and declared that when he arrived there he found that instead of their being worth $50,000 each, as had been represented to him, they were practically worthless. He therefore brought suit to recover the money advanced. Judge Tuley, in summing up, said: "The defendant has not the poetry in him of Claude Melnotte, but he has all the imagination. He was two days on the witness-stand detailing the representations he made to the plaintiff, and while he talked I felt like taking some stock in the scheme myself. The plaintiff in this case is afflicted with the curse which rests upon nearly all Americans—an uncontrollable desire to make money quickly and with little effort. When he went to Nevada and telegraphed back the laconic message, referring to the defendant, 'He is a fraud,' he might have added the equally laconic statement, 'I am a fool.'" That was doubtless correct, but the folly in the case was not monopolized by the plaintiff. Business men are apt to regard the clever swindler as a smart man—anything but a fool; but God's Word takes a very different view of fraud. It is not only sin, but folly too (Jer. 17:11).

THE BOND OF THE COVENANT.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And I will bring you out from the people, and will gather you out of the countries wherein ye are scattered, with a mighty hand, and with a stretched out arm, and with fury poured out. And I will bring you into the wilderness. . . . And I will cause you to pass under the rod, and I will bring you into the bond of the covenant," etc.—EZEKIEL 20:34-38.

Special Judgments for Apostate Professors—A Merciful Design—How Men are Brought Under the Bond—The Difference Between the Covenants—How the Better Covenant Binds—Its Discipline—II. Experience in Coming Under the Bond—Brought Out of Present Company—Into Distress and Solitude—The Pleading—The Rod—III. The Ultimate Design—Binding and Separating—Knowing the Lord—The God of this Century.

This striking utterance was given forth by that renowned seer Ezekiel, at the time when the Israelites, scattered in every country, had begun to forget their nationality. They judged it prudent and wise as much as possible to disguise their distinctive character, and melt their race into the Babylonian or Chaldean, and become like the heathen. Now, God, who chose His people of old, would not have it so, and He interposed with this striking passage—"And that which cometh into your mind shall not be at all, that ye say, we will be as the heathen, as the families of the countries, to serve wood and stone." The Lord tells them that He had them for a people, and He meant to hold them for a people. Whether they delighted in it or not, He would not let them go.

This passage which I have taken for a text may very truthfully be regarded as of terrible judgment upon erring Israel; as much as if the Lord had said, "You of the house of Israel, whom I have made to be the type of my spiritual people, you shall be mine; and if you wander from me, I will distinguish you by special punishments; therefore I now threaten you with special judgments. If you will attempt to mix yourselves up with the Gentiles, I will deal with you with a startling severity, such as I have never shown unto the heathen. Your sins are greater, and your privileges greater, and so shall your chastisements be greater."

Such is the run of this passage. But at the same time, reading between the lines, and considering the verses very carefully, another reading is suggested; God, if He does not show distinguishing judgment, will display distinguishing grace. He solemnly threatens judgments, but these are preparations for mercy. He preaches to them by the prophet concerning mercy and judgment, blended in effectual working for salvation. Lovingkindness underlies and overlays His wrath. He puts on a frown in order to smile. He deals hardly with His chosen that He may deal safely with them; killing them that He may make them alive; piercing them with the arrows of conviction that He may pour in the wine and oil of His healing comforts.

I. First, then, the meaning of
of the covenant. If we take the passage as referring to the work of grace, it signifies that they shall know under what covenant they stand. Beloved, there is scarcely a more important question for all of us than this: under which covenant do we live? Are we under law or under grace? By the very fact of our creation we are under bonds to our Maker to love and serve Him, and this is a form of the covenant of works. In serving God we should have found happiness; in rebelling against Him we have found sorrow. Thus the covenant, which was bound up with the very nature of things, had its sanctions of reward and penalty. Set forth as that covenant is in the ten commands of the law, it is as terrible as it is pure. The commandment is holy, and just, and good, but we constantly violate it. The perfect law has been broken by all of us; by some it has been violated openly by wanton, wilful acts of rebellion; by all of us it has been broken in heart and will. Now, ye that are under the law, hoping to be saved by your own works, see where ye are: as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse, for "cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them." Whatever excellences you may have, and you have many in the sight of men, yet if you are under that covenant of works your comeliness is turned into corruption. "This do and thou shalt live," is no promise to you now, seeing you have failed to do; but it becomes to you a curse because of your transgressions.

THE BETTER COVENANT.

But there is another and a better covenant, which is not a covenant of works at all, but of free, rich, sovereign grace. It was made of old with Christ the second Adam, our better Covenant-Head. Its tenor was on this wise—he shall obey the Father's will; actively and passively he shall do and suffer the will of the Most High; and in doing so he shall save those whom the Father hath given him. The great question for each one is: Am I under that new covenant? You can answer that question by this one, Are you in Christ Jesus? Are you resting wholly on Him alone? If you have Christ, you are in the covenant of grace; if you are trusting in Him, God hath made with you an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure, concerning which we read both in Jeremiah 31, and in Ezekiel 36. Dwell on those covenant promises. "A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you," and again, "And I will make an everlasting covenant with them, that I will not turn away from them, to do them good; but I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me." Oh, the blessedness of being under such a sure covenant! This is what is aimed at, that God may bring His own from under the law, and place them under the covenant of grace.

They shall, secondly, be led to see them to God. If you are in that covenant you belong to God, and He will have you; for the Christ will not shed His blood in vain, nor pay a ransom price for that which He will not possess. He will keep to Himself the spoil which He hath taken from the hand of the mighty, and His Father will give Him to see of the travail of His soul, and to be satisfied. If you are in that covenant you belong to the Lord forever, neither shall it be possible for you to be your own, or to be the devil's. Though this covenant be not of works, it produces more works than the covenant of works ever could do; for, being saved by grace, it is written, "Sin shall not have dominion over you; for ye are not under the law, but under grace." Grace, and the gratitude which comes of it, form a firmer bond to hold the soul from straying than the hope of reward can possibly be; it is stronger than the fear of hell.

To come under the bond of the covenant means also to come under

for they that are in gracious covenant with God will find that He dealeth with them as with sons, and, inasmuch as He loves them, they shall know the truth of that word, "As many as I love I rebuke and chasten." He will not let you transgress as other men do; the goats may wander with impunity, but the sheep may not. God reserveth the ungodly unto the day of judgment, but judgment beginneth even now at the house of God. His fan is in His hand, and He will thoroughly purge His floor if He purges nothing else. You cannot be in covenant with God and yet be let alone in your transgressions; for it is to the reprobate that He saith, "Let him alone, he is given unto idols." The mark of God's people is that if they sin they smart, and if they wander they are whipped back. Dependancy, sickness, bereavement, loss, and even temporal death may fall upon the chosen as visitations of God to deliver them from the power of Satan.

Further, this coming under the bond of the covenant means surely that they yield to

ITS RESTRAINT.

I do not know how to give better expression to what I mean than by quoting the lines we often sing:

"Oh to grace how great a debtor
Daily I'm constrain'd to be!
Let that grace, now, like a fetter,
Bind my wandering heart to thee."

Can grace ever be a fetter? Oh, yes, it is the most blessed of all fetters, for it holds us fast, and yet never violates our liberty. It binds the very heart in willing captivity. This is the bond of the covenant. "Oh," says one, "I do not want to be under any bond." Then, in all probability, you are bound by the chains of self-will. In grace you can be under bonds, yet not in bondage. I am in the bonds of wedlock, but I feel no bondage; on the contrary, it is a joy to be so bound. The bond of grace is a marriage bond, uniting us to Him whom we love above all, even the altogether lovely Bridegroom of our souls.

But surely, it means also the security of the covenant; "I will bring thee under the bond of the covenant" must mean, I will bind thee to the Lord Jesus, thy Surety and Bondsman, and He shall secure thee forever. This covenant is everlasting, a covenant of salt, hence we sing:

"This bond shall never break,
Though earth's old columns bow;
Our sure foundations never shake,
We're one with Jesus now."

One with Jesus we shall ever be, for who shall separate us? That is a blessed phrase which speaks of our soul being bound up in the bundle of life with the soul of the Lord our God. This is what the covenant has done for us—it has made us so one with Christ, and in Christ so one with the eternal Father, that it is written, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." How earnestly do I pray that some who have been strangers to this matter may begin to spell it out this morning.

II. This is our second head. The experience of some in of the covenant. I do not want to be mistaken; I believe that many are brought under the bond of the covenant by very simple and gentle means, especially those who sweetly yield to the gentle drawings of the Holy Spirit. Very early in life some are brought to Jesus with little terror or distress of mind. Let them be very grateful for it. If you come to Christ I do not care how you come; for I am sure you could not have come at all if the Father had not drawn you; and if He has drawn you, there is no mistake in your method of coming.

These Israelites to whom Ezekiel spoke had gone very far into sin, as far as ever they could go; they had been false to their promises, wicked in their lives, and rebellious in heart against their God. With many of this character the Lord deals with a singular severity of love. He strikes them with a sword, for so only can their sins be slain. Of those processes of grace we will speak now.

To begin, will you follow me in the text at the thirty-fourth verse? Here were a people whom God had chosen to be His own, but they had ignored that choice, and had said to themselves that they would be like the families of the countries, to serve gods of wood and stone. Many among those whom the Lord has chosen in His secret purposes are saying in themselves, "We will never belong to those religious people; we will never be called cant, hypocrites, Methodists, or Presbyterians." They have a perfect horror of being ridiculed for Christ's sake. These persons are for the present perfectly satisfied to take their lot with the multitude; distinguishing grace has no charms for them. Hear, then, what God will do with such if He means to bring them under the bond of the covenant.

SEPARATION.

First, He will cause them to come out from their present company: "I will bring you out from the people, and will gather you out of the countries wherein ye are scattered, with a mighty hand, and with a stretched out arm, and with fury poured out." You do not mean to quit your present settlement, but you shall come out of it once for all. Your old friends will miss you, and what is more, they will not desire you to return to them; you shall be so miserable that they will be glad to be quit of you. As the wounded stag retires into the depths of the forest to bleed and die alone, because those which are not wounded roughly push at it with their horns, so it shall be with you; you shall prefer solitude to the galling words of the ungodly. If the Lord has chosen you and you have chosen sin, He will deal with you with a strong hand and an outstretched arm, and make you to know His fury against evil. His love to you shall show itself in wrath against your sin. The Israelites in Egypt for a time were glad to dwell there, and then began to worship the gods of Egypt; but presently God put it into Pharaoh's heart to oppress them, and he did so most grievously, and Israel had to make bricks without straw, till their bondage grew unbearable and they cried unto the Lord their God. He will make it so with you if you are one of His, for out of the Egypt of the world you shall come. The Lord Jesus will seek out His own sheep, and separate them from all other flocks.

Note next, that God said He would bring them into distress and loneliness: "And I will bring you into the wilderness of the people." It was not to be a wilderness, like the wilderness of sin where there were no inhabitants, but "I will bring you into the wilderness of the people." This is, indeed, a terrible wilderness; for you walk in the midst of crowds and yet you are perfectly alone; you mingle with the great congregation, and yet feel that none can enter into your secret. How wretched to sit here and feel that there is not another man like you in all this vast assembly. The Lord can soon make the gay worldling into the desponding solitary. I have seen Him touch proud young men, and they have been brought to deep humiliation of spirit, so as to be glad to sit down like little children and learn the way of the kingdom. This is God's way of bringing men to Himself. He digs them up by the roots, that He may remove them and plant them by the rivers of waters in the garden of the Lord.

GOD'S PLEADING.

Read on. What does He say next? "and there will I plead with you face to face." Brethren, you that know what this means by experience must help me out, for I cannot describe it in words. When the Lord becomes so realized to the guilty conscience that there seems to be nothing anywhere except God and that poor sinner, face to face with one another, then there is a time of fear and trembling indeed. For God to stand face to face with an unpardoned sinner, and plead with him, is a matter of deep solemnity. Do you know it? The sinner then cries out with Job, "I have heard of Thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth Thee. Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes."

The Lord further declares He will plead with them as He pleaded with their fathers in the wilderness. How did He do that? Why, very terribly indeed. Certain men had rebelled against God and against Moses, and He said, "Hang up their heads in the face of the sun." At another time when certain of them rebelled against Aaron, the earth opened and swallowed them up; and Korah, Dathan, and Abiram went down alive into the pit. Once the Lord pleaded with them by sending fiery serpents among them, and multitudes were bitten and died; at another time the pestilence multiplied graves at each halting-place. He brought them very low by these terrible pleadings! Is God pleading with you in that fashion? Believe me, you are not alone in such a dread experience; many of God's dear children have traversed this valley of deathshade, and by this road they have been brought under the bond of the covenant.

UNDER THE ROD.

What more does God do? Well, it is said, "And I will cause you to pass under the rod." What is this passing under the rod? I have frequently seen sheep when the shepherd has required to count them; he makes them pass through a half-opened gate, and there he numbers them. They would all come rushing through, but the shepherd blocks the way, and as they come out one by one, he touches them with his staff, and so counts them. The Lord makes His chosen to pass through a narrow place, even a strait gate, where only one can come at a time, and there and then He counts them, and causes them to give an account of themselves individually. You have been hidden away among the thousands; but now you shall be made to appear as a separate individual, and so you shall come under the rod of the Lord, and be numbered with His flock.

Now, have I been describing the experience of any person here? I feel sure I have. Thousands who will read these words will leap for joy as they explain, "This is precisely where I am. I said, 'Surely He is going to destroy me,' but if this is the way in which the Lord brings me under the bond of the covenant, I will ever bless His name." May the Holy Ghost apply these my words to all the prisoners of hope!

III. But time fails me, so I must close by noticing of all this. This bringing them under the bond of the covenant has a grand intent in it. The first design is evident in the text, it is to bind them to God. We should have gone astray long ago, and left our God entirely, if it had not been for our bitter experience when the Lord was making Himself known to us. All the better crop comes in after-life from having a deep ploughing before the seed is sown. I bear the scars of my terrible convictions about me to this day.

The next design of God is that He may entirely separate His people from the world. "I will purge out from among you the rebels, and them that transgress against me." When God makes His servants bitterly to know the evil fruit of sin, then they no longer hunger for that forbidden fruit. "Oh, you are straight-laced," says one. Indeed we are where sin is concerned. A boy climbed into a neighbor's garden, and stole unripe plums, and, after eating them, he became very ill, and was forced to drink pints of horrible physic to save his life. When he was better his school-fellows said to him, "Come with us, and steal some plums," but they seemed to be mocking him. The boy is very straight-laced, is he not? He recollects the gripes and the pains which those plums brought him, and he will have no more of them. The burnt child dreads the fire. Thus the Lord often brings His people away from their sins by giving them sharp and cutting experiences of what evil will do for them. If such be the present consequences of sin, they begin to guess what sin will bring them when they come into judgment and condemnation.

Last of all, the great end of all is that we may know the Lord. I speak thoughtfully when I say I fear that large numbers of professors do not know the Lord; that is to say, the Lord Jehovah, as known to Ezekiel, is not known by many who profess to believe in the true God, Jehovah, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, is the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, but He is not.

THE GOD OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

This generation has made a god of its own. The effeminate deity of the modern school is no more the true God than Dagon or Baal. I know him not, neither do I reverence him. But Jehovah is the true God; He is the God of love, but He is also robbed in justice; He is the God of forgiveness, but He is also the God of atonement; He is the God of heaven, but He is also the God who sends the wicked down to hell. We, of course, are thought to be harsh, and narrow-minded, and bigoted; nevertheless, this God is our God forever and ever. There has been no change in Jehovah. He has revealed Himself more clearly in Christ Jesus; but He is the same God as in the Old Testament, and as such we worship Him. We love everything that is in God when we are brought under the bond of the covenant. May God bless this word to many sorrowing spirits, for Jesus' sake! Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

SIR HENRY TAYLOR.

The recollections of the aged necessarily have a charm for the public, and when the narrator has spent his life in the society of men who have been at the helm of national affairs—men who have made history—that charm is enhanced. That is the case with the two volumes of the autobiography of Sir Henry Taylor. He is now eighty-five years of age, and during fifty years of that long period he was in intimate relations with the statesmen who managed the affairs of the British Empire. How interesting his reminiscences are likely to be may be realized when we learn that he served under no less than twenty-six of the most eminent of the British Cabinet officers who successively became chiefs of the office in which Sir Henry was employed. That expectation is not disappointed by his book. He has much to tell of the personal characteristics of men whose names have become historical in literature as well as in politics. He knew personally Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, Lord John Russell, the Earl of Derby, Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Gladstone, the Earl of Clarendon, Lord Melbourne, Archbishop Whately, Carlyle, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Samuel Rogers, Macaulay, Tennyson, Thackeray, Sir James Stephen, and many other eminent men whose reputation is world-wide. Sir Henry Taylor achieved that double prominence in literature and politics which is precisely of the character that attracts the regard of the most celebrated public men of the day, and he was therefore pre-eminently qualified to write a sketch of English society which could not fail to be interesting to all classes.

He was born in the year 1800. His parents were comparatively poor, but were able to give their boy an excellent education. After trying the sea as a profession, and afterward having a short experience of a public office, he resolved to devote himself to literature. He went up to London to seek employment on some periodical, but, happily for him, his first acquaintance among the chiefs of the literary world was able to open for him a door to an easier and less precarious occupation. He carried a letter of introduction to Dr. Holland, afterward Sir Henry Holland, who received him kindly and promised to assist him in his efforts to obtain literary employment. A few friendly interviews followed, and then Dr. Holland informed his young friend that he had been requested to recommend a young man for a place in the Colonial Office worth $1500 a year, and that he had decided to recommend Taylor. The place was secured, and Taylor entered on his duties. He seems to have devoted himself with a will, for soon after his instalment he mentions in a letter home that he was working every night until two o'clock in the morning on a statement which Canning needed for the basis of a speech in Parliament. We may infer, however, that those were not his ordinary hours, as he was able, during his official career, to contribute regularly to the press and produced several works of considerable literary merit. He remained in the employ of the Government for fifty years, rising in regular gradation to the higher offices, at increased remuneration. When increasing years and infirmities necessitated his retirement, he was knighted, and received a pension as a recognition of his long and faithful service. His official life extended from 1823 to 1873, a period of political and social excitement in his country and the world. Sir Henry Taylor's recollections, however, only incidentally deal with the great questions then agitating men's minds. They are chiefly concerned with persons, and are, therefore, the more valuable, being the result of his own observation and not such as could be gleaned from historical works. Pp. 612. Price, $3. THE OBSEQUES OF THE LATE LORD MAYOR OF LONDON.

A NOTEWORTHY ceremonial was witnessed in London on April 18th, when the late Lord Mayor, (whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on December 11th, 1884), was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral. The event was notable on several grounds, but chiefly because the death of a Lord Mayor during his year of office is very rare. It is more than a hundred years since such a death was chronicled. Lord Mayor Nottage was only in his sixty-third year, and was deservedly respected by all classes. He was a man of sturdy religious principle, who was not afraid of incurring unpopularity when his conscience was concerned. In more than one case he abandoned State ceremonies which his predecessors had initiated when he found that they involved a desecration of the Lord's day or caused his attendants to lose the rest of the Sabbath. There was doubtless some disappointment caused by his conduct, for the Londoner dearly loves a civic show, but the Mayor's decision was so obviously right that he carried with him the approval of the best citizens. His death, on April 11th, was generally deplored.

His remains were borne in solemn state to St. Paul's on April 18th, and most of the stores in London were closed as a mark of respectful sympathy. The coffin, which was completely hidden by flowers and wreaths, was received at the entrance to the cathedral by the Bishop of London, the clergy, and the choir. During the first part of the funeral service the coffin rested on a bier immediately under the centre of the dome, and at the conclusion it was lowered into its final resting-place in the crypt, in close proximity to those of the Duke of Wellington and Lord Nelson.

AN AMERICAN HEATHEN.

A CITY missionary was one day climbing the broken staircase which led to a garret in a great tenement-house, when his attention was arrested by a man of peculiarly ferocious and repulsive countenance, who was loafing about in a state of semi-intoxication.

There was something about the man's appearance so brutal and degraded, and a look of savage passion in his eyes which made the visitor shudder, and his first impulse was to go back. But the man had already noticed him, and in a gruff voice demanded what he was doing there.

"I came," said the missionary, "to see if there was any one in need of me. I have a message for the sick and the troubled that is good to hear. It is good for the healthy and merry people, too," he added, with a smile. "In fact, as it is God's Word, it's good for everybody."

The ruffian shook him off as if he had been a viper, and bade him begone with his nonsense, or he would kick him down-stairs. While the missionary was endeavoring, with gentleness and patience, to soothe the frenzied man, he was startled by hearing a feeble voice, which appeared to come from behind one of the rickety doors which opened upon the landing, saying, "Who is that? If it's a preacher, send him here." There was evidently some one in the house needing his ministrations, and the missionary became more eager than before to disarm the suspicion and dislike of the half-tipsy loafer, who still menaced him and fiercely pointed to the stairs as the road he must take to avoid bodily harm.

"Bill, Bill," cried the voice, clearly that of a woman, "do you hear? I want the parson. Let him come in, I say." The man muttered an oath, but stood aside, and indicating with a nod the door from behind which the voice seemed to come, said gruffly, "You can go in, as she wants you."

The visitor pushed open the door and entered the room. It was a wretched place, wholly destitute of furniture, except a three-legged stool and a bundle of straw in a corner, upon which were stretched the wasted limbs of an aged woman. When the visitor entered, she raised herself upon one elbow, fixed her eyes eagerly upon him, and said, "Are you a preacher?" The missionary nodded. "Then can you tell me about the blood which cleanseth from all sin?"

He sat down upon the stool beside her, and inquired, "My poor friend, what do you want to know of the blood which cleanseth from all sin?"

There was something fearful in the energy of her voice and manner as she replied, "What do I want to know of it? Man, I am dying! I am going to hell—I know I am; I deserve to go, if ever anybody did. I've been a wicked woman all my life. It's hard to be anything else for such as us, but I might ha' been better. My old man wanted me to go to church, and he'd ha' been a better man, if I had ha' let him, but I used to make fun of him and laugh him out of it. He made me go once, though, and I heard the preacher say as there was blood which cleanseth from all sin. I did not remember anything else, and I'd ha' forgot that only my old man kept a-talking about it, and when he was dying I fetched a preacher as told him more, and he wanted to teach me, only I wouldn't listen. But the old man seemed he could never hear enough, and he said it made him happy. He's dead now, and I never thought no more about it till I was took' bad, and then I wanted my son Bill to fetch a preacher, but he wouldn't. It was lucky you happened to come up here, for you can tell me now all about it."

Many years before, that city missionary had been anxious to preach the Gospel in China, and had grieved sorely over the disappointment when Providence closed that path of usefulness to him. But as he listened to the old woman's story he realized that he need not go abroad to find heathen to preach to. Right here, in the very centre of American civilization, was a soul as dark and ignorant as any soul in far-off China. The churches had sent out their missionaries to the ends of the earth, but right at their own doors was a woman in her old age needing to be taught the first principles of the Gospel. How many such were dying here every day, and going before their Maker with the words, "No man cared for my soul"! A sense of responsibility went like a knife-thrust to his heart as he opened his Bible and read the first chapter of the first epistle of St. John. The poor creature seemed to devour the words, and when he paused she exclaimed, "Read more, read more!"

He read the second chapter—a slight noise made him look round; the savage ruffian had followed him into his mother's room, and, though his face was partly turned away, the visitor could perceive that he was listening. The visitor read the third, fourth, and fifth chapters, answering her questions as he went along, and trying to show her clearly the way of salvation through Christ. He closed the book and, kneeling down, prayed earnestly for that woman's soul, and for that of her degraded son, who still stood with his arms folded, leaning against the wall, sullenly listening.

As he rose from his knees he met the poor woman's eager, questioning gaze, and interpreting the request she seemed too agitated to utter, he said, "I will come again early to-morrow. You must pray for yourself. Now I want you to ask God to teach you. While you are lying here and thinking, say to Him, 'Lord, teach me; open my eyes to see the truth.' God will hear you."

The poor woman lived nearly two weeks, and the missionary was able to do much for her bodily comfort, and to alleviate her physical suffering; but it was to her soul that God enabled him to render the greatest service. Holding firmly to the one idea she had at first of the cleansing blood, she pressed forward, learning slowly and dimly, but surely, of Christ, the Saviour of sinners, and of God's infinite love. She died at last with a smile of restful peace on her face, confident in the efficacy of the precious blood.

Her reprobate son was generally present during the missionary's visits, being, as he afterward learned, fearful lest his mother should disclose the secret of his life. He was a burglar, and he dreaded lest the missionary should learn the fact and betray him to the police. But on the day of his mother's death he confessed it himself, voluntarily, and begged the missionary to help him to start on an honest life. He, too, removed from his evil surroundings, became a reformed character, and was eventually won for Christ—a brand plucked from the burning.

Preaching to the Heathen—The Home Product.

THE JEW'S WARD.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Landlord's Rights.

THE scene of weeping and lamentation in the spacious hall of Mr. Arnold's farmhouse was a significant spectacle. Patriotic Englishmen might well have found in it cause for reflection. It was something out of all harmony with political and social economy. Here were men strong, healthy, vigorous, in tears, weeping with their employer because he and they must leave the land of their birth and all their old associations, to seek new homes in a foreign land.

The man whose decision had produced this misery was acting strictly within his rights. The land was his; it had been bequeathed to him, and was his own to do what he chose with it. Every court of law would have supported him, even if he had chosen, as many 'noble lords' have done, to tear down every house in the village and make it a preserve for game. At the present time there are landowners who preside at religious anniversaries and give large sums to religious and philanthropic institutions, and in Parliament are cheered when they speak in thrilling tones of patriotism and the good of the country, who own hundreds of acres of land covered with young trees and undergrowth which are 'preserved' for the hares and pheasants for their shooting—those same acres having once supported many families clustered around a farmhouse such as that occupied by Mr. Arnold and his family. They are scattered now, and the noble lord who owns the land and his friends enjoy their shooting over the unproductive acres. It is no wonder that, under such a system of organized selfishness, England's power and glory are in their decline.

It was not, however, of the country's danger that Mr. Arnold and his men were thinking just now. The personal grief was pressing heavily, and that was a matter nearer home. Mr. Arnold himself scarcely thought of the larger aspect of the question, though he felt that there was a gross injustice in this exercise by his landlord of his rights. He felt that legal right might be moral wrong. But that which brought to his eyes the unaccustomed tears was this expression of sympathy on the part of his men, who, by their spokesman, old Richard Windbank, declared that they would rather leave their homes and all their familiar associations than be separated from their employer. He did not know until now that he and his wife so loved, for he knew how poignant would be the sacrifice these people declared themselves willing to make for his sake.

There had been sorrow and grief caused by the death of many an Arnold, but, however well-beloved these had been, there had always been an Arnold to fill the vacant place. But this calamity was about to depopulate the village; half the homes would be forsaken forever, and the ancient circle of neighborhood and friendship was about to be broken up. Those who went away must leave many a friend behind them, and those who stayed must lose more than half of what made life happy for them. It was an unmeasured, of an unmeasured catastrophe.

"You must not decide, any of you," said Philip, after a while, in a faltering voice—"not until I am in America. I am going there at once to seek a place, and I'll send you word faithfully what your chances will be, and what profit or loss it would be to you all; and then, if you will come with us, why, it will make it like a real home to us, my father and mother and me; and we will do our best for you all; and it shall never be forgotten that you left England for our sakes. But leave us now, for my father cannot speak a word to you."

Slowly the people took their departure, shaking their heads sadly as they spoke of their old master.

"He's breakin' his heart," said old Richard Windbank, "and naught as we can do 'ill mend it. Mark my words, he wunna live to quit Hazelmount; and we'll lay him wi' his forefathers. But Maister Philip, he's got all his wits about him, and a high spirit he has."

So Philip went his way just before the ingathering of the harvest began, but he could not start for America until he had made some inquiries after Carola. He had always reckoned upon being able to find her through the address given at the Bank of England when she applied for the interest of her money in the Consols, and he made application through a solicitor in London for this address. But the reply was that no dividend had been claimed for the last year and a half, and that the old address of Matthias Levi still stood on the books. There was no time for him to pursue his search personally; and with a heavy heart, and with his hopes cast down, Philip set out in quest of a new Hazelmount on the other side of the Atlantic; for what would a new home be to him, even if it was absolutely his own land, if Carola did not share it?

It was a sore disappointment, for always he had thought that his mother's objection was his only obstacle. That once surmounted, he felt sure of the rest. He uttered the beloved name in the silence of the night, and often among the busy throng around him in the day, and it seemed to him that wherever she might be she must hear. The intensity of his love thrilled in his voice as if it must penetrate to her ear.

But of this ardent longing Carola, of course, knew nothing. She was wedded to her duties, and her heart was with the sick and suffering to whom she ministered. She had been a year in the hospital, but she had not kept account of the weeks and months. The seasons made but little difference in the landscape surrounding it, except in the length of the days and nights; yet she had not missed very much their pleasant changes. All her time was so much occupied, and her hands were so full of work, that she had no thought to give to other things. She had not taken the trouble to apply for her little income, for all her wants were supplied, and she had no leisure to spend upon herself.

For the first month she had worked as a servant merely, cooking, or scrubbing floors, or washing linen, as Sister Elizabeth ordered her. But before long she was employed as a nurse, and displayed so much ready tact, and patience, and trustworthiness, that she soon found herself on constant duty in the wards.

Next to teaching children this was a work she would have chosen for herself; yet now and then her spirit fainted a little within her, for she saw only the sorrow and suffering there is in life. It was a surgical hospital; and most of the patients who came in were working-men who had met with accidents in the pits or at the furnaces; and many a sad sight she had to witness without yielding to any outward expression of her natural tendencies. Yet before many months were over, if Sister Elizabeth could not be present at any operation, it was Carola, with her steady nerves, and strong, gentle touch, and watchful eye, whose help was called for, both by the surgeons and the patients.

The evening was the time Carola loved most, when the patients had had their supper, and the wards were quietly gliding into the stillness of night. She could then sing or read aloud to the poor sufferers, until some of them fell asleep, and the rest were soothed into patient endurance of their pains. She was pacing to and fro one night carrying in her arms a little child who had been badly burned, when Sister Elizabeth softly opened the door. The lights had been turned low, and the fire was a heap of glowing embers only, and Carola was passing slowly down the ward, followed by the peaceful and wistful eyes of the patients lying on the beds—for she was singing in a low, clear tone, and they joined their feeble and quivering voices with hers. She had sung the same verse two or three times—

"But none of the ransomed ever knew

How deep were the waters crossed;

Nor how dark was the night that the Lord passed through

Ere He found His sheep that was lost.

Out in the desert He heard its cry,

Sick and helpless, and ready to die."

"It will be a hard thing for the men to spare her, even for a few days," thought Sister Elizabeth. But she called Carola away, and sent in the night-nurse. A telegram had come from a friend of hers, a doctor in a country-place forty miles away, begging her to send him the best nurse she had by the next train. There was not much time for preparation, and Carola had to hasten.

It was a small and lonely station, lit up by a flickering oil lamp, and the train only dropped a slip coach there as it whirled on through the night. There was no one on the platform but the station-master and the doctor, who was waiting anxiously for her arrival, and who hurried her into his carriage and ordered his coachman to go on as quickly as he could. It was a drive of more than an hour, during which the doctor was reading by the light of a carriage-lamp; and it was not until they passed through some lodge-gates that he addressed her.

"Are you used to the sight of frightful accidents?" he asked.

"We have had ones at Netherton Hospital, sir," she answered.

"I want a nurse who will be obedient and watchful," he went on; "this patient of mine was shot yesterday—accidentally, of course—and it will depend upon you as much as upon me whether we can pull him through. I suppose Sister Elizabeth has confidence in you."

"I have been with her since last September," Carola replied. "I will be obedient and watchful. I think you may trust in me, sir."

"Good!" he said, turning again to his book, until they reached the door of a hall, in which a single light was burning. Carola followed the doctor through long and silent passages to a room but dimly lighted. A woman, who was evidently only a housekeeper, welcomed her appearance warmly, and led her to the side of the bed on which the patient was lying.

It was a long and anxious night. The doctor lay down in the adjoining room, ready to be called at a moment's notice; and the housekeeper soon fell asleep in an easy-chair. But it was Carola's duty to sit beside the bed, with her eyes fastened on the half-concealed face of the stranger, possibly passing away into death.

It was the first time she had been called away from her tranquil home in the hospital, and she was excited. There was no fear of any drowsiness coming over her; this one thing she had to do: to see that no change took place in the patient she was watching, that he made no movement which might disturb the bandages about his head.

This great and silent house in which she was must be somewhere in the very heart of the country, for they had passed through no town, and only one small village on their way to it. She knew nothing; not even the name of this apparently dying man, whose life seemed to hang upon her watchfulness and care. The room was large, and lofty, and handsomely furnished; he must be a rich man, but there was not a friend or relative near him. There was no face looking in, silently and anxiously, from time to time, as if any one cared whether he lived or died.

The dawning of the day was scarcely perceptible through the thick curtains; and it was broad sunlight before the doctor set her free from her post, and bade her get the rest she needed before being called upon to watch again. The housekeeper led her to a room near at hand, and as soon as she was left alone, Carola drew aside the curtain to look out on the freshness of the early morning.

But what familiar landscape was this that stretched far and wide before her? Was she back in her little cottage at Hazelmount? For there lay the great plain sloping up to the distant horizon, with its clusters of trees all touched with autumn tints; and its yellow corn-fields ripe for the harvest, as they were three years ago. Three years ago? Nay, three centuries of years. Could this indeed be Hazelmount? She opened the window, and leaning through, looked across the hazy park. Yonder was the path leading across it to the school-house; and there was the school-house itself, and the empty rick-yard behind it, and beyond that the ivy-clad gable of the Grange. Yes; she had been brought back to Hazelmount.

All that lost and happy past rushed back upon her like a flood. Oh! how she had loved them all! What a real home she had found there! She saw, as if a flash of lightning glanced across the future, that the hospital could never be as full and true a home, with the patients dwelling only a little while under her care, and then making way in endless succession to fresh cases. Her heart yearned toward the peaceful little village with the longing of home-sickness. Yet they must not discover that she was here, so near to them; for now she knew a little more of the world, she felt that they had acted according to its dictates in considering her unworthy of a place in their midst.

This house, then, must be Hazelmount Hall, which had been closed for years; and probably there would be no one in it who would recognize her in her nurse's cap and uniform. But it would not be right to quit her post because there was the risk of being known. Sister Elizabeth confided the most dangerous cases to her care; and this stranger was committed to her charge as a trained nurse. Ought she to leave him because she was afraid of meeting again those who had despised and rejected her?

Carola shed a few tears, very sorrowful ones. But tears were a luxury not permitted in the narrow path of duty. It was right now that she should sleep, and recruit the strength she had devoted to the service of the feeble. She whispered to herself the Lord's Prayer, for these were the very words her Lord had bidden her to say; and when she was too weary or too troubled to utter any other, she could remember them.

It was evening when she resumed her post at Captain Bentley's side. There was still danger, but it was less imminent, and the doctor told her she might allow him to talk a little if he seemed inclined. For some hours she sat reading beside a shaded lamp, glancing often at her patient, with her ear intent for any stir or whisper. Toward midnight he made an effort to move, and she was beside him instantly.

"Is the danger past?" he whispered.

"Almost," she answered; "you have only to keep quiet, and trust in me. The doctor is still in the house; and if there is any need I will call him."

"Shall I be blind?" he asked.

"We cannot tell yet," she replied, "but I have seen many men far worse injured than you get well, and go to work again. You might have been killed on the spot; and now the danger is nearly over."

"I'd almost sooner have died than be maimed and blind," he said; "and yet, perhaps, it is better to be a live dog than a dead lion, as they say. Is that true?"

"I don't know," she replied, "but for myself I know that if I live, I live unto the Lord; and if I die, I die unto the Lord; living or dying I am the Lord's."

There was a ring of gladness in her voice which made it pleasant to his ear, but her words sounded to him almost like a foreign language. He lay quite still after the effort of speaking; but he was conscious that she did not move away, that she stood near him ready to perform any service; and there was a feeling of security in being thus carefully watched. If anything went wrong this quiet, silvery-tongued nurse would see it at once. His brain was clear now, and he could recall his accident and all that passed before it.

But was it an accident? There was enough hatred of him, hatred kindled altogether by himself, to make it not impossible that he had been shot at. He thought of the families about to quit their homes and emigrate to strange lands, who felt that it was he who was driving them away. He had been a hard, selfish, and tyrannical landlord; and no wonder if one of them had shot him from behind a hedge.

"Do you know how it happened?" he inquired, after so long a pause that Carola thought he had fallen asleep again.

"You were out shooting in the Long Copple," she answered, speaking very deliberately, "and you were crushing through the underwood with your gun loaded, and a branch caught the trigger. There was no one with you but Tudor, the gamekeeper."

"Do you think anybody out of Hazelmount would do it?" he asked.

"Oh, no, no! that is impossible," she answered.

"They hate me," he muttered.

"Why?" asked Carola.

"I've turned the Arnolds out of their old farm," he said, in troubled accents, "and half the villagers are leaving with them. Young Arnold is gone to America to buy a place there. Oh, they hate me bitterly enough."

Carola listened with passionate astonishment. The Arnolds leaving the Grange; the place which seemed as if it belonged to them by right! What right could this stranger have, a man unknown to all of them, to drive them away from the home that had belonged to them from time immemorial? Oh, the pain and the heart-breaking misery of it! And she could do nothing. For first always in the movements of her eager heart came the instinct of helping; and if that was unsatisfied, as it must be now, her own pain was great. She would need no book to keep her awake to-night; her brain was too full of thoughts for reading.

CHRISTIAN PROGRESS.

S. S. Lesson for June 21, 2d Pet. 1:1-11. Golden Text, 3:18. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Faith Obtained—The Needed Multiplication of Grace—God's Stupendous Grant—Things Pertaining to Life—How the Claim Becomes Valid—The Divine Superseding the Human—Adding by Faith—How to Make Election Sure—A Young Wife's Mistake.

PETER styles himself "a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ," putting the service before the office. He writes "to them that have obtained a like precious faith with us in the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ" (R.V.).

OBTAINED FAITH!

Yes; it is not indigenous in human nature; "the faith of God" (Mark 11:22, margin), "the faith of the Son of God" (Gal. 2:20), "faith, in the same Spirit" (1 Cor. 12:9), is not human but divine; not inbred, but "obtained." Divine faith can take in divine things; it sees from God's side, and divine faith is ours now as we claim it in Christ Jesus.

"In most of the Epistles we find in the very opening the salutation, "Grace be unto you," or "Grace to you and peace be multiplied." The apostles never presupposed that their converts had so much of the grace of God that they needed no more. As we come to know God better, we see how, from beginning to end, our redemption, salvation, sanctification, and healing are all of grace. How our work for God, how our family and social life—so far as we live unto God—is all of grace. To grow in grace and in the knowledge of Christ is one and the same thing. As we know Him we trust Him, and He answers to our faith.

"Seeing that His divine power hath granted unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness through the knowledge of Him which hath called us by His own glory and virtue" (R.V.). A government sometimes gives a grant of land or a grant of money. God gives a grant so magnificent, so stupendous, that its very vastness stuns us, and we do not take it really in.

GOD'S GRANT

is "all things that pertain to life and godliness," and it is given to them that have obtained from Him like precious faith with Peter. What are the things that pertain to life? A stream of life sets out from the Godhead toward man; it is part of God's grant, it touches soul and body. Our only trustee is Jesus. "In Him was life" (John 1:4). "He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life" (1 John 5:12). The very "fulness of God" is in the grant (Eph. 3:19), the life of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost. But these are things which pertain unto life. Faith pertains unto it; this, too, is in the grant (Eph. 2:3). Abiding in Christ pertains to life, for "If a man abide not in Me, he is cast forth as a branch" (John 15:6). Again, life needs sustenance. "As the living Father hath sent Me, and I live by the Father; so he that eateth Me, even he shall live by Me" (John 6:57). Jesus has given His flesh for the life of the world, and all which pertains to godliness is in the grant of God. Christ our Sanctification is in the grant; the Holy Spirit is in the grant to show us the things of Christ, and make real to us all Christ is.

But there is one way only by which our claim to God's grant is valid. It is "by the knowledge of Him that called us by His own glory and virtue" (R.V.). It is not by knowing about Him, but by knowing Him that we come into the possession of the grant. Many believers will do anything sooner than come face to face with God. They will read, attend meetings, discuss, get people to pray with them; but there is one thing they always fight shy of, and this is just what they most need—real face to face intercourse with God. The knowledge of God, the close acquaintance with Him which He longs for, this gives assurance in claiming the grant of all things which pertain to life and godliness. "I have tried and striven; I have prayed and read about holiness, and I cannot get the blessing," said a lady one day. "But," said a child of God to her, "you have not yielded your whole self over to the Lord, and quite let yourself go into His hands, to work in you all His will, counting joyfully upon Him to do it, so that you can rest about it, and praise Him." As we know Him it becomes so natural to trust Him that His Word becomes to us the surest thing in the whole creation.

"Whereby He hath granted unto us His precious and exceeding great promises, that through these ye may become partakers of the divine nature, having escaped from the corruption that is in the world by lust" (R.V.). What pertains to life and godliness? The divine nature! Can we not afford to set aside all hope of anything in our own nature when God will supersede it with His? "In me," says Paul—that is, in my flesh, my self, my human nature—"dwelleth no good thing" (Rom. 7:18). Nothing can be done to improve our human nature so that there shall be anything good in us, of which we can take the credit. But God by His exceeding great and precious promises, makes us partakers with the divine. Instead of improving us, He comes in to dwell, and brings His own divine perfection with Him. Thus Paul does not say, "To me to live is improvement or progress," but "to me to live is Christ." Paul was not improved, but crucified with Christ, and Christ lived in him, loved through him, spoke through him, made intercession through him. Paul never said that he thought he was getting on, and that he felt more holy; Paul was superseded by another, and that other was Christ. We are made partakers of the divine nature having escaped from the corruption which is in the world by lust" (R.V.). This word "lust" (epithumia in the Greek) means our own strong will or desires. The very centre of self is in the will. When we will ourselves away to God, and believe that He takes possession of us, then His will takes the place of ours, and we wonder to find it always, even in the most trying circumstances, good, and acceptable, and perfect. All that is of our human will tends to death and corruption, because eternal life is not in it.

"Yea, and for this very cause, adding on your part all diligence, in your faith supply [or add] virtue" (R.V.). Just because God makes us partakers of the divine nature, we may claim and obtain by faith all that is divine. By no effort or struggle can we supply or add to ourselves any grace or virtue; but in our faith, "the faith of the Son of God," we can claim that Christ in us shall exhibit "virtue," that Christ in us shall be our "knowledge," so that we do not need to search our own intelligence in vain for the comprehension of that which is divine, but accept it from Him who dwells within. And so with "temperance" or self-control. Oh, how many are constantly in bondage through unbribe appetites, plunged into an excess of remorse, hating themselves, yet powerless to escape! Thank God, if we give all diligence to Him who dwells within, we can claim and have Him as our "temperance." He who holds the spheres can control men's passions. And so with "patience." A strong, energetic nature is apt to champ and fret at all which impedes its projects. We can no more change impatience into patience than an Ethiopian can change his skin or a leopard his spots. But Christ in us can be our "patience" as He is our Sanctification, for the greater includes the less. And so with "godliness," "brotherly love," and "love." Reckon on Christ, dear reader, for all these blessed fruits of the Spirit. The rendering of the Revised Version here is very helpful "in your faith supply," etc. Faith expects nothing from itself, it always looks away from self to another. If we could flatter ourselves that by some effort or goodness of our own we had grown out of one virtue into another, instead of adding in faith the graces which are in Christ within us, the glory would be ours, not His. And, moreover, we should be under the delusion that self was not altogether bad.

"For if those things are yours and abound, they make you to be not idle nor unfruitful unto the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. For he that lacketh these things is blind, seeing only what is near, having forgotten the cleansing from his old sins." Having Jesus as an indwelling Saviour, revealed by the Holy Ghost who makes us His temple, we are not left in ignorance as to the lack of godliness in us. And God makes us responsible to accept by faith all that Christ is. Those who live in the light of the blessed cleansing from sin become sensitive to all lack of Christ. "Wherefore, brethren, give the more diligence to make your calling and election sure, for if ye do these things ye shall never stumble" (R.V.). What is our calling and election? God hath called us unto holiness (1 Thess. 4:7), unto the fellowship of His Son" (1 Cor. 1:9), "unto peace" (1 Cor. 7:15), "according to His purpose." How, then, can we make sure of our calling? By entering upon the possession of God's great and precious promises by faith obtained from Him, and thus becoming and recognizing that we do become "partakers of the divine nature." Christ is the end of the law for righteousness unto every one that believeth, and He is the end of the Gospel for holiness also. It is truly by being occupied with Christ that we are kept from stumbling. A young wife, recently converted, began to think about herself, and watch her feelings. She listened to the accusations of Satan, who said to her, "You see, you don't feel that love to God which you ought to have, and you don't love prayer as you ought, and your first feelings don't last." For nearly a whole day she was miserable. Then she went to her husband and told him all her misery. "What were you thinking about when you were so full of happiness?" he asked. "Why, I was thinking about the Lord Jesus and His love." "Well, think about Him now." She did so, and He stilled the accusations of Satan. A child grows unconsciously, and all real growth in grace is an unconscious but sure slipping out of ourselves into Him. Growth can only come from life, and Jesus is our life. It is not our faith in Him or love for Him which is our life; it is not even His work in us; He Himself is our life. He, taking increasingly the place of self, is our growth. He is our Keeper from stumbling. He who calls upon us in our faith to supply or exhibit the virtues of Christ also says to us, "For thus shall be richly supplied unto you the entrance into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled "Forty Command Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, #310 of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

WEARINESS AND WAITING.

Wait on the Lord: be of good courage and he shall strengthen thine heart.—Psalm xxviii, 14.
The Lord is not slack concerning His promise.—2 Peter iii, 9.

I am weary of working and waiting—
Waiting and watching alone—
For the shadows to clear and brighten,
For the dawn of the endless day.

Sometimes the pain is so heavy,
And the burden so hard to bear,
That it even seems as if nothing
Could lighten the load of care.

I can preach to another's sorrow,
And another's burden I share,
Why, then, is the cross I must carry
So very hard to bear?

But even, as now in my trouble,
I trace these thoughts of my heart,
I can hear the voice of my Saviour—
At His words the quick tears start.

"Child"—only sorrowful accents,
And no reproach in his tone,
Though I know my faithless murmurs
And my hardened heart of stone!

"There is no cross nor burden,
Whatever it seem to be,
That will adden, or tire, or distress thee,
If thou wilt but share it with Me.

"Mourn not that the shadows deepen,
Wish not yet for the Endless Day,
From behind the clouds come the rainbow—
Do thou My Will always!"

"I cry, I will wait always on Thee!"
I lord with repentant tears,
Remembering ever Thy blessed Word—
One day as a thousand years.

"And the Lord is not slack with His promise."
Oh teach me with patience to see,
That the day of reward is not distant
When the captive of sin shall be free!

THE portrait of Mr. A. T. Stewart, and the picture of the new Cathedral of the Incarnation, at Garden City, L. I., which Mrs. Stewart has erected in memory of her husband, and which was consecrated on June 2d, are published this week in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in recognition of the fact that the gift of the magnificent edifice and the ceremonies attending its opening have recalled public attention in some degree to the remarkable man whose memory is thus splendidly embalmed. The world easily forgets men when they are dead, however large and important is the place they occupied during life. This is especially so in the case of such men as Mr. A. T. Stewart, whose place was in the business world, where competition is fierce, and where the survivors are rivals eager to occupy the place which death has made vacant. When death seizes a great statesman, his country has often reason, for many years, to lament his loss, as it sees no one with sufficient ability to serve it as he could. The philanthropist, too, lives in the memory of those who benefit by the institutions he founded. But the man of wealth dies, and men witness his departure with grim equanimity, not unfrequently mixed with a spiteful satisfaction that the man whom they envied is at last as poor as his fellows, and that even he, with all his millions, could not buy another hour of life. His place is filled, and he is forgotten. But loving hands have taken care that the memory of this man shall live, by identifying with his name a temple for the worship of God, the splendor of which attests the affection in which he was held, and respect for the cause to which it is consecrated.

BIRTH AND EDUCATION.

Alexander Turney Stewart was born December 12th, 1803, in a suburb of Lisburn, an extensive manufacturing town about six miles from Belfast, Ireland. His father was a farmer, respected in his neighborhood, but not wealthy. Both his parents were Irish, but their ancestors were Scottish. It is worthy of remark, incidentally, how many men who have attained eminence in various departments of life have sprung from the union of those two nationalities, each of which seems to contribute to the mental makeup valuable qualities which counterbalance each other. While he was still a boy A. T. Stewart lost his father, and his mother married again; he was adopted by his maternal grandfather, John Turney, who conceived a strong attachment for the boy. He hoped to have heard him preach from a Protestant Episcopal pulpit, and with that object sent him to a good school, and afterward to the Royal College of Belfast. The boy was studious, and passed his earlier examinations with honors, but before he had completed his college course his grandfather died, and he abandoned the idea of becoming a clergyman.

EMIGRATES TO AMERICA.

A Quaker gentleman had, at the grandfather's request, consented to look after the boy, and when he graduated from college and announced his desire to go to America, the shrewd Quaker gave his approval. Armed with letters of introduction to several Quaker gentlemen, young Stewart landed at the Battery, New York, in 1821. He had some little money in his pocket, and the knowledge that when he came of age, in 1824, he would receive $3500 more, as a legacy from his grandfather. He obtained, through the influence of his Quaker friends, a position as assistant teacher in a public school situated on the corner of Pearl and Roosevelt streets, where he taught for some time, having among his pupils Hamilton Fish, afterward Secretary of State, and Fletcher Harper, of the firm of Harper & Brothers.

COMMENCEMENT OF BUSINESS.

While still teaching school Mr. Stewart assisted with capital a young friend, who was about to open a small dry-goods store. Some unforeseen difficulty occurred, and the young man was prevented going into business, whereupon Mr. Stewart, believing that there was an opening that would suit him, determined to open the store himself. He was utterly unacquainted with the trade, but had plenty of shrewdness and business sagacity. He noticed that fashionable ladies were wearing dresses trimmed with a kind of needlework which was expensive here, but was cheap enough in Ireland, especially near Belfast, where he had seen the cottagers make it. He immediately went back to Ireland, informed his guardian of his intentions, and receiving his assistance bought largely of the dress-trimming. He returned to New York and found that if he sold it at ten times the price he had given for it he would still be below market rates.

A MODEST ADVERTISEMENT.

In the New York Daily Advertiser of September 2d, 1825, announced that A. T. Stewart offered for sale "a general assortment of fresh and seasonable dry goods" at No. 283 Broadway. He had rented one half of a store, with a frontage of twenty-five feet, in the building occupied by the Washington Hotel.

His first customer was a personal friend, who had promised to buy from him the first parcel he sold. She spent $200 there and "wished him luck." Many years after, when Stewart was a millionaire, he heard that the same lady was in poverty owing to the misconduct of her husband. He sought her out and settled an annuity upon her sufficient to enable her to spend the rest of her life in comfort.

The young dry-goods merchant, in spite of his inexperience, was very successful, and in 1826 he removed to a larger store at No. 262 Broadway. In that year, encouraged by his business success, Mr. Stewart proposed to a young lady to whom he was attached. She was the daughter of a flourishing ship chandler, and might well have hesitated before accepting a young man who had still his own way to make. But it may be supposed that Miss Cornelia Clinch had faith in her suitor, for she accepted him and they were married. Before many years had passed, her husband spent a million dollars in building the finest marble mansion in New York, saying that it was "a little attention to Mrs. Stewart," and she has now expended two millions in the cathedral in his memory.

Mr. Stewart remained in his new store only a short time, soon transferring his stock to No. 257 Broadway. There his business increased wonderfully, and his tireless energy and commercial sagacity put him in a few years at the head of the dry-goods trade of the country. In 1848 he had accumulated so much capital that he was enabled to build the large marble store at Broadway and Chambers Street, on the site of the old Washington Hotel, in which his first little store had been situated.

The new store was a tremendous success. He began to be called the "Merchant Prince," and his business increased every year. Fourteen years later, however, his business had outgrown even those spacious quarters. He resolved to anticipate the up-town move by buying part of the old Randall Farm, bounded by Ninth and Tenth streets, Broadway and Fourth Avenue. On these lots he erected the six-story building which was the scene of his retail trade until his death, the old store at Broadway and Chambers Street being reserved for the wholesale department. The new store and the land on which it was built cost nearly three million dollars. His income continued to increase until, in 1864, he reckoned it at four millions a year.

The business of the firm was world-wide. There was a foreign bureau at Manchester, England, where all English goods were collected, examined, packed, and shipped to this city. At Belfast, Ireland, the firm had a factory where linens were bleached. At Glasgow there was another bureau for the collection and shipment of Scotch goods. In a magazin at Paris were collected French, German, and East India goods. There were a woollen house at Berlin and silk warehouses at Lyons. The continental business was centred in the Paris Bureau, and the payments were made there. There were mills in Europe engaged in manufacturing for the house of A. T. Stewart & Co. alone, and these were rivalled by others in this country. There was a small army of buyers and agents who were constantly travelling from Paris to Hong Kong, from Tibet to Peru. The mill on this side the Atlantic included the Mohaw and Elbef Mills, at Little Falls, N. Y.; the New York Mills, at Holyoke, Mass.; the Woodwa Mills, at Woodstock, Conn., and the Yantic Mills, at Yantic, N. J.

When General Grant was elected President nominated Mr. Stewart Secretary of the Treasury, but it was found that Mr. Stewart's business as an importer was an insuperable bar to his appointment, importers being expressly made ineligible by a law passed in 1742.

Mr. Stewart's unexampled success was largely due to his firm adherence to his two

BUSINESS MAXIMS.

"one price and strict integrity." He became an excellent judge of the value of goods, and knew exactly what might be said in their favor. That line he never passed himself, nor allowed his employes to pass. The goods sold were precisely what they were represented to be, and no domestic article was represented as imported. No faulty article was warranted perfect in store, even if such representation would effect sale. Every customer found that he was safe "dealing at Stewart's." No advantage was taken of his ignorance or his station. The judge of values could get no reduction from prices marked, and the richest and most careless buyer was not overcharged. Mr. Stewart won the confidence of the public, and the business was easy. On his own side he had immense business sagacity. No man could so accurately foresee a change in prices. In the midst of prosperity he was the first to recognize the signs of an approaching financial storm, and was quick to see the earliest indications of a rise in value. He always bought for cash and so was able to buy at the best advantage. When he died, April 10th, 1876, the little capital of $3500 which he started in business had grown to a sum variously estimated, but certainly exceeding fifty millions, and by some good judges believed to amount to one hundred millions. All this he bequeathed unconditionally to his widow, with the exception of legacies to his employes—thousand dollars to each of those who had labored with him twenty years, and five hundred dollars to each of those who had been with him years—and one million to Judge Hilton.

CHARITABLE GIFTS.

Mr. Stewart had not the character of a philanthropist. Though he was childless, his children having died in infancy, he seemed much engrossed in adding million to million to think of any other subject. He invested money so as to bring in a good return, and turned out a public benefit too, so much better. The scheme of an hotel for working women was one of those enterprises, but he did not pay—and philanthropic work seldom does pay financially—it was abandoned as an ordinary hotel. Yet Mr. Stewart's plan could be touched sometimes. After the fire in Chicago, when the country was throbbing with sympathy by the sudden and appalling disaster, Mr. Stewart gave $50,000 to the fund. In 1846, when Ireland was stricken with famine, he chartered a ship, freighted it with provisions, and sent it to Belfast. The cargo distributed the provisions, and by Mr. Stewart's orders brought back as many young men as the ship would hold, who, when landed in New York, found situations where for them either under Mr. Stewart himself or the employ of his friends, whom he had interested on their behalf. Again, in 1871, a conclusion of the Franco-German war, the distressed citizens of Havre saw a ship laden with thirty-eight hundred barrels of flour steam into their harbor as the gift of A. T. Stewart. Of course there were not wanting cynical persons who called these magnificent gifts shrewd advertisements, but the gifts were facts, and the motives may be left to the Judge who alone can be cognizant of the impulses of the heart.

A mystery which the public has not solved is connected with the present resting-place of the millionaire's body. It was surreptitiously taken, in 1878, from the temporary grave in St. Mark's Churchyard, where it was placed after his death in 1876, to await removal to the cathedral in Garden City. Rumors of various kinds have been current since then of its recovery by the family, but they have not been confirmed. One report has it that the body was not stolen, but removed and buried in a secret place by Judge Hilton's orders, to prevent its being stolen. The actual facts, however, are still in dispute.

THE CATHEDRAL.

On the first page of this number is a picture of the magnificent edifice called the Cathedral of the Incarnation, which Mrs. Stewart has reared as a memorial of her departed husband. For that picture and for the materials for the following description of the building we are indebted to our esteemed contemporary the Churchman.

The cathedral grounds will one day upon them, besides the cathedral itself, a chapter house connected with it by a covered cloister of one hundred feet, paved with marble, the see house (already built), St. Paul's School (already built), a half mile north-west of the cathedral, St. Mary's School a half mile in the opposite direction, the Divinity School between St. Paul's School and the cathedral, and all necessary out-buildings. The cathedral can be seen from a great distance on the plains, its graceful spire and its fine proportions rendering it a striking object in the landscape. Its architect is Mr. H. G. Harrison, of this city, and as a whole, and in its details, he may well be proud of his work.

The style of the edifice is floriated Gothic, which admits of profuse ornamentation, and, in this respect, nothing has been spared. The walls everywhere show exquisite tracery, sculpture, and carvings. Every pinnacle of the aisle wall and clerestory is flanked with gargoyles, every gable is copiously crocketed, the offsets are intricately modelled, and the capitals are carved in natural foliage. Not less than sixty miniature spires rise from different parts of the building, and it fairly bristles with points. The length of the cathedral is 188 feet, the transepts being 65 feet and the nave 60 feet, while the height from the foundation to the apex of the nave is 53 feet. The spire rises 137 feet above the nave, making its whole height 210.6 feet. The main entrance is through the tower, and has a width of 30 feet, and is guarded by massive doors of oak six inches thick.

Attached to the transept is a baptistery, but under a separate roof. It is in shape octagonal, 14.6 feet deep and 26 feet high, with a groined ceiling which is of perfect beauty. On the one side of the baptistery is a niche containing a marble statue of "Hope," six feet in height, and on the other side one of "Religion," of the same proportions. The font, exquisite in design, and beautifully carved with winged figures, appropriate symbols and inscription, is of pure white marble, surmounted with a cap of perforated mahogany, exceedingly rich. The chancel, divided into choir and sacrament, opens from the nave by a spacious arch, is apsidal in form, and is lighted by thirteen windows. It is very spacious, the choir measuring 21.9 feet by 48 feet, and the sacrament 21.9 feet by 32 feet, including the apse.

The altar is of pure Italian marble, white and without spot, and no description can convey any adequate idea of its sculptured beauty, and he same may be said of the ornate bishop's chair and the deep sedilia. All the appointments of the chancel are in harmony with its object and with the rest of the sacred edifice, and its floor, like those of the nave and transepts, is of polished marble; it is a wonder of symmetrical beauty.

Beneath the chancel and choir are the crypt and mortuary chapel, the former intended to be the last resting-place of Alexander T. Stewart and family. Here everything is of the noblest material; imported marbles, Irish, Scotch, English, and Italian, and labor, time, and money have been bestowed upon them without stint. The form of the crypt is apsidal, being a polygon of fourteen sides, with a diameter of 21.9 feet, and a height of 18 feet, and seven of the sides are continuations downward of the faces of the apse, while all of the faces are bays, two of them being left open for access. The walls, cells, and ribs of the vaulting are polished white marble, the junction of the ribs being marked by fine pendants carved in flowers and leafage.

The fine chime of bells are those that attracted so much attention at the Centennial in Philadelphia.

The See House is on a lot south of the cathedral, and, like it, is built without regard to cost. The plan was studied long to adapt it to its purpose, and its five-and-thirty rooms are admirably arranged. It is in some sort a bishop's palace, though it was planned for work as well as pleasure, and for the dispensation of such generous hospitality as becomes the episcopal office. It is heated by steam conducted from without, as are also the cathedral and St. Paul's School. It is admirable in all its parts, and in design and execution the work has been thoroughly done.

St. Paul's School for Boys is four stories in height, and has a frontage of 280 feet, with three wings, each 170 feet deep, and is calculated for 500 pupils. Nothing is wanting to it that could make such a school a success, or promote the interest and happiness of the scholars. A mile away some day will rise the walls of St. Mary's School for girls already in operation, and the Divinity School hard by.

THE CONSECRATION.

ON Tuesday, June 24, the cathedral was consecrated. The magnificent building was crowded by a large assembly, among which were one thousand clergymen from all parts of the State, and from New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, who had received special invitations from the munificent donor.

Shortly after ten o'clock the booming of cannon and the ringing of the bells in the cathedral spire ceased, and the procession of the bishops and the clergy started from the crypt, through the cloister and around the cathedral, singing the Processional Hymn, "Christ is made the sure foundation." Bishop Littlejohn then read the Twenty-fourth Psalm. The bishop then passed within the chancel and Mrs. Stewart rose, and taking the arm of Judge Hilton, advanced to the bishop's chair, and with her own hand presented him with the deed of the property, which, for $1, to be paid, conveyed to the church through him, the edifice and grounds on which $2,000,000 had been spent. Judge Hilton read the form of presentation. With the deed was a bond providing for an annual endowment from the estate of $15,000, to be applied to the maintenance of the cathedral. The bishop's acceptance of the gift was then read, and Assistant-Bishop Potter, of New York, preached the consecration sermon. In the course of it he said:

"It is impossible to come here for this service without being sensible that to many minds in our generation and especially in this our own land, both the service itself and the structure which is the occasion for it are equally an extravagance and an anachronism. We look back from our higher civilization to other and earlier ages which reared such buildings as this, and remember how much these ages lacked. The age of the great cathedrals, we are wont to say, was, if you choose, an age of great devotion, but it was also an age of great and widespread ignorance. The spirit that built Durham and Milan, Canterbury and Seville, Lincoln, Rouen, was an age certainly of splendid gifts and of matchless labors, but it was also an age of superstition even among the most learned, and of semi-barbarism among the common people. We may cordially admire the enthusiasm of those earlier days and the stately structures through which it found expression. But it is quite consistent with such admiration that we should recognize that since then fresh light has dawned on the world, and that a larger wisdom wait to guide our hearts and gifts to-day.

"There are new problems that confront us in America at this hour, and the building of cathedrals will not help to solve them. There are new tasks waiting for the Church of God in this land, and stately and splendid ecclesiastical architecture is not the agency to achieve them.

"This is a practical age, and its evils await a direct and practical solution. We want the college; we want the hospital; we want the reformatory; we want the crèche and the orphanage, the trades school and the trained nurse, the hygienic lecturer and the free library, the school of arts and the refuge of the aged, and we do want the cathedral.

"Yes, dear brethren, we want all these things and a great many others for which they stand. But I venture to submit that we want a great deal more than we want any or all of them, the spirit that inspires and originates them. We may disparage Christianity as we will, but the helpful and humane activities of Christendom are explicable by no other key. The hands that have reached down to snatch the perishing from the jaws of death and give them back to life again have been Christian hands. The feet that have run swift and soonest on all helpful and healing errands have been Christian feet. The eyes that have seen the deepest into all our sin and perplexing social problems have been Christian eyes, and the lips that have spoken the most quickening and consoling words, when all other lips were dumb, have been those of Christian men and Christian women.

"I do not say that these things have not come to pass in other sanctuaries humbler and less costly than a cathedral, but I do say that this is the office of the sanctuary in our human life, and I maintain that that structure which stands for influences so potent and so supreme cannot be too stately, too spacious or imperial, and most surely cannot be an anachronism in any age or in any land.

"The wise and far-sighted founder of this fair city in the fields might easily, had he taken counsel of that utilitarian spirit which rules the age, have dedicated this site to another and very different use. He might have built a factory, or he might have reared here a hospital or an inn, or a music hall. And if he had, and if he had spent millions upon some such undertaking and blazoned it all over with his own name, who does not know how the air would have rung with his praises as a wise, shrewd, hard-headed, practical, common-sense man? But he set about instead to rear a house of God; and other hands, bound to him by the closest and most sacred ties, have taken up his work and carried it on to its noble completion.

"We congratulate those whose work and gift this is, and bless God that He put it into their hearts to make it. We remember with grateful appreciation that this princely benefaction comes to-day from her hand who lays it upon God's altar unfettered by halting conditions and unspoiled by unworthy reserve. And we remember, too, with equally cordial appreciation, the wisdom and energy that have guided this work in its progress and brought it to its successful conclusion.

"Fair is the house which art has reared amid this rural loveliness. May His abiding presence make it fairer still. May weary souls, wakened out of their sleep of sin, learn to cry out with Jacob, when he came to Bethel: 'This is none other but the house of God; this is the gate of heaven.'"

THE BANISHED QUEEN.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.*

"Also Vashti the queen made a feast for the women in the royal house which belonged to King Ahasuerus. On the seventh day, when the heart of the king was merry with wine, he commanded Methuman, Biztha, Harbona, Bigtha, and Abagtha, Zethar, and Carcas, the seven chamberlains that served in the presence of Ahasuerus the King, to bring Vashti the queen before the king with the crown royal, to show the people and the princes her beauty: for she was fair to look on. But the queen Vashti refused to come at the king's commandment by his chamberlains: therefore was the king very wroth, and his anger burned in him."—ESTHER I : 9-12.

We stand amid the palaces of Shushan. The pinnacles are aflame with the morning light. The columns rise festooned and wreathed, the wealth of empires flashing from the grooves; the ceilings adorned with images of bird and beast, and scenes of prowess and conquest. The walls are hung with shields, and emblazoned until it seems that the whole round of splendors is exhausted. Each arch is a mighty leaf of architectural achievement. Golden stars shining down on glowing arabesque. Hangings of embroidered work in which mingle the blueness of the sky, the greenness of the grass, and the whiteness of the sea-foam. Tapestries hung on silver rings, wedding together the pillars of marble. Pavilions reaching out in every direction. These for repose, filled with luxuriant couches, in which weary limbs sink until all fatigue is submerged. These for carousal, where kings drink down a kingdom at one swallow.

AMAZING SPECTACLE I.

Light of silver dripping down over stairs of ivory on shields of gold. Floors of stained marble, sunset red and night black, and inlaid with gleaming pearl.

In connection with this palace there is a garden, where the mighty men of foreign lands are seated at a banquet. Under the spread of oak and linden and acacia the tables are arranged. The breath of honeysuckle and frankincense fills the air. Fountains leap up into the light, the spray struck through with rainbows falling in crystal-line baptism upon flowering shrubs—then rolling down through channels of marble, and widening out here and there into pools swirling with the finny tribes of foreign aquariums, bordered with scarlet anemones, hypericums, and many-colored ranunculus.

Meats of rarest bird and beast smoking up amid wreaths of aromatics. The vases filled with apricots and almonds. The baskets piled up with apricots and figs and oranges and pomegranates. Melons tastefully twined with leaves of acacia. The bright waters of Euleus filling the urns and dripping outside the rim in flashing beads amid the traceries. Wine from the royal vats of Ispahan and Shiraz, in bottles of shaped shell, and tily-shaped cups of silver, and flagons and tankards of solid gold. The music rises higher, and the revelry breaks out into wilder transport, and the wine has flushed the cheek and touched the brain, and louder than all other voices are the hiccough of the inebriates, the gabble of fools, and the song of the drunkards.

THE KING'S SUMMONS.

In another part of the palace, Queen Vashti is entreating the princesses of Persia at a banquet. Drunken Ahasuerus says to his servants, "You go out and fetch Vashti from that banquet with the women, and bring her to this banquet with the men, and let me display her beauty." The servants immediately start to obey the king's command; but there was a rule in Oriental society that no woman might appear in public without having her face veiled. Yet here was a mandate that no one dare dispute, demanding that Vashti come in unveiled before the multitude. However, there was in Vashti's soul a principle more regal than Ahasuerus, more brilliant than the gold of Shushan, of more wealth than the realm of Persia, which commanded her to disobey this order of the king; and so all the righteousness and holiness and modesty of her nature rises up into one

SUBLIME REFUSAL.

She says, "I will not go into the banquet unveiled." Ahasuerus was infuriated; and Vashti, robbed of her position and her estate, is driven forth in poverty and ruin to suffer the scorn of a nation, and yet to receive the applause of after generations, who shall rise up to admire this martyr to kingly insolence. Well, the last vestige of that feast is gone; the last garland has faded; the last arch has fallen; the last tankard has been destroyed; and Shushan is a ruin; but as long as the world stands there will be multitudes of men and women, familiar with the Bible, who will come into this picture-gallery of God and admire the divine portrait of Vashti the queen, Vashti the veiled, Vashti the sacrifice, Vashti the silent.

I. In the first place, I want you to look upon VASHTI THE QUEEN.

A blue ribbon, rayed with white, drawn around her forehead, indicated her queenly position. It was no small honor to be queen in such a realm as that. Hark to the rustle of her robes! See the blaze of her jewels! And yet, my friends, it is not necessary to have palace and regal robe in order to be queenly. When I see a woman with stout faith in God, putting her foot upon all meanness and selfishness and godless display, going right forward to serve Christ and the race by a brave and a glorious service, I say: "That woman is a queen," and the ranks of heaven look over the battlements upon the coronation; and whether she come up from the shanty on the commons or the mansion of the fashionable square, I greet her with the shout, "All hail, Queen Vashti!"

UNCROWNED QUEENS.

What glory was there on the brow of Mary of Scotland, or Elizabeth of England, or Margaret of France, or Catherine of Russia, compared with the worth of some of our Christian mothers, many of them gone into glory?—or of that woman mentioned in the Scriptures, who put her all into the Lord's treasury?—or of Jephtha's daughter, who made a demonstration of unselfish patriotism?—or of Abigail, who rescued the herds and flocks of her husband?—or of Ruth, who toiled under a tropical sun for poor, old, helpless Naomi?—or of Florence Nightingale, who went at midnight to stanch the battle-wounds of the Crimea?—or of Mrs. Adoniram Judson, who kindled the lights of salvation amid the darkness of Burmah?—or of Mrs. Hemans, who poured out her holy soul in words which will forever be associated with hunter's horn, and captive's chain, and bridal hour, and lute's throb, and curlew's knell at the dying day?—and scores and hundreds of women, unknown on earth, who have given water to the thirsty, and bread to the hungry, and medicine to the sick, and smiles to the discouraged—their footsteps heard along dark lane and in government hospital, and in almshouse corridor and by prison gate? There may be no royal robe—there may be no palatial surroundings. She does not need them; for all charitable men will unite with the crackling lips of fever-struck hospital and plague-blotched lazaretto in greeting her as she passes: "Hail! Hail! Queen Vashti."

II. Again, I want you to consider

VASHTI THE VEILED.

Had she appeared before Ahasuerus and his court on that day with her face uncovered she would have shocked all the delicacies of Oriental society, and the very men who in their intoxication demanded that she come, in their sober moments would have despised her. As some flowers seem to thrive best in the dark lane and in the shadow, and where the sun does not seem to reach them, so God appoints to most womanly natures a retiring and unobtrusive spirit.

God once in a while does call an Isabella to a throne, or a Miriam to strike the timbrel at the front of a host, or a Marie Antoinette to quell a French mob, or a Deborah to stand at the front of an armed battalion, crying out, "Up! Up! This is the day in which the Lord will deliver Sisera into thy hands." And when women are called to such outdoor work and to such heroic positions, God prepares them for it; and they have iron in their soul, and lightnings in their eye, and whirlwinds in their breath, and the borrowed strength of the Lord Omnipotent in their right arm. They walk through furnaces as though they were hedges of wild-flowers, and cross seas as though they were shimmering sapphires; and all the harpies of hell down to their dungeon at the stamp of womanly indignation.

But these are the exceptions. Generally, Dorcas would rather make a garment for the poor boy; Rebecca would rather fill the trough for the camels; Hannah would rather make a coat for Samuel; the Hebrew maid would rather give a prescription for Naaman's leprosy; the woman of Sarepta would rather gather a few sticks to cook a meal for famished Elijah; Phoebe would rather carry a letter for the inspired apostle; mother Lois would rather educate Timothy in the Scriptures. When I see a woman going about her daily duty—with cheerful dignity presiding at the table, with kind and gentle, but firm discipline presiding in the nursery, going out into the world without any blast of trumpets, following in the footsteps of Him who went about doing good—I say: "This is Vashti with a veil on."

THE UNVEILED.

But when I see a woman of unblushing boldness, loud-voiced, with a tongue of infinite clatter-clatter, with arrogant look, passing through the streets with the step of a walking-beam, gayly arrayed into a very hurricane of millinery I cry out: "Vashti has lost her veil!" When I see a woman struggling for political preferment—trying to force her way on up to the ballot box amid the masculine demagogues who stand with swollen fists and bloodshot eyes and pestiferous breath, to guard the polls—wanting to go through the loafers and the defilement of popular sovereigns, who crawl up from the saloons greasy and foul and vermin-covered, to decide questions of justice and order and civilization—when I see a woman, I say, who want to press through all that horrible scum to get to the ballot-box, I say: "Ah, what a pity Vashti has lost her veil!"

When I see a woman of comely features, and of adroitness of intellect, and endowed with all that the schools can do for one, and of high social position, yet moving in society with superciliousness and hauteur, as though she would have people know their place, and an undefined combination of giggle and strut and rhodomontade, endowed with allopathic quantities of talk, but only homeopathic infinitesimals of sense, the terror of dry-goods clerks, a railroad conductors, discoverers of significant meanings in plain conversation, prodigies of badinage and innuendo—I say: "Vashti has lost her veil!"

III. Again, I want you this morning to consider

VASHTI THE SACRIFICE.

Who is this that I see coming out of that palatial gate of Shushan? It seems to me that I have seen her before. She comes homeless, houseless, friendless, trudging along with a broke heart. Who is she? It is Vashti the sacrifice! Oh! what a change it was from regal position to a wayfarer's crust. A little while ago, a proved and sought for; now, none so poor!

* Dr. Talmage did not preach at the Brooklyn Tabernacle last Sunday. This sermon, which he preached in 1896, has not been published before in this journal.

to acknowledge her acquaintanceship. Vashti the sacrifice!

Ah! you and I have seen it many a time. Here is a home empalaced with beauty. All that refinement and books and wealth can do for that home has been done; but Ahasuerus, the husband and the father, is taking hold on paths of sin. He is gradually going down. After awhile he will flounder and struggle like a wild beast in the hunter's net—further away from God, further away from the right. Soon the bright apparel of the children will turn to rags; soon the household song will become the sobbing of a broken heart.

THE OLD STORY

over again. Brutal Centaurs breaking up the marriage feast of Lapithe. The house full of outrage and cruelty and abomination, while trudging forth from the palace gate are Vashti and her children. There are homes represented in this house this morning that are in danger of such a breaking-up. Oh, Ahasuerus! that you should stand in a home, by a dissipated life destroying the peace and comfort of that home. God forbid that your children should ever have to wring their hands, and have people point their finger at them as they pass down the street, and say, "There goes a drunkard's child." God forbid that the little feet should ever have to trudge the path of poverty and wretchedness! God forbid that any evil spirit born of the wine-cup or the brandy-glass should come forth and uproot that garden, and with a lasting, blistering, all-consuming curse, shut forever the palace gate against Vashti and the children!

One night during the war I went to Hagerstown to look at the army, and I stood on a hill-top and looked down upon them. I saw the camp-fires all through the valleys and all over the hills. It was a weird spectacle, those camp-fires, and I stood and watched them; and the soldiers who were gathered around them were, no doubt, talking of their homes, and of the long march they had taken, and of the battles they were to fight; but after awhile I saw these camp-fires begin to lower; and they continued to lower, until they were all gone out, and the army slept. It was imposing when I saw the camp-fires; it was imposing in the darkness when I thought of that great host asleep. Well, God looks down from heaven, and He sees the firesides of Christendom and the loved ones gathered around these firesides. These are the camp-fires where we warm ourselves at the close of the day, and talk over the battles of life we have fought and the battles that are yet to come. God grant that when at last these fires begin to go out and continue to lower until finally they are extinguished, and the ashes of consumed hopes strew the hearth of the old homestead, it may be because we have "Gone to sleep that last long sleep,

From which none ever wake to weep."

Now we are an army on the march of life. Then we shall be an army bivouacked in the tent of the grave.

IV. Once more: I want you to look at VASHTI THE SILENT.

You do not hear any outcry from this woman as she goes forth from the palace gate. From the very dignity of her nature, you know there will be no vociferation. Sometimes in life it is necessary to make a retort; sometimes in life it is necessary to resist; but there are crises when the most triumphant thing to do is to keep silence. The philosopher, confident in his newly discovered principle, waited for the coming of more intelligent generations, willing that men should laugh at the lightning-rod and cotton-gin and steamboat—waiting for long years through the scoffing of philosophical schools, in grand and

MAGNIFICENT SILENCE.

Galileo, condemned by mathematicians and monks and cardinals, caricatured everywhere, yet waiting and watching with his telescope to see the coming up of stellar re-enforcements, when the stars in their courses would fight for the Copernican system; then sitting down in complete blindness and deafness to wait for the coming on of the generations who would build his monument and bow at his grave. The reformer, execrated by his contemporaries, fastened in a pillory, the slow fires of public contempt burning under him, ground under the cylinders of the printing-press, yet calmly waiting for the day when purity of soul and heroism of character will get the sanction of earth and the plaudits of heaven.

Affliction enduring without any complaint the sharpness of the pang, and the violence of the storm, and the heft of the chain, and the darkness of the night—waiting until a divine hand shall be put forth to soothe the pang, and hush the storm, and release the captive. A wife abused, persecuted, and a perpetual exile from every earthly comfort—waiting, waiting, until the Lord shall gather up His dear children in a heavenly home, and no poor Vashti will ever be thrust out from the palace gate.

DIVINE SILENCE.

Jesus, in silence and answering not a word, drinking the gall, bearing the cross, in prospect of the rapturous consummation when

"Angels thronged His chariot wheel,
And bore Him to his throne;
Then swept their golden harps and sung,
The glorious work is done."

Oh, woman! does not this story of Vashti the queen, Vashti the veiled, Vashti the sacrifice, Vashti the silent, move your soul? My sermon converges into the one absorbing hope that none of you may be shut out of the palace gate of heaven. You can endure the hardships, and the privations, and the cruelties, and the misfortunes of this life, if you can only gain admission there. Through the blood of the everlasting covenant, you go through those gates or never go at all. God forbid that you should at last be banished from the society of your glorified kindred, and banished forever. Through the rich grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, may you be enabled to imitate the example of Rachel, and Hannah, and Abigail, and Deborah, and Mary, and Esther, and Vashti.

THE GREAT FREE STATE OF THE CONGO.

THE attention of the whole world has been drawn to the important work being done by the great American explorer, Mr. H. M. Stanley, in founding a great free State in Africa, which has been named from the river at the head of which it is situated. Mr. Stanley's work, his plans, and his hopes are described in an interesting work from his pen just published. The following information is gleaned from its pages.

THE EXAMPLE OF PENN.

Without going back to the history of the conflicts between whites and blacks in the early American and newer Australian colonies, there is enough in Mr. Stanley's book to show how widely he differs from ordinary colonizers in his treatment of the aborigines; truly it may be said that he carried the unstained flag of civilization along with the banner of the Association. His has been no mere conquest by force of arms, although he knew how to be firm when firmness became essential. But he has succeeded, in a manner which will stand alone in history, in uniting white and black races in the creation of a grand administration, one which, magnificent as it is now in its inception, bids fair to astonish the world still more in the not distant future.

How the leader of the expedition fixed on Vivi for its first station and future emporium is told in the most spirited manner. After finding that the conditions of accessibility from the sea and from the interior, and of probable salubrity were fulfilled, the next thing was to see whether the natives were well affected. Five chiefs of the Vivi district appeared, and each is described in detail. The most noticeable thing was their apparent fondness for cloth garments, old uniforms, frock-coats, and such like. Some also were felt or straw hats. This leads Mr. Stanley to make a forecast:

A MARKET FOR OLD CLOTHES.

"Short as was my view of this concourse of Vivi aborigines, I foresaw a brilliant future for Africa, if by any miracle of good-fortune I could persuade the dark millions of the interior to cast off their fabrics of grass clothing and don the second-hand costumes visible, say, in White-chapel. See what a ready market lies here for old clothes! The garments shed by the military heroes of Europe, of the club lackeys, of the liveried servants of modern Pharaohs, the frock-coats of a lawyer, merchant, or a Rothschild; or perhaps the grave garb of these my publishers, may here find people of the rank of Congo chieftainship to wear them, and strut about en grande tenue while on ceremonious visits. Since this period my views have been confirmed by larger experience, and I have seen many thousands of dark Africa's sons who would not feel it to be a derogation of their dignity to wear the cast-off costumes of the pale children of Europe, but would put themselves to some little trouble to gather enough raw produce to give in legitimate exchange for them, that they may wear them rightfully and nobly."

The following brief speech, which Mr. Stanley addressed to the chiefs, will show better than anything else the spirit in which the Association made its advances.

BARGAINING WITH THE CHIEFS.

"I replied: 'State that I am glad to hear them speak so kindly to the white man. To-day I do not want much. I want ground to build my houses, for I am about to build many, either here or elsewhere. I want ground enough, if I can get it, to make gardens and fields. Vivi is not good for that unless I go far up; but what I do get I want for myself and people, and the right to say what white man shall come near me. At Boma the chiefs have cut the ground up small; there is no room for me. I want plenty of room, and that is why I have come up here. I want to go inland, and must have the right to make roads wherever it is necessary, and all men that pass by those roads must be allowed to pass without interruption. No chief must lay his hand on them and say, 'This country is mine; pay me something; give me gin, or cloth, or so many guns.' You have heard of me, I know, for De-de-de, who is here, must have told you. What I saw on the road to Boma must not be repeated here. You have no roads in your country. It is a wilderness of grass, rocks, bush; and there at Banza Vivi is the end of all life. If you and I can agree, I shall change all that. I am going to stop here to-night; think of what I have told you, and I will listen. To-morrow you can return at the third hour of the day, and speak.'"

The terms on which the chiefs made the required concessions were regarded by Mr. Stanley as hard. For a tract, about a mile long, by half a mile wide, he had to pay $160 down in cloth, and a rental of $10 a month. As in the same paragraph he asserts that "a city of twenty thousand inhabitants might be accommodated on the larger plateau, with sufficient landing conveniences," and as this is "the highest point of the Congo opposite which a landing could be effected," and, therefore, the starting point for the future railway which will open up the vast interior of the Congo basin to trade, we can hardly think Mr. Stanley serious in lamenting the hardness of the bargain. Fancy grumbling at a ground-rent of $120 a year for the site of the chief trading centre of this part of Africa!

At last the station was finished, and Mr. Stanley had the nickname of Bula Matari, or "Breaker of Rocks," bestowed on him by the natives, a name that afterward became familiar from the sea to Stanley Falls. The next step was to advance into the interior by road as far as Isangila, the river being unnavigable between Vivi and that place.

THE LATE VICTOR HUGO.

In the death of Victor Hugo, which occurred on May 22, France has lost the most brilliant of her men of letters, the most splendid genius she has produced during this century. His poems have been read and admired in every civilized country, and his romances have held spell-bound men and women of all ages and all nationalities. But nothing that he ever wrote was so romantic as his own life, of which, however, we have space here for only a brief sketch.

Victor Marie Hugo was born at Besançon, in France, on the 26th of February, 1802; he was, therefore, in his eighty-fourth year when he died. He was the youngest of the three sons of General Hugo, a devoted follower of the fortunes of the Bonapartes. His mother had been an ardent Royalist during the momentous struggle in France in the closing years of the eighteenth century. She was a cousin of Volney, the author of "The Ruins," and a native of La Vendée. She took part in the famous insurrection in that province where, from first to last, one hundred thousand lives are believed to have been lost. Along with Mmes. De Beauchamp and De Larochejaquelein she was surrounded by soldiers and captured in a wood near the close of the insurrection. Under the rule of Robespierre the Hugo of that day, a French noble and the grandfather of the poet, died on the scaffold. His son, the father of Victor, was an ardent admirer of Napoleon Bonaparte, who made him a general in his army, and finally, the governor of an important province in Spain. In many of General Hugo's journeys his wife and son accompanied him. Before he was eight years old Victor had seen Spain and had visited Florence, Rome, and Naples. Before his tenth year he had written verse which had made a deep impression upon those who had read it. When he was fifteen he sent an essay to the Academy in competition for a prize, and failed of it only because the judges would not believe that so young a person had produced the essay. Victor's brothers both achieved names as writers. The one was a writer on historical subjects and the other published verse. The latter died in 1837.

Victor was a feeble child at birth, and so few were the hopes that he would live that his immediate baptism became imperative. Until he was fifteen months old his delicate shoulders were thought to be incapable of supporting his massive head. For a long period in his boyhood he lived alone with his devoted mother in a house in an obscure quarter of Paris. A priest educated him. The journey to Spain to join General Hugo was undertaken by the mother without the protection of her husband. She and young Victor formed part of an army train two miles long that crossed the Pyrenees bearing a mass of treasures designed for the support of Joseph Bonaparte's feeble throne at Madrid. After the fall of Napoleon, General Hugo returned to Paris. He sent his son to a preparatory school in the Rue Sainte-Marguerite, where, in the intervals of study he organized dramatic representations and filled volumes of copy-books with verse.

In 1821 Victor felt the first great sorrow of his life when his mother, to whom he was devotedly attached, breathed her last. It was in the consolation of one of his friends, Mdlle. Foucher, imparted to him during the agony of grief his mother's death caused him, that the seeds were sown of an attachment which shortly afterward culminated in marriage. Victor was only twenty years old when he entered wedlock, and his wife was eighteen. He had finally chosen literature as his profession at that period, much to the regret of his father, who had hoped that he would become a soldier. Royalty had by this time been restored in France, and Victor was full of joy. He had no sympathy with his father's love of the Bonapartes, but under his mother's influence had become as ardent a Royalist as she was. His literary efforts were everywhere characterized by devotion to the throne. His father must have been a far-seeing man; for when a friend commented upon this difference between his son and himself, the father replied, "Let him alone; the child naturally adopts the sentiments of his mother; the man will hold his father's views." This prophecy was fulfilled. Victor soon learned enough of kings and their ways to realize that his mother's enthusiastic admiration of them was based on ignorance and romance.

Soon after his marriage, troubles fell thick upon him; his brother became hopelessly insane, his father died, and before the first year of his married life ended, a baby had been laid in its little grave. Hugo said sadly that his ideal of Paradise was of a place where parents were always young, and their children always small. Literary success, however, was coming to him, and his first year's income of seven hundred francs ($125) rose in the following year to more than treble that sum.

In 1826 his famous "Odes and Ballads" were published in two volumes, and made his name famous throughout France. "Crownwell" followed, and its terrific grandeur proved to the world that a true genius had arisen in France. "Notre Dame de Paris," however, eclipsed its predecessors. The manuscript had been sold before a single word of it had been written. Only three months separated him from the date when the manuscript had to be delivered to the publisher. The author was to forfeit one thousand francs for every week's delay. He bought a bottle of ink and a knitted robe that enveloped him from neck to toe; locked up all his other clothes, gave the key to his wife, and he "entered his novel as if it were a prison." His literary fame continued growing as every year new works issued from his pen. Honors were thrust upon him. He was elected to the French Academy in 1841, and in 1845 King Louis Philippe made him a peer of France. But he was strange timber out of which to make a peer. His ideas and sympathies were growing more and more republican, and although he fell in with the régime of Louis Philippe he made no secret of it that he regarded the monarchy only as temporary—it was merely a prelude to the Republic. Yet he did not think that the Republic was at that moment ripe.

The revolution of 1848 came, and Hugo threw in his lot with the progressive party. He was elected by the city of Paris to the constituent assembly, and there he took his seat with the advanced Republicans. He strenuously opposed the election of Louis Napoleon to the Presidency of the Republic, warning the people in words that afterward seemed prophetic, that so ambitious a man could not safely be intrusted with so high an office. His warning was not heeded, but when, on that fatal December 2d, 1852, Napoleon shot the people down in the streets, and erected his imperial throne on treachery and murder, Hugo was not forgotten either by the Emperor or the people. Napoleon banished him, and Hugo took refuge under the English flag in Jersey.

It was soon after his retirement to Jersey and while still smarting under a sense of the wrongs inflicted on the French people by the coup d'état that Hugo published his well-known "Napoleon the Little." In this satire were compressed the strongest indignation and fury of Hugo's mind. It was published in Brussels in 1852, and was vigilantly excluded from France during the continuance of the Second Empire. In the following year he published his volume of verse called "The Châtiments," in which he renewed the attack on his imperial enemy in lines of living fire. Twice during his exile he might have returned to France by accepting the amnesty offered him, but he refused to live under the rule of a man whom he regarded as a traitor. He occupied himself in literary pursuits and issued many volumes, which were widely circulated. His most famous work, "Les Misérables," was one of those produced in exile. It appeared simultaneously in nine languages, and of one edition alone one hundred and sixty thousand copies were sold.

After the fall of the Empire Hugo returned to France. He was received with open arms by the men who had temporarily succeeded to power. His first act on his return was more characteristic of the enthusiastic idealist than of the practical statesman. He issued an address to the Germans, then pouring into the country, inviting them to declare a republic and join hands with France. He remained in Paris during the first weeks of the Commune and endeavored to calm the popular madness. He in vain protested against the destruction of the Vendôme Column. Finding his efforts of no avail, and thoroughly disheartened, he retired to Brussels. He, however, felt much sympathy with the maddened Communists, and endeavored to mitigate the severity of their punishment. Since that time he has lived quietly in Paris, busy in his literary work. Those who would claim the great poet as an atheist must have been surprised by the revelation of his friend, M. Vacquerie, who publishes a paper which Hugo, not long before he died, placed in his hands, on which were written, as his last wishes, the words: "I give fifty thousand francs to the poor. I wish to be carried to the cemetery in their hearse. I refuse the prayers (oraisons) of all Churches. I ask for a prayer (prière) from all souls. I believe in God.—VICTOR HUGO."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

The Moment when God Blesses.—At a Recent meeting Mrs. Stroad Smith said: "I was speaking to a woman the other day, who, by the dispensation of God's providence was passing through heavy trials. When in conversation with her she said: 'I wish I could rejoice in the afflictions which God has sent to me; but I am so helpless; I cannot do anything; I feel as if I must give up trying to trust.' Ah, she had come to the right point, although she knew it not. It is at such times the Lord will bless us, when, feeling our own weakness and our utter dependence on Him, we realize that we are nothing, and that God is all."

Saved by the Skin of His Teeth.—A Christian brother said: "I was standing by a man's death-bed lately, and in the agony of his soul he loudly exclaimed: 'Can I be saved? Can I be saved? Is there any hope for me?' I spoke to him very earnestly, but owing to his illness he was quite deaf, and therefore could not hear what I was saying. However, I opened the Bible, and turning to some appropriate passages of Scripture bade the poor fellow read them, which he did. Then rising on his knees in bed the dying man cried out: 'Lord Jesus, save me!' and as the last word fell from his lips his spirit passed away. He was saved, as people say, by the skin of his teeth."

A Runaway Knock.—An Evangelist remarked: "When Mr. Moody was a little boy of ten years of age, he had to pass a house door with a very large knocker on his way to school, and every morning he had a great wish to go up to that door and knock at it, but all he wanted was courage. One morning he could resist the temptation no longer, and throwing open the gate, and walking quickly up the gravel path, he took hold of the knocker, and made a great noise with it, and then ran away as quickly as possible. Mark for what reason! Because he was afraid of what the answer might be. This is what many people do to Christ. They read the text, 'Knock, and it shall be opened unto you.' They do knock, but, like the little boy, they are afraid of what the answer might be, and run away."

A Dying Girl's Story.—Mr. Garrick remarked: "On one occasion I was called in to see a young girl who was dying, and when I asked if she were trusting Jesus, she answered me thus: 'I was coming along the street one night, after a day of hard and exhausting work, and was feeling very weary and overwhelmed with fatigue. A band of Christian workers were singing at the corner of a street, and standing for a minute, I heard them singing, "Art thou weary? art thou languid?

Art thou sore distressed?
Come to Me, says One,
And coming, be at rest."

turned from that happy band saying, 'Yes, Lord, I am coming, I am weary and I am languid; Thou hast bidden me come to Thee, and come.' Since that moment I have been rejoicing in the love of God.'

An Addition to the Choir.—Mr. Ferrie Related: "A woman attended one of Moody's meetings in Scotland two years ago, he remarked to her friends that she did not know anything about the substitution of Christ for the sake of guilty sinners, of which they spoke, and of being forgiven her sins. She did not at all understand it—to her it was worse than Greek; but, she said, 'I know that you too are Christians have something which I have not got, and I would like to obtain it, if I only knew how.' Mr. Moody, to whom she was introduced, said: 'Will you come to this meeting regularly for a month?' 'Yes,' she replied, 'I will do anything to obtain what I need.' She did come, and within two weeks she was rejoicing in Christ's finished work for her, and the forgiveness of her sins, and singing God's praises the choir."

Why There Were No Flowers.—Dr. Cameron Related: "I heard recently of a man who went live in the country, but who until then had lived in a large and busy town. Everything was new and strange to him. He had a garden in which he sowed some seed, and so ignorant as he about it, that on the following morning he went out to see if the flowers had come; and the days passed on he became very impatient, and removed the earth to see how the seeds were getting on. When the time for the seed to have taken root and spring up had come he had no flowers, because he did not give them time to grow. This is very much like some people after they give themselves to the Lord; they continually looking at themselves to see how they are getting along, instead of looking right away to Jesus and forgetting all about self."

A Glass of Untasted Whiskey.—The Rev. Mr. Ross observed: "I was speaking to a man one night lately, who has been a Christian for over ten years. He told me that about three years ago he went into a bar-room, and ordered a glass of whiskey, and when it was lying before him, he thought, 'It is time I had given up drinking; this is the last glass of whiskey I will ever take; it he did not even take it, he rose from the table, and left the glass untouched. When the waiter said: 'You are not going away without drinking your whiskey?' 'Yes,' he said, 'I am going away, and you will never see me back here again.' Some time afterward he came under the sound of the Gospel, and gave himself to the Lord, and now I asked him, 'Are you sorry you gave yourself to the Lord?' 'No,' he answered, 'no, I am not sorry.' 'Are you sorry for anything?' I asked. 'Yes,' he replied, 'I am sorry that I was so long in coming to the Lord.'"

A Terrible Death-Bed.—Mr. Forbes Related is incident: "A young lady was the only daughter of very wealthy parents. The mother seemed to live for nothing but to please her daughter, who lacked nothing that this world could bestow. She attended a service and was deeply impressed with her need of salvation, and for a time, was very anxious about her soul; but her mother had no desire for her to become a Christian, and urged her to enjoy herself while she was young. New dresses were bought for her, and she was hurried along the path of fashionable dissipation. The theatre and the ball-room, her mother thought, would surely cure these gloomy notions, and they did. One evening she went out to a party, and by dancing she became very heated, and stepped out on to the veranda to get cool. She got a chill from which she never recovered. Some time afterward fever set in, and the doctor, one night, calling her mother from the room, said: 'Your daughter is dying; she cannot live over to-night.' The girl overheard the words, and when her mother returned to the room she said: 'Mother, take out all my dresses and jewelry and let me look at them again.' The mother, glad to see that her daughter was still taking an interest in the things of the world, hastily did so. 'Are these all?' asked the girl. 'Yes, dear,' answered her mother. 'Well,' said the girl, 'look at them, mother, for they are the price of my soul.'

A Very Valuable Sign.—Mr. Ferrie Related: "A good man was dying, and both mind and body were in great weakness. A cloud of thick darkness and doubt seemed to settle down upon him. A friend who was sitting by him asked, 'Do you know that you are safe for eternity?' And the dying man sadly replied, 'I know that I am passing through the dark valley of the shadow of death, and it seems to be growing darker and darker; I do not feel sure of my dear Saviour's presence. Will you repeat to me some of the marks of a Christian?' The friend repeated some of the signs of a Christian, and when he came to 'Love the brethren,' the troubled believer exclaimed, 'Ah, I always did that. I loved them for Jesus' sake!' His mind was now at rest, and he knew that he had his foot on the firm Rock, which is Christ Jesus. Yes, dear friends, that is one of the sure signs of a Christian—not given to speaking evil of the one another."

THE SIGNS OF CHRIST'S COMING.

By Rev. Francis Pigou, D.D.

In a sermon preached in Westminster Abbey on Sunday evening, May 31st, from II Thess. 2: 15, 'Brethren stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word or our epistle,' Dr. Pigou said: "One evidence of the nearness to us of our blessed Saviour's coming, is that of which the prophet Daniel long ago spoke—the increase of knowledge together with the restlessness of mankind. 'Men shall run to and fro upon the earth, and knowledge shall be increased' (12: 1). Is there not a most marked increase of knowledge in every department of learning in our time? Is not the popular cry of this nineteenth century for the more general and widespread and thorough education of the masses? How rare it is for us to meet, even among the poorest of the artisan class, with any one who cannot read. Does not characterize our age? Consider our means of locomotion—the rapidity with which we pass nowadays from place to place, and our impatience if we are five minutes late. It took a great explorer two years to go round the world, and now we compass the globe in three months; we pass from the metropolis of Scotland to this, the metropolis of England, in ten hours, and our forefathers took as many days to do the same journey. Daniel was not wrong.

"A third reliable sign which the Scriptures point out is the eventual to their own land. (Ezek. 38.) You have only to read the Jewish Chronicle, their recognized organ, to see how the eyes of the whole world of the Jews in their dispersion is now directed toward the Holy Land. But this restoration cannot take place until the Turks at present in possession of it be dispossessed. A remarkable movement is going on among God's ancient people. Societies are being formed for the purpose of encouraging colonization. We have a Palestine exploration fund. The eyes of the whole Jewish world are being directed to their old patrimony. What is meant by that expression, 'The drying up of the Euphrates,' if it is not the gradual dismemberment and disintegration of that empire which is at present in possession of the Holy Land, in order that the Jews may inherit their own inheritance? What makes the Eastern question of such moment to politicians? What makes the slow but gradual advance of Russia of such absorbing interest to the student of the Bible, if it be not the plainest fulfilment of the predictions uttered centuries ago by the prophet Ezekiel, of that great power Meshech and Tubal which was to invade the Turkish dominions?

"The fourth significant sign is that of which our Saviour spoke, 'When the Son of Man cometh shall He find'—not, as we translate it in the older version, 'faith'—but as we correctly translate it in the Revised Version, 'the faith on the earth?' St. Paul alludes to this he speaks of 'a mystery of iniquity,' already in his day, at work; hindered and somewhat restrained in its fuller development, but to be one day so noisy, so blatant, so defiant, so outspoken, and so bold as imperatively to demand swift destruction. He says that 'that day shall not come except there be' an apostasy or 'a falling away, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition.'

'Well, what are we to understand by this expression, the man of sin, that opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is worshipped; so that He, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing Himself that He is God?' Without attempting to give any lengthened evidence in support of what we are saying, we may at once state that what we render iniquity, is the Greek word, Anomia, which, as the Bishop of Winchester has long ago shown, means

LAWELESSNESS.

Our best scholars have long pointed out the incorrectness of the received translation, and the Revisionists have adopted this the more accurate, in the Revised Version. It is used of wickedness in some of its more diabolical and revolting forms.

"In our childhood's days we were accustomed to hear this epithet applied to the Papacy, or to some one Pope in particular; but the Church of Rome, as a Christian community, is not distinguished by 'lawlessness.' All the predictions with reference to Christ's Second Coming seem to point forward to some disturbed and disquieted condition of society, to an apostasy or departure from the faith, such as should try, as well as test, the faith of God's elect, and for whose sake those days should be shortened, lest the strain should be too great; they fore-shadow a spirit of lawlessness which shall fester and gather into such a head, that nothing short of divine interposition shall effectually eradicate it. 'The Lord shall consume that wicked (lawless) one with the spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy him with the brightness of His Coming.'

St. Paul affirms that when Christianity was little more than fifty years old this mischief was at work. Is its energy exhausted? On the contrary, is there any one fact which is more noted by thoughtful men of our time than what is understood by the lawlessness of our age? Are not all classes of men profoundly impressed with it? Let us begin with the lowest rung of the ladder. Are not revolutionary sentiments undermining to an extraordinary degree the very fabric of society? What turbulent elements, like lava, are simmering beneath the crust of our social life, and finding vent, from time to time, in some violent and desperate deeds on the part of Nihilist or Fenian, or through those which, to compass their wicked ends, are utterly reckless of innocent lives. Our age has been called par excellence the dynamite age. Does it not seem as if a mighty weight of lawlessness were passing over all nationalities? Is the independence of the youth of both sexes striking enough to make their grandfathers turn in their graves? Is it not the age of self-pleasing and of increasing love of self, which St. Paul long ago foresaw and foretold, and need we put an erroneous interpretation upon this expression, 'man of sin,' and apply it to a Pope, when we find a truer interpretation of it nearer home?"

per annum, payable in advance.

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Further Decrease in the Tide of Immigration is reported. The arrivals during the past ten months of the fiscal year were 275,468. During the corresponding period of the previous year, the number of immigrants was 371,625. The total number for the year promises to be about 385,000. The number has been decreasing since 1882, in which year it was 788,092. In 1883 it was 603,322, and in 1884 it was 518,592. The falling off is believed to have been caused by the more detailed reports circulated in Europe of the depression in trade here and the greater cost of living.

The Ohio Republican Convention Assembled at Springfield on June 11th. Unusual interest attached to this convention because it is the first that has been held since the Presidential election, and it was thought possible that the defeat of the party in November might lead to important changes in the Republican platform. There was, however, no indication of any change of feeling on the chief issues. Among the planks of the platform adopted were the following: "We want such legislation as will harmonize the relations of labor and capital and promote the welfare of the people, and protect and foster the industries of the State. We favor the establishment of a national bureau of industry; the enforcement of the Eight Hour law, and adequate appropriations from the public revenues for general education, wherever the same is needed. We denounce the importation of contract labor and favor the most stringent laws to effectively prevent it. We are in favor of a protective tariff which will encourage American development and furnish remunerative employment to American labor; and we are opposed to the British policy advocated by the Democratic party under the guise of a tariff for revenue only. We demand restoration of the wool duty of 1867, or its full equivalent, and we denounce the Democratic Congress for failing to make good the pledges they made in this behalf." As to the civil service reform law, the platform says: "Ample appropriations should be made to enforce it in letter and spirit, and all laws at variance with the objects of existing reform legislation should be repealed. Having accomplished this much, the party pledges itself to still further and higher reforms." The platform is a very lengthy document, but the other paragraphs are devoted to denunciation of the Democratic party for divers sins of omission and commission in Ohio and in Washington. The convention nominated Judge Foraker for governor on the first ballot.

An Extension of the Civil Service Reform Act is announced in a special case by the Postmaster-General. Several post-office inspectors are required, and although the Pendleton bill did not cover this class of appointments, Mr. Vilas announces that applicants must present themselves for competitive examination with the view of testing their qualifications for the duties of the office. He further informs candidates that "no recommendation to favor will avail anything to the advantage of the applicant in respect to this examination, but rather to his disadvantage." The reason assigned by Mr. Vilas for this new mode of dealing with inspectorships is that he is anxious to secure the most efficient corps of inspectors possible. It may be hoped that the same method will be adopted whenever efficiency is wanted, which ought not to be a rare occurrence.

The Telegrams from the Scene of the Apache outbreak received last week were of a vague and contradictory character. It seems evident, however, that most of the Indians have escaped into Mexico. General Crook supposed that he would be able to intercept them, but the Indians fell upon the soldiers who were left on guard in Guadalupe Canon, and killed four of them and captured the provisions and ammunition of the command. The main body of the troops had gone on a scouting expedition, leaving seven men on guard. Two of the guard escaped and rejoined their comrades, but the seventh man is still missing. General Crook has appealed to the War Office for help, and four troops of cavalry and four companies of infantry have been despatched to his assistance. From Guaymas, Mexico, comes news of a battle between the Mexican troops and Yaqui Indians, in which the latter were worsted.

The Great Strike of the Iron and Steel workers in Pennsylvania appears likely to be arranged. Conference between the mill-owners and the Amalgamated Association have been held, at which mutual concessions were made. The first of these took place on June 13th, and the second on Tuesday last. The result was not known at the time of going to press, but the probabilities of a favorable settlement were undoubtedly increased. Messrs. Oliver Bros. & Philips have made an independent arrangement with the association which will enable them to resume work. The class of work done by the firm is exceptional, so that they had less difficulty in accepting the modified proposals of the men. It is believed that other firms will also come to an agreement, and that the protracted struggle so much dreaded will be averted.

The Defeat of Mr. Gladstone and his Resignation are the most momentous items of European news received last week. The adverse vote which precipitated the crisis was taken on June 8th upon a financial question. Mr. Gladstone proposed to raise a part of the money required for the war preparations by increasing the tax on beer and spirits. This proposal was resisted by the Conservatives, who advocated as an alternative a tax on tea and light wines, as beer and spirits were already bearing a duty. Mr. Gladstone, whose ability on all questions of finance is admitted even by his opponents, appears to have been annoyed by this interference with his plans. He vigorously defended the scheme of increasing the tax on beer and spirits, tea, as he said, being an innocent beverage which was already bearing a duty. His confidence increasing as he spoke, he startled the House of Commons by declaring that he would stand or fall by his measure. The Parnellites were quick to notice the declaration, and decided to show their gratitude, in true Irish fashion, to Mr. Gladstone, the best friend Ireland has had in the Premiership for a century. They voted solidly with the Conservatives, and as many of Mr. Gladstone's supporters happened to be absent, the motion to tax beer and spirits was defeated by a majority of twelve, the vote being two hundred and sixty-four to two hundred and fifty-two. Mr. Gladstone rose as soon as the figures were announced, and his pale face and agitated manner showed how severely he felt the defeat. He moved the adjournment of the House and summoned his colleagues to Cabinet council, where it was decided to resign.

The Resignation of the Cabinet is Regarded by the English newspapers as a matter only incidentally caused by the financial question. It openly stated that the defeat was really welcomed as a relief, and that if it had not occurred the Cabinet would have fallen by internal dissension. It is notorious that there has been for long time a wide difference of opinion existing between its members. Sir Charles Dilke and Mr. Chamberlain are Radicals of an advanced type, while Lord Granville, the Marquis Hartington, and Earl Spencer, who sat at the same board, are conservative Liberals, whose principles are nearer akin to their opponent the Tories, than to their colleagues, the Radicals. The dissensions between these two parties in the Cabinet have been growing more acrimonious for several months, and though held in check by Mr. Gladstone's adroit management were evidently approaching a crisis. The crisis came on the question of the Coercion Acts in Ireland, the aristocratic members of the Cabinet wishing them to be renewed, while the Radicals desired their abolition. This question was not settled, and it threatened to disrupt the Cabinet. The defeat on the financial question was therefore welcomed as a good excuse for resignation. The matter, however, seems to be generally misunderstood here and on the continent of Europe, where the newspapers are uttering caustic comments on a nation that could forgive the administration its blunders in Egypt and the Sudan, and its humiliation of the national honor before Russia, but could not pardon an attempt to touch its beer. That view based on a very superficial knowledge of the circumstances.

Mr. Gladstone's Successor is the Marquis Salisbury, who in the last Conservative administration held the portfolio of Foreign Affairs. He was summoned by the Queen to her rural retreat at Balmoral as soon as Mr. Gladstone's resignation was accepted, and was requested to form a Cabinet. It was a matter of extreme difficulty, because the majority of the members of the House of Commons are Liberals, who by voting solidly could defeat every measure introduced by the administration and could, if they chose, refuse to vote appropriations. The Parnellites, who helped the Tories to defeat Mr. Gladstone, are not to be depended upon, and are more likely to help the Liberals to defeat the Tories than to vote Tory measures. Their object is to embarrass the Government, whether Liberal or Tory. I side with the Tories as advocates of coercion in its most stringent form, and therefore would stultify themselves by making an alliance with the Parnellites. The Marquis of Salisbury, therefore, hesitated to accept the post offered him, but on Monday it was announced that having received assurances from Mr. Gladstone that no factious opposition would be encouraged by him, the marquis accepted the office of Premier and will form a Cabinet. Some uneasiness is felt in this unexpected turn of affairs to the effect it will have on the Russian negotiations.

A Treaty Between England and China being negotiated, the purport of which is to make the opium traffic more general. The treaty provides for the admission of opium traders to the interior, and arranges for a reduction in the rate of duty which will enable traders to sell it at a lower price. The more enlightened classes in China will probably have some doubts about the sincerity of Mr. Gladstone's profession of Christianity in the light of this treaty.

An Outbreak of Cholera is Reported from Valencia, and two deaths from the disease have taken place in Madrid itself. The Spanish Government promptly sent a commission to the infected neighborhood to investigate and report. Dr. de la Granja, one of its members, declares the epidemic to be true Asiatic cholera of the most malignant type. There are fifty to fifty-five per cent of deaths in seven to forty-eight hours after the first attack. He estimates the total to be fifteen hundred cases to date. The worst are in the village of Curjasot, near Valencia. The epidemic was carried from Alciria by a workman who washed his clothes in a stream used for drinking. The inhabitants are poor. At first all who were attacked died; now seventy per cent die. Lime is used to destroy the infection of the water, but poverty spreads the disease. The progress of the disease is watched with the greatest anxiety by the Spanish people, and despite the precautions taken by the authorities almost everybody is firmly convinced that there will be a fresh outbreak this summer. All vessels from infected ports are quarantined for three days. The people are in a state of panic and are fleeing from the infected districts.

Dr. Talmage Purposes Spending the Months of July and August in Europe. He does not intend to preach or lecture during his visit, but to spend his time in rest and recuperation. It is now twenty-nine years since he has enjoyed a period of absolute cessation from public work. Dr. Talmage expects to sail on June 27th in the Aurania, of the Cunard Line. During his absence the Tabernacle will not be closed. During part of the time the services will be conducted by Rev. W. T. Wylie, D.D., and on four Sundays the Rev. C. L. Thompson, D.D., of Kansas City, Mo., formerly of Chicago, will preach. The regular publication of Dr. Talmage's sermons in this journal will not be interrupted. We have made arrangements to publish some remarkable sermons delivered a few years ago by Dr. Talmage, which will be new to our readers.

The Infidel Colony Founded Five Years ago in Barton County, Missouri, has not been a success. A correspondent of a St. Louis paper, who spent a day and a half in the new town called Liberal, says that the experiment is a failure; that the town, instead of keeping pace with other towns of the same age, has fallen far behind them, and instead of being the happy, prosperous community it promised to be, is shriveled, contracted, torn in two by dissensions, and in a condition where only prompt action on behalf of its friends toward a complete reorganization will save it from disintegration.

Iowa was Visited by a Destructive Tornado on the night of June 12th. Pulaski, which is situated on the borders of the prairie, appears to have suffered worse than other cities. The hurricane struck the city with a noise like the discharge of artillery. It damaged many public buildings and destroyed private dwellings. The Methodist Episcopal Church was twisted out of shape, denuded of its roof and tower, and left in a worthless condition. The Iowa House, the leading hotel, has not a whole wall standing. Only one man was injured, though the house contained forty persons. Their escape is considered miraculous. In another part of the city two persons were killed and several injuries from falling trees are reported. In Pottawatomie County the town of Neola was badly damaged and a large number of farmhouses in the vicinity were destroyed. The roof of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum was torn off and carried six hundred feet. The cupola was also torn away and several buildings damaged, inflicting a loss of $30,000. Several buildings were demolished in Omaha. Just above Sioux City a train was derailed by the wind.

A Fight in a Synagogue Alarmed the Worshippers at Wilkesbarre, Pa., on June 6th. While the usual Sabbath service was in progress two Polish Jews rose in their seats and commenced to strike each other. This created a great commotion among the other members of the congregation, and for awhile the house was in an uproar. The rabbi came down from the pulpit and separated the belligerents after they had exchanged several blows. One of them then left the building and entered suit before a justice of the peace, charging the other with assault and battery. The latter brought a counter suit before another alderman. The cause of the quarrel was disclosed in court. It seems that during the week one of the combatants had charged the other with being a Christian, and in the synagogue had made some sign which the other regarded as "a repetition of the reproach." He could bear it no longer and retaliated with a blow, and the fight followed. The day is coming in which not only Jews, but worldlings who now regard the name of Christian as an insult, will see more clearly. Then the name will be regarded as a title of highest honor (Matt. 10: 32, 33).

A Truck Loaded with Valuables was Sunk in the North River last week. A wealthy New York citizen who was removing for the summer months to his seaside cottage sent forward a truck on which was packed large quantities of plate, pictures, table furniture, and personal effects, in preparation for the arrival of the family. When the truck reached the pier from which the Long Branch steamer started, the horses were detached and the truck was allowed to run down the gang-plank on to the steamer. As it was running aboard the tackle which held it broke, and the truck ran down the plank and was carried by the momentum it had acquired clear across the steamer's deck and out through the opposite gangway into the river. Divers are now engaged rescuing such of the property as has not been carried out to sea by the stream. Evidently the tackle employed to restrain the truck from going too far was not so strong as was supposed. Mistakes of that kind are made in the moral world, where the loss is more serious. Young men who wish just to see life, generally have more confidence in their own power of self-restraint than the result justifies (Prov. 28: 26).

An Indigent Relative of a Queen Died in St. Louis, Mo., on June 9th. His name was Count Von Alt Leiningen Westerburg. He was a member of one of the oldest and most noble families in Germany, and was related to the Queen of Great Britain, whose grandmother, the mother of the Duchess of Kent, was Countess of Alt Leiningen Westerburg. The count had been for some time working as a reporter on the Anzeiger des Westens, and his circumstances were bad. His elder brother, who inherited the family lands and honors, and who lives at the castle of Ilbenstadt, in Hesse-Darmstadt, has helped him from time to time, but the family in Germany is very poor also. Leiningen sunk his title when he came to America, and was a hard-working, courteous gentleman. He would doubtless have thriven here, but his health failed, and all that he earned when he was well was absorbed in the expenses of his frequent illnesses. The news is a surprise, as it was supposed that all Queen Victoria's German relatives had been provided for. Englishmen frequently complain that the lucrative sinecure offices about the court are reserved for them. This man, however, appears to have been overlooked. Probably he was too insignificant to attract the royal notice. Such an oversight will never happen in the case of any, even of the most insignificant, sons of the King of kings. None are too poor or too mean to enjoy His favor (James 2: 5).

A Proof-Reader's Fortune was Acquired in a curious way lately. The incident is vouched for on actual knowledge by the New York Sun. One night last July he was hard at work doing his part to bring out the morning paper on which he was engaged. After some hours there came a break in the run of copy. The proof-reader, while waiting for a fresh supply, told his fellow-laborers how night-work was wearing on him, how he could not sleep through the hot days, and yet how dependent he was upon his small salary for a livelihood. While he was talking some items came down from the compositors, and the copy-holder took them. One of them referred to a fortune in Kentucky awaiting a claimant who could prove himself heir to a deceased man named Shanks. The proof-reader's name was Shanks, and the copy-holder, thinking to play a joke upon him, added a line to the item, intimating that he was the lost heir. The proof-reader only laughed, tore off the line, and crumpled it up in his pocket, where some months afterward his wife found it. She asked her husband what it meant, and Shanks laughed and related the joke. The wife, however, thought it was worth inquiring about, and wrote to the address indicated, in Lincoln County, Ky. The reply has established the right of her husband to a fortune worth $150,000. Badly as the proof-reader needed the money, he would never have had it but for his wife's practical sense. How many people there are acting in the same way about the spiritual riches which Christ will give to those who seek Him. They know of them yet never claim them (Luke 11: 9.)

A Fashionable Lady's Defective Memory was prompted by her hostess recently, according to an incident related by a correspondent of the Washington Post. Mrs. —, a lady whose gaiety has not been impaired by her marriage, but has rather increased since that event—if her zest in social pleasures may be accepted as evidence—is in the habit of tying a knot in her pocket handkerchief when she wishes to fix anything in her mind which must be attended to. She was engaged, at a recent reception, in a flirtation, much to the annoyance of her hostess, who has higher ideas of what a married lady's conduct ought to be than those which, unhappily, prevail in these days. Mrs. —, in her abstraction, dropped the handkerchief on the floor. This was noticed by her hostess, who endeavored to break up the flirtation by inviting her guest into another part of the house. As the latter rose from the chair she stooped and picked up her handkerchief, noticing, as she did so, the knot in one corner. "What have I forgotten to-day?" she asked, audibly. "That you have a husband," replied her hostess. The reproach was needed, and we may hope will have the desired effect. A similar reminder might often be given with advantage to those who profess to be followers of Christ, but are found consorting with worldlings in the ball-room and the theatre. They have forgotten much (1 Peter 2: 20).

How a Man's Spine was Repaired has been told by an eminent surgeon in Wisconsin, in the Madison Journal. He states that he was called several months ago to attend a patient who had been run over by a hand-car. The young man was found upon examination to have broken one of the vertebrae of the spinal column at a point nearly between the shoulder blades. The case seemed desperate, but the young man possessed great vitality, and the doctor set to work to save him if possible, though he recognized the gravity of the undertaking. The patient was stretched, the fractured vertebra pressed into position, and then the body, from the top of the hip-bone to the armpits, was solidly encased in plaster of Paris. He was kept in this solid case for several weeks, when it was removed. The fractured bone was then found to have knitted nicely, and he is now, notwithstanding the very severe injury he sustained, able to resume his occupation as a teamster. The surgeon's skill saved his patient from a life of physical helplessness, for an injury so serious as that to the spinal column usually prevents the sufferer ever standing on his feet again. It is recognition of that fact that has caused men who are morally weak to be spoken of as having "no backbone." They often get into the Christian Church and disgrace it because, though they are pious in religious society, they are worldly when with irreligious people. For such men there is no help in man. Prayer should be offered for them to the great Physician, who is able to keep them from falling (Jude 24).

THE PRIVATE TUTOR.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"He that loveth me not keepeth not my sayings; and the word which ye hear is not mine, but the Father's which sent me. These things have I spoken unto you, being yet present with you. But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you."—JOHN 14: 24-26.

Apostolic Ignorance and Foolishness—The Trinity United to Teach—I. The Test of a True Believer—Only Two Classes—Those Who Do and Do Not Love—The Love Personal—Himself Not His Doctrine—A Further Test—Keeping His Sayings—Includes the Old Testament—Reason Superseded—II. The Needs of a True Believer—Not Another Gospel—Nor a Better Preacher—The Memory Refreshed—III. The Privilege of the True Believer—Difference Between Speaking and Teaching—Certainty Imparted.

ALL through this thrice-blessed chapter man cuts a very sorry figure. Whoever it is that speaks, whether it be Philip, or Judas, or Thomas, each one displays his own ignorance, either by asking an unwise question or by making a mistaken request. Yet, brethren, these apostolic men were by no means inferior persons; but so superior that we sink into insignificance in comparison with them. Jesus made them heralds of His Gospel, master-builders of His Church; and if they displayed such ignorance, even when the Lord Jesus Christ Himself had personally spoken to them, we must not wonder that we are apt to blunder; neither should we despair if we find ourselves dull and slow.

STRENGTH AND WEAKNESS.

But, at the same time, how wonderfully throughout this passage do we see the loving kindness of our God in condescending to the weaknesses of His people. In one verse of our text, the twenty-sixth, we have the whole Trinity at work upon the believer: "The Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name." There we have the Holy Spirit, the Father, and the Son, uniting their sacred energies for the illumination of the chosen. Each divine person seeks to make the other to be more fully known; the Son speaking what He hears with the Father, and the Spirit taking the things of the Son and revealing them to us; the whole Trinity working in us to will and to do according to the divine pleasure. Wherefore, comfort one another with these thoughts. Lie low, and be more and more teachable; yet be hopeful, for you shall be taught.

It appears to me that there are three things here worthy of patient observation: one is, the test of a true believer—"He that loveth me not keepeth not my sayings;" a second is, the need of a true believer—"he needs to be taught of the Holy Ghost, and to have his memory refreshed by the same gracious Spirit"—"He shall bring all things to your remembrance." The best disciple needs help in his understanding, and in his memory. Thirdly, let us think of the privilege of a true believer—"The Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you."

1. Let us begin with the TEST OF A TRUE BELIEVER.

I would draw your attention to the fact that in this passage, and elsewhere in Scripture, men are divided into two classes, and not a word is said of a neutral or intermediate class. The twenty-first verse says, "He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me;" and the twenty-fourth verse says negatively, "He that loveth me not keepeth not my sayings." Evidently there are two sorts of persons in that part of the world which is visited by the Gospel: he that loveth Christ, and he that loveth Him not. If you once hear the Gospel you can never be indifferent to it; you must either be its friend or its foe, its disciple or its opposer. By this Gospel you shall be judged, and it shall either bring you where there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, or it shall leave you where you are condemned already because you have not believed upon the Son of God? Do not, therefore, hope to live and die as if there were no Christ.

The test is this, the loving of Christ. Loving Christ is not the way of salvation; that can only be ascribed to faith, as it is written, "He that believeth on me hath everlasting life." But the flower which comes out of the seed of faith is love, and faith is not true faith unless it worketh by love, and so purifieth the heart.

Observe, that the

LOVE IS PERSONAL:

"he that loveth me not." He speaks not here of love to doctrine, but of love to Himself; "he that loveth me." There is a personal Christ, and He is to be loved by each one of us individually. Do not think of Christ as a historic personage, who came and went away, whose memory may be dear, but who cannot personally be the object of a present love. If you are truly His disciple, and a partaker of His salvation, you love Him. You realize Him as a living person, as much so as your own self, as your dear wife or your near friend; and your heart in deed and in truth is bound to Him.

You may not always be able to say that you are sure that you love Him, because your agony to be right may create in you a painful anxiety, and even a morbid jealousy as to your own sincerity; but you do love Him if you are called by His grace, and if you do not love Him, neither have you tasted of His power to save. If we are not lovers of the Lord Jesus, the Spirit of all grace has not made us to know and trust Christ; for if we knew Jesus and trusted Him our heart must be wedded to Him. Christ trusted must be Christ beloved. Let it be a matter, then, of personal trial with each one of you. Hear your risen Lord saying, "Lovest thou me?" He standeth here this morning, as once He stood by the lake of Galilee, and He puts this loving inquiry to each disciple, "Lovest thou me?"

Furthermore, as we look at this text we observe that, inasmuch as it is not always possible to gauge the emotions and the affections, is given us: "He that loveth me not keepeth not my sayings." I may know, therefore, whether I love the Lord Jesus Christ by answering this further question, Do I keep His sayings? What meaneth this? It means, first, have we a reverent regard for all the teachings of the Lord Jesus Christ? Do we receive them as being our standard of doctrine, and our rule of life? Remember that, in effect, all that is in the Old Testament as well as in the New must be considered to be the sayings of Christ; for He says that He came not to destroy the law, but to establish the law. Heaven and earth shall pass away, but not one tittle of the law shall fail. The whole record of inspiration is indorsed by Christ, and may be said to be His sayings.

A FURTHER TEST

I tremble as I see in this day such a trifling with the Word of God; such a haste to criticise this and question that. There are degrees of inspiration, so we are told; and if that be so, we can be sure of nothing, since we have first to decide some subtle question as to the measure of the inspiration. As well have no Bible as such a Bible. Brethren, the Word of the Lord shall have no such treatment from nie, and I trust it will not be so served by any of you, for if so, you will rob yourselves of comfort, and offer grievous disrespect to your divine Lord. Has Jesus set forth a truth in these Scriptures? Then it is not ours to judge, not ours to doubt; but ours to accept with implicit faith. The authority of Jesus stands to us in the stead of reasoning. We so reverence Him that we reverence His sayings as being truth itself.

To keep His sayings means, further, to make careful storage of them in the memory. To keep these sayings must mean to lay them up in the heart. The blessed Virgin "kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart," and so doth every Christian. "Thy word have I hid in my heart that I might not sin against Thee."

Still, I have no doubt that

of keeping Christ's sayings is found in obeying Him. Dear friends, I do not want to say anything that will be severe, but yet I shall put to you a question which ought to alarm many professors. Did you ever spend a whole day from morning to night in distinctly and resolutely doing that which would honor Christ? I do not mean did you give up your business? did you quit your family? such strange conduct would not honor Jesus, but would do the reverse. But have you day after day thought and acted as if Jesus were your master, and you His servant? Is it habitual with you to say, "I will only do that which Christ would do if He were in my place? His example shall be my law. I will not be ruled by the hope of personal advantage or selfish comfort; but to me the supreme rule shall be, What would Jesus do? What would Jesus have me to do?"

II. So far for the test of discipleship. Now, in the second place, I beg you to follow me while I speak for a minute or two upon the NEEDS OF A TRUE BELIEVER.

The believer, though he loves his Lord truly is, nevertheless, a most necessitous person, and sadly full of wants. He does not need any better Gospel; the Lord Jesus Christ taught us the best Gospel that could be; and, indeed, there can be no other. When Paul spoke of "another Gospel," he added, "which is not another; but there be some that trouble you." We desire nothing wiser, fuller, or better, than the doctrine which our Lord once delivered to the saints. Those who seek after the novelties of this concocted century seek to push their Lord from His place, that a philosopher may fill His throne. They seem to say, "Stand thou back, thou Galilean! Thou wast good enough for the dark ages, but we need a brighter light for these brighter times." I return to what I said before—"we need no better Gospel than that which God Himself has set forth in the person of His Son Jesus Christ."

These disciples to whom our Lord spake did not need any better preacher; they could not imagine a better. "Never man spake like this man." What power and authority there was in Him, and what an unction of the Holy One was upon Him. I cannot say that of you; for you, beloved friends, might often sigh for an abler preacher, and it may be that in some places where you live your Sabbaths are a bondage to you, because the pure Gospel is not declared, and the sheep are not fed. But in the case of these apostles, they could not have had a better preacher; and yet, for all that, because the Holy Spirit was not yet fully given, and was not dwelling in them, they had really learned very little.

FORGOTTEN TEACHING.

The best instructed of the apostles failed to understand His Lord while He merely spake to them. Often the disciples ran away with the words which He had uttered, and dwelt upon their letter, altogether missing their spiritual meaning. Frequently when they obtained a glimpse of the spiritual meaning, they beclouded it with some prejudice or tradition of their own, which, like smoke, obscured their vision. As to memory, they displayed but little of that faculty toward spiritual things; they were constantly forgetting what the Lord had told them, and acting in a manner directly the opposite of His precept and example.

Even if you understand you may forget. I dare say you have often to lament that the good word slips away from you, and this is a great evil. Why do we forget? Is it not largely through ignorance and want of understanding? When a child does not understand his lesson he soon forgets it. Again, we forget heavenly things because we are so occupied with worldly things; our cares, our joys, our pleasures, our pursuits often crowd the things of God into a corner, and even tread them down with heedless fury. We forget our eternal prospects because we are thinking of our immediate interests. Our circumspect stances compel us to think of lower objects, but we need divine help to abide in communion with the higher matters. We need some one to bring these things to our remembrance, and to elevate us to a superior region of mind and heart.

At times we forget our Lord's sayings, and become bewildered by many afflictions. Trouble follows trouble; we go from darkness to deeper darkness in our experience, and we are so worried that we forget. When we most need the promise we are most apt to forget it. There are good solid steps all through the Slough of Despond; but when a man is passing through that horrible place he is usually so hurried and confused that he cannot see the stepping-stones, but slips into the deep mire where there is no standing. It is ill for us to be in a storm and our anchor at home.

TRACHEOUS MEMORIES.

Sometimes, I am afraid, our memories fail us because we are not particularly anxious to recollect. Certain precepts are so contrary to the carnal mind that if we can forget them we are sure to do so. You know how easy it is in your family reading to omit parts of God's Word which are too close and personal. We are afraid of the razor which cuts too close to the skin. Have you not felt of a morning when your servants have been gathered together, that you could not well read a certain passage because you had been out of temper, or unkind, or in some other way out of proper form? You feared that they would say, "Our master and the Bible do not agree."

In your own private thoughts a precept occurs to you, but you feel it convenient to ignore it because it would stand in the way of a design which you are cherishing. You intend to go through with your purpose, and therefore you shut your eyes to an inconvenient text. But if we are under the guidance of the Spirit of God, He will bring to our remembrance the duty in its proper time, and we shall bring forth our fruit in its season. Fruit out of season is always deficient in flavor; never are the scent and the taste so perfect as in the middle of the season. Oh, that we may bring forth our fruit in its due season—patience in tribulation, courage in danger, holiness in life, and hope in death. We fail to do this because that evil nature which is in us makes us forget at the precise moment which we ought to remember. It is the office of the Holy Spirit to bring before us the sayings of Christ in their due order and time. Do you not need this?

III. Hoping to retain your prayerful attention, I proceed to notice the PRIVILEGE OF THE TRUE BELIEVER.

It is the true disciple's privilege to possess in the Holy Spirit a private tutor, a prompter, and a Comforter. The Lord Jesus says, "The Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, He shall teach you all things." Christ in His sayings gave us our class-book, complete and infallible; but through our dulness we need more. That young man has gone to college; he has with him all necessary books, and in them is to be found all that he will need to learn; even thus the Lord Jesus has given us in His sayings all that we need to know. But the young man's father wishes him to become a learned man, and therefore he engages for him a private tutor, who will teach him what the books contain. With his tutor's help his book is of far greater use to him than before. If any passage is difficult the tutor explains it; he puts the youth into the way of reading his class-books, so as to get the full value of them. Spiritually this is the office of the Holy Ghost; He finds us the key wherewith to open up the mystery which else would be out of our reach.

He really teaches us. To teach you is a very different thing from speaking to you. A person may speak to a company of young people, and yet teach them nothing. If I am anxious to instruct a brother on any point, I do not merely speak to him, but I go over the ground carefully, set out each point distinctly, repeat my statements deliberately, and illustrate them appropriately. The Spirit of God, when He takes the child of God out of the company, and speaks privately to His heart, goes over the truth with him till it is made clear, and happily apprehended.

HOW THE SPIRIT TEACHES.

The Spirit teaches the saints, either at once or by degrees, all the truth of Christ. Some parts of that whole you will never learn, except upon a sick bed, or in deep depression of spirit, or in bereavement and adversity; while other truths will only be learned on the bright mountains of assurance and communion with God. It is the Spirit's province to burn truth into the soul, to engrave it upon the renewed heart, and make the mind sure and certain as to what it knows. No knowledge is so sure as that which the Holy Spirit communicates to our spirit. Time was, whenever I heard a sceptical remark, I felt wounded and somewhat shaken. I am no longer shaken by these wandering winds. There are certain things of which I am as sure as of my own existence; I have seen, tasted, and handled them, and I am past being argued out of them by those who know nothing about them.

It is promised us that the Comforter will teach us all things—that is, all the things which Jesus said and did. Have we realized this far-reaching privilege? There is a great variety in the knowledge of Christ. Nobody need think that He will exhaust it. There is, moreover, a proportion in the things of Christ, and we need to know all that our Lord has set forth. The way with some of God's people is either to have nothing but doctrine, or else nothing but practice, or else nothing but experience, and this warps and spoils them. Give yourself up to the Spirit of God, and He will teach you all things; here a little, and there a little—here a little of what you should know, there a little of what you should feel, and then again a little of what you should do.

HE REFRESHES THE MIND

by vivid recollections. He refreshes the heart by melting gratitude. I have known times when my memory of the love of Christ has made me sit down and weep for very joy. Oh, what gratitude wells up in the heart when the Holy Spirit brings all that Christ did to remembrance, and we hear Him say from His cross, "I did all this for thee, what hast thou done for me?" It is the Spirit's work to refresh the memory of the heart as well as the memory of the mind. Oftimes He refreshes the memory of the conscience—not quite so pleasant an operation. I have been doing for years wrong things without knowing them to be wrong. I have been neglecting a manifest duty for a long time, but all of a sudden that duty has been brought to my remembrance as one of the things which Jesus told me. I bless the Holy Ghost for thus sanctifying me by giving me a higher standard of holiness, and making me more particular about things which I glossed over with but slight attention. This is a part of the work of the Holy Spirit of God, to bring all things to your remembrance whatsoever He hath told you.

PERSONAL EXPERIENCE.

I shall say no more, but pray the Spirit of God to come upon you this very day, and bring to your remembrance all things that Christ has ever said to you. There will be a mixture of sunny memories and sorrowing memories; but they will be blessed memories, all of them. I thought when I was trying to prepare a subject for this morning, "All that I have preached for these many years is taken from me and printed, so that I cannot repeat it—what shall I do?" and then this truth came to me, "He shall teach you." "He shall teach you," and I begged Him to teach me that I might teach you.

I thought, "Alas, I have had many bright and sparkling thoughts at times, but they do not come just now." I sat still waiting, and then the fact came to me that the Holy Ghost would bring all things to my remembrance whatsoever the Lord Jesus had said. I find my natural memory to be less powerful than it used to be in the days of my youth; shall I, therefore, be allowed to forget when I am teaching? No, "He shall teach you, and bring all things to your remembrance." How beautiful!

I have noticed old people whose memories have been sadly feeble. I knew one who forgot his children. But I never knew an old saint yet who forgot the name of the Saviour, or failed to remember His love. Sometimes the Holy Ghost bears such witness in the heart that the memory is very strong about divine things even when it fails about spiritual things. So, my dear old friend, you that the youngsters sometimes amuse themselves with because your memory has got to be like an old sieve that lets everything through; it will not let your Lord through, you will always feel the music of His name. You will never forget your Well-Beloved if you live to be as old as Methuselah. Memory, though it leaves no other name, shall leave that name recorded there. I wish that any here who do not know Christ would cry for the Spirit of God to teach Him to them. If you long to be saved, pray that by His Spirit the Lord Jesus may bring you into the bond of the covenant, for His love's sake. Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

THE second volume of

"CHRISTIAN THOUGHT"

closes with June number, and with an array of exceedingly interesting articles. It would be difficult to find a more intensely interesting paper than the lecture on "Genesis—Scriptural and Extra-Scriptural," by Rev. Dr. Jesse B. Thomas. Abraham Coles, LL.D., famous for his translations of "Dies Irae," has a paper entitled, "A Half-hour with the Evolutionists." Mr. C. S. Towne has a clear, calm article on "Faith as the Basis of Science and Christian Philosophy." Rev. E. P. Thwing, Ph.D., furnishes some important views of "The Involuntary Life." There follow a poem by Paul Hamilton Hayne, a gay article on "Fun Philosophy," a paper on the Proceedings of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy, an article "About Books," and two important and interesting departments of collected matter called "Memorabilia" and "Notata." We rejoice to know that a periodical of such dignity and worth is gaining ground among the most cultivated people. The new volume will begin with the next number. It is published at 4 Winthrop Place, New York, and edited by Rev. Dr. Deems.

THE PHILOSOPHY SERIES

which the learned President of Princeton College is producing has now reached its eighth number. It is occupied with an examination of Herbert Spencer's Philosophy as culminated in his ethics. Like its predecessor, "A Criticism of the Critical Philosophy," it is written in a clear, forcible style, as free from technical terms as it is possible to make a treatise on the subject treated. Dr. McCosh has no rival among Christian philosophers; he is head and shoulders above all his competers, and in this examination of Herbert Spencer's teaching he is at his best. Since "The Data of Ethics" was issued in cheap form, the number of Herbert Spencer's disciples has largely increased, and though the famous philosopher is particularly anxious not to be regarded as a sceptic, we are describing the effect of his work very mildly when we say that it does not tend to the advancement of the Christian religion. It would be well if every reader of Herbert Spencer, and especially every earnest seeker after truth who has studied the Data of Ethics, would read Dr. McCosh's little volume. He would then see how large a demand Spencer makes on the faith of his readers, and how many palpable flaws there are in his reasoning. It is a small tract of seventy pages, full of powerful argument and sound, practical common-sense. Price, 5 cents. Published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

THE BLUE RIBBON IN AUSTRALIA.

(See Portraits on this page.)

THE illustration on this page is a copy of a photograph recently brought from Australia by a friend of temperance. The persons composing the group are the leaders of the Australian battalion of the Blue Ribbon Gospel Army, an organization which appears to be achieving in the new country a success as remarkable as that achieved by the parent army in Great Britain. The secret of its success is the union of Christian teaching with temperance teaching, the insistence of the evangelists on conversion as the only sure means of permanent reformation for the drunkard, and the confidence every worker has in the power of Christ to deliver the most abject and degraded slaves of the intoxicating cup if they can only be induced to look to Him for salvation. It is not surprising that men and women inspired by this all-conquering faith are winning souls among the vicious and the enslaved.

In Great Britain the army, though organized but little more than three years, has now more than a hundred stations, located in the chief cities in England and Scotland. Each has its hall, where, on every night in the week, the victims of ruin are directed to the way of emancipation. The enterprise has, of course, been very expensive in its initiatory stage. Some of the missions eventually become self-supporting, as the value of the work done is realized in the cities where they are located, but at first the outlay in each case is considerable. Nearly all of the enormous sum required to establish the missions has been paid by the President of the Army, the Rev. M. Baxter, who has also devoted his time and labor without stint to the work. To his administrative talents, his munificent liberality and his unremitting toil, the success of the army is, under the blessing of God, chiefly due.

The work in Australia is an offshoot of the British work, and is also managed by Mr. Baxter. There is a great work to be done there of a very interesting character. Australia is no longer used as a penal settlement by the government, but private persons have largely regarded it in that light. Dissipated young men have been sent there by their friends in the hope that in a new country they might begin a new life, and if they still pursued their career of vice the degradation would not be so severely felt by their families. So it happens that in the Australian cities there are hundreds of young men, some of them of great promise, who are bound by the chain of the rum-fiend, and who find the temptations in the new country as seductive as in the old. It is among this class chiefly that the Blue Ribbon Gospel Army is doing its grand work. Every lost sheep it is the means of restoring is a source of joy to numbers at home, who bless God for this mighty agency for good, and that He has put it into the hearts of His servants to send it forth.

THE FRENCH EMIGRANT NOBLE.

AMONG a group of horsemen riding from Paris toward the coast in the early dawn of the summer morning of July 17th, 1789, was Count Lafon de Leddibas. The horses were weary, and the men looked worn and tired, but eager and determined. They had been on the road all night, and the rising sun saw them still pressing forward. They were all aristocrats, and the few peasants whom they passed on their way thought that their nobles had a hunting party that morning. But it was not so; these aristocrats were the hunted, not the hunters.

How Count De Leddibas came to be riding post haste away from Paris on that summer morning is well understood now, though, unhappily, very much forgotten in these days. He was seeking a refuge, he and his companions, from a storm that he rightly believed was impending. The French nobles had filled to the brim the cup of their iniquities, and vengeance was approaching. The people had suffered so much and had suffered so long that despair whispered in their ears, "You can but die if you rebel. Better a short, swift, glorious death than to perish of want as your fathers did." So they had risen; on July 14th the Bastille had fallen, the people were armed, and De Leddibas and a few others were quietly and secretly leaving French soil while there was yet time.

De Leddibas was only one of a class, and was better than some of his class. He did not concern himself about the sufferings of the peasants on his estate away in Normandy, but he did not wilfully oppress them. Unhappily, there was no way of avoiding their suffering. Monsieur le Count must have money. He needed it to live as a French noble should. His Parisian mansion must be maintained in the prevailing style. A host of pampered lackeys must be kept, and fed, and clothed. The court must be attended and court dresses must be bought. There were expensive intrigues, too, and a little gambling, and a little hunting, and endless channels in which money must be kept always running, and there was no supply but from that estate in Normandy. Once there were sinecure offices about the court, but now, alas! the king himself had difficulty in finding sufficient money for his needs. The steward of the estate wrote to De Leddibas that the peasants were poor, and hungry, and their poor hovels were in ruin. Already their taxes were crushing them. They had only bread to eat, and little of that. De Leddibas would gladly have spared them, but it was impossible; he needed money for his stables, for his little card parties—for many purposes. The peasants on the estate must be compelled to pay.

So the money was collected, and in that winter of 1788 many a little body, so thin and light, was lowered into the earth in Normandy, and the parents, haggard and gaunt themselves, dried their eyes as they thought that their poor little child would never more cry for bread, and would not know the pang of seeing its loved ones die of cold and hunger. And Monsieur le Count had his hunting and his little card parties, and wished his peasants—if he ever thought of them—were better off, that they might provide him with a better income.

So things went until the end came, and De Leddibas was glad to leave his splendid mansion in Paris, his hunting, and his expensive amusements, and counted himself fortunate when he was safe in England, as the heads of nobles in Paris were falling into the basket of the guillotine. He had never cursed the people, as the New York millionaire did the other day; he had been content with simply living upon them. Yet the day of vengeance came, as it will come sooner or later to all whose selfish greed is pauperizing the people. The French nobles in 1789 learned the lesson our capitalists will inevitably learn if they do not mend their ways, that selfishness and oppression are but seed of which vengeance is the harvest.

In London De Leddibas read of the burning of his castle in Normandy, and how the lead on the roof had been made into bullets, and his Paris mansion was now public property, and much more to the same purpose. The little money he brought with him was soon spent, and his diamonds were sold, and, worse than all, Monsieur le Count was sick. Trouble, and chagrin, and worry were the causes, and they were very potent on a frame rendered old by dissipation before its time.

Strange fainting fits had prostrated him twice before he sought a physician's advice. Then he went to the most eminent physician of the day, who had many such patients, poor and proud among those emigrant nobles. He was a kindly Christian man, whose piety was as eminent as his learning. A few questions were put, and the count answered them quietly. The verdict he trembled to hear, and as he gave his wrist to the physician's fingers he dared not raise his eyes to the face of the man who could tell him if he would live or die. Another moment and the dreaded words are spoken. It is heart disease, and he may die at any moment. His affairs should be put in order, and would Monsieur le Count excuse the suggestion? peace with God through His Son were of all things the most important if not already secured.

But the count was by no means pleased with the suggestion. "Thank you, Doctor," he said, "for your candor and your kindness, but I am a disciple of Voltaire. I have heard him speak, I have read his books, and I am impervious to superstition."

The doctor shook his head mournfully. "It is no superstition, my good sir. It is reality as stern and as sure as that which is meeting your friends in Paris just now. I can well believe that you and they have persuaded yourselves that it is not true; had you believed it you could not have led your frivolous lives as you have. Let me beg of you to recognize its truth and apply it."

A smile of pitying derision crossed the count's face as he bowed and left the physician. But a few weeks later he learned how much superstition there was in the doctor's advice. He was reading the news of the September massacres, when he came across a beloved name among those of the ladies cut down in the streets. He fell forward with a smothered groan, and went to meet his God.

The French Noble in Suspense.

THE JEW'S WARD.

A SERIAL STORY.

Not Expatriation.

CAROLA sat silently by the bedside of the wounded man. She watched him attentively, and was ready to smooth his pillow, or readjust a bandage, or administer his medicine should need arise. Her training in the hospital had developed and applied the sweet spirit of helpfulness for which the Hazelmount people had loved her. There was no need for any of Carola's patients to ask for anything often; she seemed to divine what they needed even before the words came to their lips. Some of them said the Sister knew what they wanted better than they did themselves. It was so with Captain Bentley; he rested as tranquilly as his pain would permit, soothed by her presence and her ready helpfulness.

But meanwhile, in the silence, Carola's thoughts were very busy. The strange news about the Arnolds had affected her powerfully. The home they loved so dearly, which was so sacred a possession that it must not be sullied by her presence, with that involuntary stain of her early associations upon her, was to be theirs no longer. This man before her, helpless as he was physically, held and was exercising the power to eject them. It was strange; she could not understand it. She bore them no resentment for their harsh conduct toward herself. All her thoughts of them were of sympathy, and pity, and the ardent wish that in some way she could help them. "O Lord," she prayed, "that in some way I could save them from drinking that bitter cup!" So, in prayer and agitating thought, the hours of the night were passing by.

"Who are you?" inquired Captain Bentley at last. "I do not know your voice."

"I am a nurse from Netherton Hospital," she answered, "and there they call me Sister. But they are all poor people, and you had better call me nurse."

For in the bitterness of her resentment she did not wish to hear him call her by so dear a name. He was doing evil to those she loved; and how could she look upon him, as she had trained herself to look upon the wounded work-people brought to her from their dangerous occupations, as brothers injured in the battle of life?

"I had a sister once," he said, sadly; "she was the last creature who cared a straw for me."

How desolate the words sounded! Carola looked down on him with pitying eyes; for the thought of the dreary future which lay before him passed vividly through her mind. If he indeed recovered it would be as a maimed and disfigured man, almost blind, from whom all the pride of life had departed. If he had secured no one's love in the past there was little hope for the time to come. Her heart melted in pity toward him.

"I care for you," she said, "and I am nursing you as carefully as a sister could."

"But you are paid for it," he replied.

"Not as you think,"

she answered: "I shall have none of the money you pay to the hospital. But of course He who sent me will pay me."

"That is what I said," he muttered; "that makes all the difference."

"But you do not understand," she said, in a joyous tone; "He who sent me to you is my Lord Jesus Christ."

It was a long time since that name had fallen upon his ear; so long that he had to go back to his boyhood and childhood for memories of it. He had heard it chiefly at Christmas and Easter; and the recollection of holidays was principally associated with it. They were pleasant times those holidays, when he had gone home from school, and played with his little sister, and been indulged by his mother. His thoughts wandered away among silent memories until he fell asleep again; and Carola stole noiselessly back to her seat, but not to read. Her heart was too full of trouble.

During the days that followed there was no difficulty in Carola keeping her presence unknown to the villagers of Hazelmount. It was her duty to watch Captain Bentley through the night, and most of the day she spent in rest for herself. Presently he demanded more companionship from her, for her voice was always soothing to him during the dreary hours he lay awake, fretted by the long inaction. It happened one night that she began to talk of old Matthias Levi, the Jew cobbler, and she drew a picture of him and his little shop with a vividness that brought the whole scene clearly to his mind. Her own mind was dwelling fully on those early days, and Matthias seemed to stand before her in a clearer and brighter light than he had ever done before.

"Why, I know him better now than I did then!" she cried; "I can see him now, and what he was trying to do. For what doth God require of thee, O man! but to do justly, and love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God?" That is what Matthias was doing."

"It is impossible," murmured Captain Bentley. But he did it," she said; "not perfectly, of course, but to the utmost of his power. Yes, he did justly, and loved mercy, and walked humbly with his God."

He could hear her voice trembling, and he knew she could say no more to him just now. For the last week or two he had been seeing through her eyes, and thinking with her brain, and all life wore a different aspect for him. Her mind had gained so dominant an influence over him that they were pondering over the same subject, with a subtle feeling that it was so, though no word was spoken. They were both thinking of that flagrant act of injustice and tyranny lying at his very gates; and he was contrasting his own life painfully with that of the humble and poverty-stricken Jew. At last he called softly to Carola.

"Sister," he said, "do you know that at first I thought I had been shot for revenge?"

"Yes," she answered; "but that is impossible."

"For I should have deserved it," he went on, "for I am driving away people who have lived on these lands hundreds of years. The estate came to me, and I thought I'd a right to do what I pleased with my own; and I have been guilty of an unjust and unmerciful deed. I was lifting up myself proudly against God. I thank God you have told me of that old Jew to-night."

"Why?" she asked, with almost breathless eagerness.

"Because it is not yet too late to repent," he answered; "it is still two months to Christmas, and I can change all that. No, I would sooner quit Hazelmount myself than drive them away. The place is more theirs than mine."

"You make me happier than I can tell," sobbed Carola.

"Do I?" he asked; "then if it were for nothing else the thing should be done."

The next afternoon, when Carola awoke and opened her window, she heard a merry peal of bells ringing across the park from the unseen church-tower, and she knew that the glad tidings had already reached the people of Hazelmount. She leaned through the window and looked toward the Grange, which was now hidden from her by the brown stacks that began to fill the rich-yard. But how well could she picture it—the joyous meeting in the great kitchen, and the tall, strong old master standing in the midst of his work-people, and telling them there were to be no sorrowful separations, and no heart-breaking departures! They were saved from their overwhelming trouble. Yet her eyes filled with tears, and her heart felt heavy, as she thought how soon she would be going away, even though she was about to return to her work in the hospital, with the dear companionship of Sister Elizabeth.

Philip Arnold was wandering about the United States, seeking for his new Hazelmount. A great responsibility had been thrust upon him, for he had to consider the needs of a small colony rather than that of a mere family. There was no lack of money to buy such a place as he wanted, for the industry and thrift of many a generation had placed him beyond the reach of mere pecuniary difficulties. Yet his heart was sore at being driven from his fatherland; and as the hope of finding Carola died away there seemed nothing in the new country with which he could content himself. For who could seek her with the perseverance he would have if he was in England? Yet if this tribe of emigrants came out under his care, and looking to him as their head, how could he desert them in order to find her? It must be years before he could leave the new settlement to return to England for this purpose.

But a telegram reached him in the midst of his heavy-hearted inquiries. "Come home," it said; "we are not leaving Hazelmount." He had plenty of time to meditate over the mystery of this message on his voyage homeward. He had himself been privately to Captain Bentley, imploping him to leave his father undisturbed until his death, and offering to pay a large sum for this favor. What had brought about the change he could not guess; but it was not unmingled exultation to be going back to Hazelmount, for he feared his parents' reluctant consent to receive Carola as his wife would be recalled. He had no strong hope of finding her unchanged toward him, but he could not relinquish what he had. The dreary blank of the last two years seemed about to fall upon his life again.

Yet, in spite of all, there was a great gladness in treading the old road again between the station and Hazelmount. No place he had seen had looked so beautiful in his eyes. He stood a few minutes at the edge of the fir coppice, gazing at the many-gabled, half-timber farm-house which had been the permanent abiding-place of his family. It was well for him, as well as for his parents, not to be ruthlessly driven away from it with anger and resentment in his heart.

The routine of the farm was going on as usual. The threshing-machine was humming amid the brown stacks, and the cows were marching up slowly from the meadows to their stalls. He could see the well-known figures of his men moving about the fold, and wondered that there was no change in them. It might have been years that he had been absent, but it was only three months. His mother was not aged in the least, and his father had recovered all his former vigor and spirit. Philip felt as if it was he who had changed, while every one else had come to a standstill.

"We shall never be disturbed again!" exclaimed his father triumphantly. "The captain promises me a lease for three lives; mine, and yours, and your son's. It has given me back my life, Phil; I feel as if I was forty again."

"Tell me how it came about," said Philip. It was a long story as Mr. Arnold told it, for his joy made him fluent, and Philip's long absence had given time for many things to happen. And Mrs. Arnold had interruptions and explanations to make, without which she thought he could not understand the current of events.

"It was the nurse who brought him to repentance," she said. "Captain Bentley maintains so himself."

"Did you see her?" asked Philip.

"No, not exactly," answered his father. "I caught sight of her early one morning, standing at the gate by the school-house, dressed in a brown cloak and poke bonnet, such as nurses mostly wear; and I was hurrying up to speak to her, when she turned away all of a sudden, and ran back to the Hall like a lapwing. But I tell you what, my boy, we will give that hospital such a Christmas treat as it never had yet; and we'll send the nurse the handsomest gold watch and chain as a nurse ever had. Ay! and this shall be a home for her as often as she likes to come to it. The captain's set upon doing something for her, and he wouldn't have let her go, only when the danger was over she was ordered back to the hospital."

So it came to pass that, three days before Christmas, Philip Arnold rang at the door of Nether-ton Hospital, with a porter wheeling a truck well laden with farm-house dainties. It was growing dusk, and the little room into which he was shown, after asking for the nurse who had been to Hazelmount Hall, was not lighted up in any way but by the red glare of the furnace fires. The strange landscape outside, and the softened din of the busy toll going on, had so arrested his attention that he did not catch the click of the lock as the door opened quietly, and suddenly there fell upon his ears the tones of the dearest voice in the world.

"I am Sister Carol; you were asking for me." He could neither speak nor move, for the shock of finding her so strangely, at a moment when she was least in his thoughts, seemed to paralyze him. She did not know him, for after she had waited a few seconds for his answer, she spoke again.

"You want me," she said; "are you hurt, or have you come to fetch me to some one else?"

"Carola!" he cried.

"Philip!"

She said no more, but she stretched out her hands to him with a gesture as frank and tender as if the last two years had been nothing but a dream. And he drew her into his arms, and kissed her with a fondness, as though no one in the world could blame him for loving her.

"But no," she said, drawing herself away from him, "we love one another, Philip; that is true. But we must be content to be friends only."

"Friends!" he repeated, interrupting her; "yes, such friends as husband and wife are. I will never let you go again, not if they closed their doors against me. And do you think any one will say a word now you have saved us all from banishment? For it was you, Carol; but for you we should have left Hazelmount by this time. This Christmas would have been a most miserable time for all of us, and it is you who have saved us. I never thought it was you."

"But you do not think, you do not remember," she said, falteringly; "you never knew—"

"I do know; I know all," he went on; "I was at the trial, and I went to seek you in your old Jew's house. Oh, my darling! what does it matter to me where you were born, or where you lived? I know no one as good as you. There's no one else in the whole world who can make me as good a man, and as true a Christian, as you will."

"But now," she said, with downcast eyes, "I am working for my Lord here."

"Oh, Carol!" he cried, "don't make men believe that Christ came to weaken human ties or to set at naught human affections. It is good to have hospitals, but it is better to have homes; and you will be a happier and a better woman as my wife than as a nurse here. If I am ready to leave father and mother and house for your sake, cannot you give up this? Did not our Lord say, 'What God hath joined together let not man part asunder'? You never had a home, and you do not know how sacred and holy it can be."

"But I shall bring disgrace upon you," she answered, still standing aloof from him, and not raising her eyes from the ground.

"Is there nothing of false shame in you, my Carola?" he said; "are you not too much ashamed of that early life, which was no fault of yours? If God Himself placed you there, ought you to think so much of it? Should it weigh so heavily against my love?"

"Oh, if I only knew what I ought to do!" she cried.

"There are plenty of women who can be nurses here," he continued; "but there is no other woman who can be my wife. That is more certain now than it was when we parted two years ago. If you choose to sacrifice yourself you sacrifice me also. You cannot decide to stay here without dooming me to a sad and solitary life."

"I could never bring myself to do that," she whispered.

"Take your father and mother by surprise," said Sister Elizabeth, when Philip told her his position; "tell them you have invited Captain Bentley's nurse to spend Christmas with them, and my little girl shall come down on Christmas Eve. I've always expected something like this to happen. We could not keep a girl like Carola to grow old in the hospital!"

"They cannot refuse me now," he answered. "Oh," she said, laughing merrily, "they will be so amazed they will not know what to say, and in a few minutes it will be over."

No news could have been more welcome to Philip's father and mother; but it was difficult for him to keep his secret. The gladness of his heart could not but disclose itself, and he went about the old house as if he had been a boy again. Mrs. Arnold had not seen him so happy since Carola had gone away, and her thoughts turned a good deal to her as she prepared the best bedroom for the nurse from the hospital. Though it was a good thing that at last Philip was recovering his spirits, she could not but feel a sad interest in the poor girl, and if he would but marry how gladly would she befriend her!

(To be concluded.)

THE LORD WILL PROVIDE.

S. S. Lesson for June 28, Gen. 22: 14, Margin. Golden Text, 1 Pet. 5: 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Faith Fades Without Exercise — Abraham Taught to Wait for God's Work—His Confidence in Darkness and Difficulty—Far-sighted People—Eminent Outside the Church—Least Within It—How to Deal with Vexations—Does God Know?—God's Opportunities.

ABRAHAM is "the father of all them that believe" (Rom. 4: 11), and his faith is spoken of in the epistles to the Romans, Galatians, and Hebrews for our encouragement. But faith can only continue to exist as it is exercised. Thus we see that trials of faith abound in the lives of those men of old whose record is preserved in Heb. 11. Abraham was signally tried. Long before he had any child God called him a father of many nations, saying, "A father of many nations have I made thee." Abraham's reckoning of God was that with Him to say was to do. "And Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness" (Gen. 15: 6; Rom. 4: 5).

What he meant by believing is beautifully told in these words: "He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, but was strong in faith, giving glory to God, and that, what He had promised He was able also to perform; and therefore it was imputed unto him for righteousness." Once Abraham had attempted to bring about the performance of God's promises, when, in accordance with the counsel of Sarah, he had taken Hagar as his concubine. God had taught him his sad mistake, and now he had given up providing for what God undertook to do, and his heart rested on God and said, "The Lord will provide."

Isaac, the child of promise, was born after thirty years, and now Abraham's greatest trial of faith was to come. He had previously yielded his will to God about Ishmael, and had cast out the bondwoman and her son; and he had received Isaac in his old age as the precious commencement of the fulfillment of God's promises. And now this son, so directly God-given, this very tangible proof that God kept His word, was demanded of him in sacrifice. It looked as though God were trifling with him, it seemed as though God were untrue to Himself. He was demanding of Abraham an act which He Himself condemned among the heathen Canaanites. How should Abraham lift up his head among them again? And then Sarah, how account to her for this strange command? The whole situation seemed impossible; but to all and everything Abraham had but one answer, "The Lord will provide." God knows how to justify Himself; God will not be at a loss. Abraham's faith went so far that he believed, even if Isaac died, God was able to raise him from the dead (Heb. 11: 19); he saw God's resources to be unlimited. Thus he neither shirked nor delayed his obedience to the command. Even when Isaac said to him, "Behold the fire and the wood: but where is the lamb for a burnt-offering?" (Gen. 22: 7) he answered, "My son, God will provide Himself a lamb." And He did so. At the very critical moment when the hand of Abraham was raised for the fatal blow, the Lord provided. He declared that Abraham's faith was proved, and He showed him the ram which should be offered in the stead of his son. The Lord did provide.

FAR-SIGHTED PEOPLE.

Some people are by nature more far-seeing than others, and they have a tendency to provide against contingencies which may arise. They are the planning, calculating, arranging, undertaking people, whose brains are always busy. Full of natural energy, and with a conscious sense of power, they take the place of leader wherever they are. In business, science, learning, art, these are always the shining ones. But in the kingdom of God all is reversed; there the greatest is least, and the least greatest; the first last, and the last first. There the question is not what lies in man, but what are the resources of God. As long as man is in his own province, it becomes him to provide. The man of business falls back upon his experience or his talents, or on the counsel of some tried business acquaintances to help him out in a time of emergency. The housewife racks her brain to think of how to make the best of things, how to provide for the occupation, benefit, and comfort of her visitors; the Christian worker thinks out the best ways of reaching certain classes of people, the best way of obtaining the funds needful for carrying on the work. He considers what subjects in the Bible will best bear upon the condition of his hearers, and, in short, undertakes the management in every way. He appropriates certain work to certain workers, and gets a great machinery in motion. But all this is man, not God; human, not divine. God may come into it, and make use of it to a certain extent to serve His own purposes, and to bring precious souls to Christ; but it all speaks of the energy of man more than the power of God; it is not distinctly felt at every turn that the Lord will provide.

THE AGE OF SELF-HELP.

When God gave the promise of His Son (Isa. 9: 6) He said, "And the government shall be upon His shoulder: and His name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor," etc. That which God spoke in prophecy of the future of the Church of Christ is true in detail of the kingdom of God within us. When Paul calls us to present our bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is our reasonable service (Rom. 12: 1), he added, "And be not conformed to this age" (R. V.). This age is one of self-help, self-reliance, self-esteem, self-culture, self-effort. It is the age of the glorification of man. But the kingdom of God exists not as a theatre for the display of man, but for the manifestation of God, the kingdom is for the King. As soon as we cease simply to make use of Christ by knowing Him only as a Saviour, in a time of difficulty—and hand ourselves over to Him that He may make use of us—we pass out of our own keeping into His, out of our own hands into His. Then our Owner must provide; He takes the responsibility of His property.

"Oh, what shall I do?" said a Christian worker, "Mr. So-and-so has come for the first time to the meeting: he has been dreadfully prejudiced for years, and that objectionable brother is just beginning one of his long, rambling prayers which damp the spirit of the meeting. Human energy would go to that brother and ask him not to pray so long, or give him some hint that it was not well, and that others were hindered by it. But faith in God whispered, 'The Lord will provide;' this very thing has happened as a test whether you will be occupied with that brother or the Lord. The Lord did provide; the very prayer of the brother was blest to Mr. So-and-so."

"How very trying that a repair to the house should be needed just now, those meetings are coming on. I had laid by a little sum of money which would just have enabled me to entertain so-and-so, and they are the very people who need most to come!" So said the flesh. But the Spirit said, "Cannot God bless them elsewhere, and cannot you ask and receive a blessing for them by faith? And though they may never know that you have prayed for them, 'the Lord will provide,' and the secret will be a sweet one between you and Him." The Lord did provide; those very people came to the meetings and were blessed, but the hospitable housewife knew that the Lord alone had done it.

A very pushing brother, much in his own spirit, forced himself into a leading place in meetings which were left to the guidance of the Spirit. "I do wish Mr. — would not come," said one; "he quite spoils the meeting." "The Lord will provide," said another; "we will ask God to keep him away, and so to bless him that when he returns he may be made a blessing." The brother was soon after kept away, his place filled by others, and his own spirit wonderfully changed. The point which we have to settle in every circumstance which may happen to us is this:

DOES GOD KNOW

all about it? Is God responsible for it? A pressure may come upon us in money matters, or as regards physical strength, or other resources; does God know it, and is it a thing arranged between Him and us that the government of it is on His shoulders? Then who shall provide? Shall the Lord, or shall I?

HIS GREAT OBJECT

in all His dealings with us is to make Himself known to us, and through us to others. He declares that every hair of our heads is numbered (Luke 12: 7); that He knoweth we have need of all these things (Matt. 6: 32); that He knoweth our frame (Ps. 103: 14); that not a sparrow falleth to the ground without Him (Luke 12: 6). And He exhorts us in every thing, in these things to make our prayer and supplication with thanksgiving (Phil. 4: 6). Wherever He leads us, into whatever circumstances, He is responsible for the consequences. When He led Elijah by the brook Cherith, He made Himself his Provider, the Lord did provide, and sent him bread and flesh morning and evening. When the Spirit of God called Philip away from his sphere of blessing in Samaria, He was responsible to provide him with service, and it was not long before he put the enmesh in his path, the more impossible to us seems to be the position of things, the more glorified is the Lord in providing. These are

GOD'S OPPORTUNITIES.

Had the children of Israel never been in such straits at the Red Sea, the Lord would not have been known as He who made a way in the sea, and a path in the mighty waters. Had they never passed through the barren desert it could not have been written of Him, "He gave them bread from heaven to eat" (John 6: 31). Had there been a plentiful supply of water He would not have been recognized as the God who gave them water out of the stony rock. In the sorest spiritual distress, the fiercest temptation, the most distressing deadness, even if we have brought it upon ourselves, our Father never expects us to get ourselves out of the snare of the Fowler. He knows what got us into the snare, He is faithful to tell us what it is and at the same time, and thus blesses us more than if we had not been tempted. If at this very moment you are in sore perplexity of soul or body, and know not which way to turn, then praise God, "the Lord will provide;" trust Him, stand still, and you shall see the salvation of the Lord. Look away from yourself, from circumstances, both the hopeful and the discouraging ones; let the helm of your little boat go over into His hands, and do nothing until He shows you, and He will provide. He has undertaken the responsibility of being your Father, and He will never bear the name without being true to it. He only wants you to treat Him as such, and to let Him show you and those around you that "the Lord will provide."

BY FRANCES RIDLEY HAVESAL.

Just to let thy Father do
What He will;
Just to know that He is true,
And be still;
Just to follow hour by hour
As He leadeth;
Just to draw the moment's power
As it needeth.

Just to trust Him, this is all I
Then the day will surely be Peaceful, whatso'er befall,
Bright and blessed, calm and free.

Just to let him speak to thee
Through His word,
Watching that His voice may be Clearly heard;
Just to tell Him everything
As it rises,
And at once to Him to bring
All surprises;
Just to listen, and to stay
Where you cannot miss his voice;
This is all I and thus to do,
Communing, you shall rejoice.

Just to ask Him what to do
All the day,
And to make you quick and true
To obey;
Just to know the needed grace
He bestoweth;
Every bar of time and place
Overletheth;
Just to take thy orders straight
From the Master's own command;
Blessed day! when thus we wait
Always at our Sovereign's hand.

Just to recollect His love,
Always true,
Always shining from above,
Always new;
Just to recognize its light,
All-enfolded;
Just to claim its present might,
All-upholding;
Just to know it as thine own,
That power which can't be away;
Is not this enough alone?
For the gladness of the day?

Just to trust, and yet to ask Guidance still;
Take the training or the task
As He will;
Just to take the loss or gain
As He sends it;
Just to take the joy or pain
As He lends it;
How He formed thee for His praise
Will not miss the gracious aim;
So to-day and all thy days
Shall be moulded for the same.

Just to leave 'a His dear hand,
Little things;
All we cannot understand,
All that stings;
Just to let Him take the care
Sorely pressing;
Finding all we let Him bear
Changed to blessing;
This is all I and yet the way
Pointed by Him who loves thee best;
Secret of a happy day,

By WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D.,
Classical Examiner of the University of London.

REVISED AND EDITED BY
Rev. F. N. and M. L. PELOUBET, AUTHORS OF "SELECT NOTES ON THE INTERNATIONAL LESSONS."

Its Editor and associate contributors (seventy-three in number) are well-known as among the most eminent Biblical scholars of our time, in both Europe and America, and they have performed their work with a thoroughness which leaves little room for competition or criticism.

Every one acknowledges the great value of Dr. William Smith's Bible Dictionary, as containing "the fruit of the ripest biblical scholarship of England," and that much of this value remains in the condensation of his larger work into one smaller volume.

1. The main body of the work is precisely as Dr. Smith himself made it.
2. We have made some abridgments, but almost entirely of matter not specially helpful or interesting to teachers, or to any who would not be likely to have the large four-volume edition.
3. We have added all the proper names used in the New Revision, where they have differed from those in the Authorized Version.
4. The signification of all the proper names has been inserted from the best authorities, in addition to the few which are found in the former editions.
5. The results of the latest research, especially in regard to the topography of Palestine, are embodied in various articles.
6. Some subjects have been rearranged, to make them clearer, and sometimes fuller and more definite information has been given.
7. The dates at which persons lived and events took place have been inserted, not because absolute reliance can be placed on their accuracy, but in order to show the relative positions of each, and hence to give a clearer idea of the history and progress of events. The dates are in accordance with Archbishop Usher's system as printed in our common Bibles. Those after the reign of David, from which time a good degree of accuracy is obtainable, are from M'Clinkot and Strong's large Cyclopaedia.
8. All important changes are marked with the signature "Ed." so that Dr. Smith may not be regarded as responsible for them.

SPECIAL NOTICE. The above is the Latest Revised Edition. Do not be persuaded into buying older and incomplete editions, containing only 150 illustrations and sold at a trifle less price, while this revised edition contains 5 Colored Maps and 400 Illustrations, and is printed on the best quality of paper. It is admitted, by those most competent to judge, to be THE BEST OF ITS KIND IN THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

"I MUST DIE TO WIN."

This is a common expression, used frequently in connection with Life Insurance, as an objection to the cost of the policy. It is an excellent form of provision for the family, but I must die to win." But

YOU MAY LIVE AND WIN.

This refers to the Endowment plan, which meets the above objection. Take for instance, a policy payable to yourself 10, 15, or 20 years hence. If you die before the termination of the period, your FAMILY WINS. If you survive the period, the policy becomes at once a provision for your own advancing years. YOU HAVE LIVED AND WON.

The "Manhattan's" new plan meets the want. It retains the advantage of the Endowment feature while reducing the net cost of Life Insurance under the contract to almost nothing.

For an example of the operation of this plan, address the Company, giving your age, and a statement will be sent you.

DELEGATES TO THE FAITH-HEALING CONFERENCE IN LONDON.

EIGHT PROMINENT LEADERS AT THE FAITH-HEALING CONFERENCE.

THE Faith-healing Conference, held in London during the first week of this month, was so largely attended that it was found necessary to hold the morning meetings, as well as those in the evening, in the immense Agricultural Hall. It was intended to hold the morning meetings in the Faith-healing Institute at Bethshan, but the accommodation there was wholly inadequate for the crowds of people who sought admission. There were a large number of speakers from America, who added their testimonies to those of their transatlantic brethren as to the wonderful works of God in the healing of the sick. A general interest was taken in the proceedings by the press and the public. The secular daily journals published full reports of the proceedings at each session of the Conference. On the first page of this number of the CHRISTIAN HERALD are portraits of six of the leaders of the movement, and portraits of two others appear on page 412. The following sketches of their lives are taken from the columns of the London Christian Herald.

REV. W. E. BOARDMAN, OF BETHSHAN, LONDON.

MR. BOARDMAN is an American by birth. One day, while yet an infant, his parents were journeying in a chaise, and he was being carried in his mother's arms. Their journey led them to a wild and perilous place near the river Chemung, where the road, barely wide enough to allow a single carriage to pass along, is cut out of the slaty rock, which lifts its head above toward the clouds, and a steep declivity descends to the river's brink. In the narrowest place of the road the chaise upset, and the whole party, horse, chaise and all, rolled over and over down to the water's edge. How they escaped as they did has always been a mystery. All was soon put right, however, and they went on their way again. The principal injury was received by the child. The stump of a broken shrub at the water's edge pierced his groin and left a scar which he still bears.

At the age of fifteen Mr. Boardman left home, ambitious to make his fortune. A companion introduced him to the works of the poets and prose writers who have covered the poison and pollution of sensualism with the drapery of the graceful expressions that render it fascinating to the youthful fancy without shocking youthful virtue. As room-mates and bed-fellows, the two literally devoured this pernicious literature; and night after night upon their bed they read it by the light of the moon. By and by there grew in young Boardman's heart a wish that there were no God, no heaven, no hell, nothing to fear from the freest, fullest pursuit of the world and indulgence in its pleasures, and it was not long before the wily adversary presented him with a philosophy, falsely so-called, to suit the wish. Presently, however, through the instrumentality of an elder brother, he was led to accept the teachings of the Bible as true, and accepted Christ as his Saviour.

From the night of his conversion commenced wonderful manifestations of God to his soul; signal answers to prayer were given him, and he was helpful in leading many into the way of salvation. Believing that the Lord called him to devote himself to the Gospel ministry, he sold out the interest he had acquired in business, and began a course of study. Shortly a prospect was opened to him of making $10,000 a year; the temptation was too much for him, and he abandoned his studies to make money. At the end of two years and a half he reckoned his gains at $100,000, but his Christian life had become well-nigh extinct.

Some little time after his marriage the current of success changed. Instead of gains came loss upon loss, until the gains were all gone and financial failure seemed near. At this juncture his wife's anxiety about her soul led to a new consecration of himself to God, and no sooner was Mrs. Boardman filled with the joy of the Lord and her husband brought back from his wanderings, than losses ceased and failure was averted.

Change of circumstances led to a change of residence. The more hopefully and easily to begin business again, Mr. Boardman went West, and took with him a large supply of Bibles and Testaments. In their new home, one day, as Mrs. Boardman was looking over some books, she opened the Memoir of James Brainerd Taylor, and came upon a wonderful letter of his to a friend, describing a new and blessed experience into which he had just then come, after having been a Christian many years. She began reading it to her husband. In a moment he was riveted, and when she came to the end of the letter, he exclaimed: "There! that is just what I need, and must have." Eventually, after months of misdirected efforts and fruitless struggle, both wife and husband entered into a fuller realization of abiding union with Jesus than ever before, and they were filled with unbounded satisfaction.

An ardent longing had been growing in Mr. Boardman's heart for the salvation of men, and God now placed him in circumstances where his longing was gratified. One after another was led to Christ through his instrumentality—whole families were converted—and the fame of what God was accomplishing through His servant took wing, and was told throughout the mining region in which Mr. and Mrs. Boardman were then residing. Meanwhile, the Lord called Mr. Boardman out into the ministry, and gave the means for building a house of worship at Potosi, Mo., which after forty years still abides a monument of the goodness of God.

We have not space to enter into the details of the work in which God has so largely used and blessed Mr. Boardman on both sides of the Atlantic. He is, as is well known, one of the principal expounders and most consistent illustrations of what is generally understood by the designation, "Higher Life," and is a fervent believer in the doctrine that Christ as Saviour is the Healer of our bodily maladies as well as the bearer-away of our sins. Of the work at Bethshan, which is conducted by Mrs. Baxter and others under his superintendence, we need not speak, having frequently published accounts of it in these columns.

MISS SISSON, FROM INDIA.

MISS SISSON, who is now in London, is also an American. She was six years a missionary in Southern India, and was there through the terrible famine. Broken down by overwork and the vicissitudes of the climate and the time, she returned to America for recovery of health. Restored, she went back to India in connection with Dr. Cullis's Faith Mission, and was again compelled, by the illness of her sister, to leave the sphere of her labors; she travelled as far as London with her on her way back to America, and there, becoming interested in the Bethshan work, she has remained to this time.

REV. F. D. SANFORD, OF BOSTON, MASS.

THE Rev. F. D. Sanford, who has crossed the Atlantic to attend the Conference, has charge of the evangelistic department of the works of faith of Dr. Charles Cullis, the founder of the Consumptives' Home and other institutions in Boston, Mass., California, India, and other countries.

Mr. Sanford's father was a Congregational clergyman in Massachusetts, and his mother, in direct answer to whose prayers he believed he was converted, is still living.

At the time of his conversion Mr. Sanford was a commercial traveller, and it may be incidentally mentioned, was a great smoker, using sometimes seventeen cigars in one day. One day, while engaged in business he was struck down in the street by what seemed to him supernatural power. He was unconscious of his surroundings, but felt vividly conscious of the divine presence. The pages of his past life appeared as if spread out like a panorama before him. He seemed to see himself as some other man, making various attempts to succeed in business, but, to use his own expression, "the bottom seemed to drop out of everything I put my hand to." Then he saw himself directed to work by the Lord and proceeding successfully, having a sure promise that he should not fail. As in the experience of men saved from drowning, all this passed through his mind with lightning rapidity. His faintness or whatever the affection might be styled by physicians, was only of a few moments' duration, but it left a deep impression on his mind.

However, he went on with his journey, but had only got to Harrisburgh, Pa., when he had a similar attack. He went to the Young Men's Christian Association in that city under deep conviction, but came away still in spiritual darkness. He then proceeded to his hotel, and on arriving there discovered that a number of the members of the Legislature had met in the room next to his for a night's enjoyment. He searched for and found his long-neglected Bible—the Bible that his mother had given him, and that he had promised to read. Placing his fingers in his ears to shut out the mirth that had become so distasteful to him, and with a prayer on his lips for light, he scanned the sacred pages. He sat thus till one o'clock in the morning, when suddenly light seemed to burst upon his soul, and he felt he was a new creature in Christ Jesus.

He then went home and set to work, doing what he could for his Divine Master. About six months after his conversion, which took place in 1875, he attended Dr. Cullis's Second Faith Conference, where he heard Dr. Boardman and other advocates of the Higher Life doctrines, and was convinced of their truth.

His brother, who was a merchant, requesting him at this point to enter into his service, he consented; but the work of the Lord so attracted him that he resolved to put himself entirely into the hands of the Lord for service. Having done this, he entered Dr. Cullis's Faith-training College, in Boston, on leaving which he, at the invitation of Dr. Cullis, entered his work in a small mission. This was in 1878, since which time he has been associated with Dr. Cullis in his various works of faith and labors of love for Christ.

Shortly after entering this work he was ordained over one of the faith churches, but was soon called to be assistant pastor with Dr. Cullis. It soon became evident, however, that he would have to give himself up entirely to the work of an evangelist. He therefore entered upon his present work, and has labored as an evangelist in churches of all denominations in Connecticut, Massachusetts, Maine, New Hampshire, New York, New Jersey, and other States, being everywhere, as he had seen himself in his vision, successful in an eminent degree. He also labored with Bishop Wilson in the Reformed Episcopal Church in Ottawa, Canada, where much good was accomplished.

It is possible that he may remain in Europe for a lengthened period. For more than ten years he has been desirous of visiting England and other countries, but has not had an opportunity, owing to the pressure of engagements at home, and the duty of continuing the work which God was manifestly blessing. He has now, however, been able to gratify his cherished desire, and has arrived in England bearing a loving letter from Dr. Cullis, recommending him to Christian friends there as one in whom he has the fullest confidence, and accompanied by his wife, whom God has used in connection with him to the help of many souls in many places.

Mr. Sanford is fully in sympathy with Dr. Cullis, Mr. Muller, and others in their reliance on God for the means of life. He depends entirely upon the Lord for the supply of all his needs, and gives many thrilling illustrations of deliverance in times of difficulty, when the Lord has relieved him in answer to prayer, send-the money in the most unexpected manner. is way of working in England, as in his own ury, has been generally to hold Bible read- for believers in the afternoon, and Gospel ings in the evening, but he often gives a s of Bible readings for a number of days. le a firm believer in divine healing, he re- ceives evangelistic work as his special mis- , his own expression being "souls first."

MISS HALL, OF SWEDEN.
This devoted Christian lady is just now found- a Home for Divine Healing in Jong Koping, her work is comparatively new. For about years she has been evangelizing in various s of Sweden and Denmark, and was one of the very first to speak publicly. Large ences have been attracted to her, and al- s the power of God comes upon the people nnection with the services, and many sick e been signally healed in various places, the s continually increasing.

MISS ELSABORG, OF SWEDEN.
Miss ELSABORG is the founder of various faith works in Sweden. Her home is in Stockholm. The first faith establishment by her was a Training Home for Bible-women, after the pattern of Mrs. Ranyard's work in London. In that Home there have been trained Bible-women who have gone into three kingdoms—Sweden, Norway, and Denmark—and also in Finland, in Russia; and everywhere they have been greatly owned and blessed by God in His work as teachers, and as nurses of the sick. Some of them have been used in the healing of those who were sick, through prayer and faith.
Another of her works has been the rescue of the fallen, and she has a Rescue Home in Stock- holm, in connection with which there has been a great and blessed work in the rescue of the fallen and training them for lives of usefulness.
